Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Has the gentleman ever run across this in his experience? It has been reported to me from men in the service from my own State that at the time the insurance was sold it was represented to them that the insurance—not the disability insurance, but the regular insurance—could be paid to them if they were partially disabled. If there was an insurance of $10,000 and there was a disability of 6 per cent, they would get this partial disability. I have verified that by referring to others in the same regiment, who claim that that representation was made. Does the gentleman know whether it was or not?

Mr. RAYBURN. No; I have not come across a case like that in my own experience. I think this is the first I ever heard of it.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Of course, if the disability compensation is increased from $30 to $80, it will practically give the men what they would have received if the representation had been correct.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. DOMINICK. I want to ask the gentleman from Texas, for information, whether there is any provision in this bill, or whether there will be any provision for the changing of the plan of payment of what are commonly known as term policies?

Mr. RAYBURN. No.

Mr. DOMINICK. Those that are now being paid in installments?

Mr. RAYBURN. No; only converted insurance; and I would never agree to the lump-sum payment of any of the claims that have already accrued, for the simple reason that it is the history of life insurance that the beneficiaries of policies usually dissipate the money which they receive within three or four years after they have received it, and my statement applies especially to the mothers and dependents of the boys who have died, who are getting this insurance by the month. It will help them to get along for 20 years, whereas if it was commuted and they got a lump sum, they might lose it in an honest venture, or they might be swindled out of it, and then they would come here to Congress with bony hands and tearful eyes and voices, asking Congress to do something for them because they had been swindled out of this money. I never could agree that the accrued claims should be paid in a lump sum instead of during a period of 20 years.

Mr. DOMINICK. I asked the gentleman that question for the purpose of bringing out that view of the case.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SWEET. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the time which is now being used, which was extended by the committee, is subject to a point of order. It can be objected to at any time; but there are five minutes remaining of time extended by the committee.

Mr. SWEET. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS].

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, in the very limited time at my disposal I can not, of course, fully discuss the bill under consideration. It is not necessary, even had I the opportunity, for gentlemen on the floor have already presented the salient points of the legislation proposed. Permit me to congratulate the committee for the very earnest work they have performed. The thanks of Congress and the men in the service are due them for the conscientious, constructive effort they have put forth in correcting some of the errors of the existing law.

The present statute was passed hurriedly to meet an emergency. It was pioneer legislation and, as such, could not be expected to be perfect. Time has demonstrated the urgent need of amendment. As we progress, other amendments will be necessary, and as Congress, fully conscious of the unparalleled service of those who joined the colors, is determined that those who staked their all at their country's call will be taken care of, those changes will find expression in new law.

I have long felt that the provisions of existing law, providing for those who were maimed in the conflict, were not sufficient. I introduced two bills—H. R. 9022 and H. R. 9032—which in one instance increases compensation to those wounded, and in the other broadens the field of beneficiaries under the insurance feature of the law.

While the bill now under consideration does not increase the rates for those injured to the point provided for in my bill, it does make substantial increases in the existing rates. And this is just. We can never hope to adequately compensate those to whom darkness has come or who will go down life's course maimed and crippled. Their sacrifice is beyond money value. All we can hope to do is to lessen the burden caused by their handicaps and alleviate to a small degree their unfortunate condition. The main provisions of my bill provided—

That if disability results from the injury—

(1) If and while the disability is rated as total and temporary, the monthly compensation shall be the following amounts:

(a) If the disabled person has neither wife nor child living, $90.

(b) If he has a wife but no child living, $100.

(c) If he has a wife and one child living, $105.

(d) If he has a wife and two or more children living, $110.

(e) If he has no wife but one child living, $100, with $5 for each additional child up to two.

(f) If he has a mother or father, either or both dependent on him for support, then, in addition to the above amounts, $15 for each parent so dependent.

(2) If and while the disability is rated as partial and temporary, the monthly compensation shall be a percentage of the compensation that would be payable for his total and temporary disability, equal to the degree of the reduction in earning capacity resulting from the disability, but no compensation shall be payable for a reduction in earning capacity rated at less than 10 per cent.

(3) If and while the disability is total and permanent, the rate of compensation shall be $115 per month: Provided, however, That for the loss of both feet, or both hands, or one hand and one foot, or both eyes, or for becoming totally blind or becoming helpless and permanently bedridden from causes occurring in the line of duty in the service of the United States, the rate of compensation shall be $115 per month.

(4) If and while the disability is partial and permanent, the monthly compensation shall be a percentage of the compensation that would be payable for his total and permanent disability equal to the degree of the reduction in earning capacity resulting from the disability, but no compensation shall be payable for a reduction in earning capacity rated at less than 10 per cent.

A schedule of ratings of reductions in earning capacity from specific injuries or combinations of injuries of a permanent nature shall be adopted and applied by the bureau. Ratings may be as high as 100 per cent. The ratings shall be based, as far as practicable, upon the average impairments of earning capacity resulting from such injuries in civil occupations and not upon the impairment in earning capacity in each individual case, so that there shall be no reduction in the rate of compensation for individual success in overcoming the handicap of a permanent injury. The bureau shall from time to time readjust this schedule of ratings in accordance with actual experience.

(5) If the disabled person is so helpless as to be in constant need of a nurse or attendant, an additional sum of $25 per month shall be paid, as the director may deem reasonable.

(6) In addition to the compensation above provided, the injured person shall be furnished by the United States such reasonable governmental medical, surgical, and hospital services and with such supplies, including artificial limbs, trusses, and similar appliances, as the director may determine to be useful and reasonably necessary. * * *

I will not discuss further these provisions, for I feel Congress is anxious and willing to incorporate them into law.

Let me take up in brief the provisions of the other bill I introduced and which I am happy to see incorporated in the bill now under discussion. It relates to the enlargement of the field of beneficiaries, and in this connection permit me to recite two concrete cases, which have come to me from my own district, two cases which worked injustice to the soldier and injustice to those he desired to provide for. I had one young fellow who became an orphan when a child. His aunt took him into her home and paid all the expenses of his education and maintenance, teaching him by her motherly care the precepts of the Master and instilling into his heart love of country and the duty of patriotic citizenship. No legal adoption had ever taken place, although the relationship maintained, respected, and cherished each for the other was the closest and purest.

That boy joined the colors, and when he said good-by to his foster mother—because she was his mother in everything except from the fact that the law did not recognize it—he left with the department when he applied for insurance, written instructions stating that in case of his death he wanted his insurance to go to the woman who had been everything to him that his own mother could have been. That boy's life was given to his country, and when the foster mother asked for the insurance which her boy had specified should be hers the department said, "No; the law does not permit it," and that woman to-day is waiting until Congress shall pass this law before she will get the money which the boy whom she reared and loved intended her to have.

Mr. BEE. Did the law permit her to receive it?

Mr. HICKS. No; that is what I complain of; but that will be rectified by this bill. I wish to state another case. A young fellow also in my district had no one dependent upon him. He was an orphan. Before he went into the service of his country he became engaged to a young woman of estimable character, and he specified in his application for insurance that in case of his death she should be the beneficiary. The boy was killed and the girl that he was going to marry on his return, the woman of whom he thought the most in all the world, has not been able to get the insurance because she was not in the "permitted class." Yet the Government had been taking money from that boy, and from the other boy I mentioned, in the way of premiums. This bill will rectify those injustices. These are cases that have no doubt been duplicated thousands of times in this country, and I am glad that the committee and the Congress are going to be broad enough and just enough to rectify those wrongs. It has been unjust to the men who served their country to the uttermost limit. It has been dishonest on the part of this Government, because we have taken money from these soldiers for a specified purpose, paid by the men in good faith, and then, because of technical restrictions, we have denied payment of the principal to those whom the men designated and to whom they wanted the money paid.

I am not criticizing the War Risk Bureau, they were bound by law; but I maintain, now that we know of the wrongs being done, it is our duty to correct them. The boys whose wishes should be honored are gone; their records are closed forever; but from their graves on the battle fields of their country the stilled voices of those who have rendered their full service whisper an appeal to us to do justice to their loved ones. The requests of the sacred dead, transmuted by the blood of heroes, becomes a command to the living, and we must not falter in our duty to them who will fight no more.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROGERS. Section 11 of this bill, beginning on page 6, consists of 10 separate and distinct subsections. Is it the ruling of the Chair that each of those subsections will be open to amendment individually when read, or only after the entire section has been read?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hold that the bill will be read by sections, so that it would require the reading of the entire section.

Mr. ROGERS. In view of the importance of section 11, I suggest that the chairman of the committee ask unanimous consent that section 11 be read by paragraphs rather than as a whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That paragraph (d) of the second subdivision (1) of section 22 of the war-risk insurance act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(d) An illegitimate child, but, as to the father only, if acknowledged by instrument in writing signed by him, or if he has been judicially ordered or decreed to contribute to such child's support."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 15, after the word "support," strike out the period and quotation marks and insert: "or has been judicially decreed to be the putative father of such child."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, this is the legal expression common to all States as to the recognition of the father of an illegitimate child, and I submit that it is the correct form in which it should be expressed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 13, after the word "acknowledged," strike out the words "by instrument" and insert after the word "in" in line 13, "under regulations prescribed by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance."

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, at the outset of the few remarks I shall make I wish to express my gratification at the very splendid result of the work of the committee in presenting this bill with its modifications. There has been no greater conception of the human mind than the war-risk insurance measure, and it is astonishing how well it has worked out when it is considered that it was the pioneer in matters of that kind. The revised bill corrects many inequalities and makes it more elastic and beneficial to those for whom the benefit was intended. I offer this amendment and direct the attention of the House to the suggestions covering it. We are dealing with a very delicate subject—that of illegitimate children. We seek the protection of the innocent against the perfidy of the wrongdoer. We are dealing with a question of law which involves a man guilty of the unlawful parentage of the child, who carries through its entire life a burden of shame, while the man absolutely escapes the consequences of his own act and leaves the woman, innocent in many cases, overpersuaded, deceived, and betrayed, to bear the burden of the unlawful act. My view of this—and I submit it to the sober judgment of the House—is that the word "instrument" used in a strictly legal sense is that character of instrument which must be acknowledged before an officer of the law, as a deed, a will, a mortgage, or anything of that kind. In support of that contention I quote from Bouvier's Law Dictionary:

An instrument is a writing which contains some agreement and is so called because it has been prepared as a memorial of what has taken place or been agreed upon. It includes bills, bonds, leases, mortgages, and wills, but scarcely ordinary letters or memoranda.

A man has gone into the service. He leaves behind him a woman and a child, born without the bonds of wedlock. He writes a letter and says to the woman, "This is my child and I acknowledge it." Under my amendment, the woman can take that document with the proper proof to the War Risk Bureau and, under proper regulations, protect herself and secure the insurance for the child, whereas if she has to wait until the man goes before a notary public and makes oath, she will never secure the benefit of the insurance. My amendment strikes out that provision which requires an instrument of the character before described. It is true that there might be an attempt at blackmail, but where there is one instance of blackmail by reason of an attempt to foist a child upon a man there are hundreds of cases of betrayed women. I think for that reason this amendment ought to be liberalized so as to protect the innocent. It were much better to work an injustice in one instance than to leave the large number of women to carry their burden without recompense from the man who secured this benefit from the Government.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEE. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. As I understand the gentleman's amendment, it will simply make clearer the intention of the committee as has been stated by some of its members to-day?

Mr. BEE. Yes; what is meant by an instrument. If it does not mean a duly acknowledged paper, if it is simply an acknowledgment without form of law prescribed for acknowledgment, it ought not to be in there, because it operates as a limitation. What I want to do is to protect the innocent from wrong committed, and I submit the amendment to the judgment of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment of Mr. BEE.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what the gentleman from Iowa thinks, but——

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that it should be so amended. It seems to me that this would shift the whole burden of determining as to whether a child was illegitimate to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance under rules and regulations to be adopted by it. The provision we have here is simply that the War Risk Insurance Bureau shall pass upon a question of fact, and not to adopt rules and regulations for determining the question. It seems to me that the amendment should not be adopted.

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. RICKETTS. Does not the gentleman think there would not be one case in 10,000 where the putative father of an illegitimate child would ever acknowledge the paternity of that child by any instrument such as is contemplated by this language? There would hardly be a father in 10,000 that would make an acknowledgment of that kind.

Mr. SWEET. I believe that the gentleman who is proposing the amendment is placing a wrong construction on the word "instrument."

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. The word "instrument," as it appears in line 13, would cover what? Would it cover a letter where a soldier had referred to an illegitimate child as his or must it have been acknowledged before a notary public.

Mr. SWEET. I do not understand that all instruments in writing have to be acknowledged, but a statement in writing signed by a man would, I believe, be construed by the War Risk Insurance Bureau as an instrument in writing.

Mr. RICKETTS. I think, if the gentleman will indulge me, that the amendment of the gentleman from Texas clarifies the whole section and removes all doubt as to what Congress intends. It seems to me that his amendment should be adopted.

Mr. BEE. If the text of the bill had said "by a statement in writing," it would have been satisfactory. The word "instrument" is what I object to.

Mr. SWEET. I would be perfectly willing to change the word "instrument" to the word "statement."

Mr. BEE. I have no pride of authorship.

Mr. SWEET. My main objection in this instance is to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance adopting rules and regulations for the purpose of determining the question.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman would be willing to accept the amendment—I think I would personally—if the latter part of the gentleman's amendment is stricken out, I believe it would be satisfactory. Let it read—

If acknowledged in writing signed by him.

Mr. BEE. I have no objection to that modification.

Mr. SWEET. I would be willing to agree to the amendment provided the latter part of it is stricken out.

Mr. BEE. I have no objection to striking it out. I put it in more as a safeguard and protection against blackmailing. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by striking out the latter part—

Under rules and regulations prescribed by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I object. I believe these words should be left in for the protection of everybody.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment to strike out the last words of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. IGOE to the amendment offered by Mr. BEE: Strike out the language "under regulations prescribed by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that subdivision (d) may be read as it would read thus amended.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the section will be read as it would be amended if this amendment were adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

(d) An illegitimate child, but, as to the father only, if acknowledged in writing signed by him, or if he has been judicially ordered or decreed to contribute to such child's support.

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. Chairman, has not an amendment already been adopted to this section, offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD]. I ask that the section be read as it would be as amended by that section and if the amendment of the gentleman from Texas was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offered an amendment that was agreed to, and the gentleman from Texas offered an amendment, which is pending, to which an amendment is pending.

Mr. GARD. The Clerk did not read the amendment which I offered and which was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the section as amended by the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, as it would be if the amendment of the gentleman from Texas and the amendment to that amendment by the gentleman from Missouri were adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

(d) An illegitimate child, but, as to the father only, if acknowledged in writing signed by him, or if he has been judicially ordered or decreed to contribute to such child's support, or has been judicially decreed to be the putative father of such child.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the amendment of the gentleman from Texas as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That section 22 of the war-risk insurance act is hereby amended by inserting therein a new subdivision to be known as subdivision (4a) and to read as follows:

"(4a) The terms 'father' and 'mother' include stepfathers and stepmothers, fathers and mothers through adoption, and persons who have stood in loco parentis to a member of the military or naval forces for a period of not less than one year: Provided, That this subdivision shall be deemed to be in effect as of October 6, 1917."

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to express myself in favor of the amendment inserting a new division known as subdivision (4a). Many instances have been brought to my notice, not only in my district but throughout the country, where children have been adopted under the laws of Christianity but not under the laws of a State. Foster parents have clothed and fed these boys and educated them to be true American citizens. When they became of age and were drafted into the Army, they fought for the principles of our country and for the continuity of our Nation. They certainly should have had the privilege of naming those foster parents their beneficiaries, and it is our duty as Members of this Congress to see that their wishes are carried out and those named in loco parentis should certainly be recognized.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. I do.

Mr. RAMSEYER. This is a question in regard to the parents, or those standing in loco parentis. The provision is for a period of not less than one year. It was construed by one speaker, I understood, that it was the period of one year before the war. Now it does not occur to me that the language bears that construction. For instance, one of these men stood in loco parentis for the year 1917 and was inducted into the service in 1918 and was killed, why those parents should be entitled to whatever benefit this act gives other parents. What is the gentleman's opinion?

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. DEWALT. May I inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is he speaking to an amendment he proposed?

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. I have not introduced an amendment. I am only speaking in favor of this section. The gentleman from Iowa asked me a question which I thought probably the gentleman from Pennsylvania intended to answer.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman answer my question now?

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. I would state to an American soldier it would not make any difference whether he lived with his foster parents one year before the war or during the war if he wished them to be his beneficiaries. What difference would it make whether it was one year before or after the declaration of war, if he were under the care of his foster parents?

Mr. RAMSEYER. If the relation existed 1 year in the last 20 years and he was then disabled or killed during the war, his parents would be entitled to the benefits of this act?

Mr. HICKS. If the gentleman will permit, I will answer that by saying that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] cleared that point very thoroughly when he was speaking by saying that this meant any year of the soldier's life; not immediately preceding the war, but any year.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I was seeking an explanation of that.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. That is what I stated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I do this for the purpose of making further inquiry with reference to the phrase as it appears in this section, in loco parentis. This same question came up in the war-risk insurance amendments in the Sixty-fifth Congress, and there were amendments adopted by the House at that time which did not become law. There does not seem to be any very distinct or plain understanding of just what is covered by that phrase. I asked at that time the gentleman from Texas various questions about the legal definition of that phrase and exactly to whom it would apply. These explanations do not seem to be included here, and I think it would be quite desirable if members of the committee would give us a legal definition under which this application would be made at the present time and just who would be covered by the phrase as it appears in line 21 of this amendment. I would like to ask for some little more definite information.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I have here Bouvier's Law Dictionary, and the definition given there is: "In loco parentis: In the place of a parent; as, the master stands toward his apprentice in loco parentis." One who stands in the place of a parent—in the relation of a parent.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman allow me to inquire still further whether he would consider that it would be necessary to have a court procedure recognize this relation between the soldier and anyone with whom he may have lived?

Mr. SWEET. No, sir.

Mr. TREADWAY. It is simply recognition on the part of a person that he or she has taken over the young person and made a home for him.

Mr. SWEET. It is a relationship that exists as a fact between them.

Mr. TREADWAY. And not recognition through the courts?

Mr. SWEET. That is true.

Mr. TREADWAY. I thank you.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. ROGERS. Along the line of the inquiry of my colleague I desire to read from the first volume of Words and Phrases, which defines through the medium of judicial decision the meaning of the phrase "in loco parentis." I read from the decision of the Supreme Court of Maryland in the case of Von der Horst against Von der Horst:

> The proper definition of a person "in loco parentis" to a child is a person who means to put himself in the situation of a lawful father to the child, with reference to the office and duty of making provision for the child, or, as defined by Sir William Grant, M. R., it is "a person assuming the parental character and discharging parental duties."
> The mere fact that a legacy has been given by a grandfather to his grandchild does not create the relation; there must be some indication in some form of an intention to establish it; it is a question of intention. (Von der Horst v. Von der Horst (Md.), 41 Atl., 124, 126.)
> A husband is not bound to accept into his family the children of his wife by a former husband, but if he does so voluntarily, so long as the relation is permitted to continue, he assumes the duties and obligations of a parent, so that it is said that a person "in loco parentis" means a person taking upon himself the duty of a father to make provision for the child. (Capek v. Kropik, 21 N. E., 836, 837; 129 Ill., 509.)

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that those definitions which I have just read are very much more satisfactory for our purpose than the definition which was read by the chairman of the subcommittee from Bouvier's Law Dictionary. There is no question whatever that this language as it stands is so general as to be exceedingly dangerous. You can conceive of a case where 20 successive persons might claim that they had stood in loco parentis in the case of a given soldier. Take an unfortunate child who had gone from foundling asylum to foundling asylum for some years, staying in each one for at least one year. Each one of the superintendents or custodians of that child during its progress through those foundling asylums might claim that a special relationship had existed between him and the child. While that may not appeal to us as a very probable situation, nevertheless where there is a chance to get money from the Government we are extremely likely to have all sorts of claims set forth as a basis for the extraction of money from the Government. I have given a good deal of thought in an effort to safeguard this language and at the same time not defeat the very obvious and proper purpose to which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] alluded. I am frank to say that I can not see how the language can be safeguarded. But I do think that in turning this question of definition, as we are, over to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance we ought in the course of this debate to indicate that in the use of the phrase "in loco parentis" we are using it in the strict legal sense and not in a loose, vague, and elusive sense, in which perhaps it would be used in ordinary conversation.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Under the language as contained in this bill would it not be possible for parties who had taken the child out of an asylum and kept him until bad treatment drove him away at, say, 14 years of age—nearly 10 years ago—to come under this law and claim its benefits?

Mr. ROGERS. It would be purely a question of definition by a War Risk official as to whether the "in loco parentis" status had been established. The case suggested by the gentleman from Texas, it seems to me, emphasizes the importance of what I have been trying to point out, namely, that we must make certain, if we can, that in a given case there shall be established the intention of the person to put himself in the situation of a lawful father to the child.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I suggested some doubt as to the appropriateness of this language, but on reflection I think the language ought to stay as it is. There are two safeguards as the language now stands. In the first place, there must be a designation by the soldier himself of the person whom he believes to have stood in the relation of parent to him.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more in order to permit the gentleman from Maine to complete his statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. As I say, in the first place there is a safeguard in the fact that the soldier himself must designate a person whom he believes to stand in this relationship to him, and there is the further safeguard that the department in passing on the question as to whether this is a proper designation or not must apply the legal definition of loco parentis to the designation already made by the soldier. It seems to me that properly safeguards it.

Mr. ROGERS. Bearing on the gentleman's first suggestion, take the case of a person claiming to be in loco parentis and seeking compensation because of that. I take it that there will be no designation of the soldier in that case. The person claiming to be in loco parentis could claim it without any intervention from the soldier, for the reason that the soldier would be already dead. It seems to me that the gentleman's suggestion has no value in compensation cases. So far as the second point is concerned, I am entirely in agreement with him. It is fundamental that the strict legal definition of this phrase should be applied. I think we are going to see a tendency to try to have the bars let down by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance in defining this particular phrase. To me it is of great importance that Congress should emphasize that it regards the phrase as meaning what the law writers and what the judges say it means and not what popular usage may indicate.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS] is recognized in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, line 21, after the word "parentis," to insert the words "or as foster parent."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. HULINGS: Page 2, line 21, after the word "parentis," insert "or as foster parent."

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the insertion of those words will clear up any doubt. The words "in loco parentis," I understand, have a limited legal restricted sense in law. The suggestion that there might be a great many foster parents, or persons in the relation of parents, I do not think is significant at all, for this reason——

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. HULINGS. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Does not the gentleman think that the language on line 20, "fathers and mothers through adoption," is the same as the language "foster parent"?

Mr. HULINGS. I do not think so, for the reason that those words, "by adoption," may signify by legal process, that a child has been legally adopted. But a foster parent is a person who has stood in the relation of parent, not through any legal adoption or the action of any court. Now, you say this law——

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to his colleague?

Mr. HULINGS. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. DEWALT. Have the words "foster parent" any legal interpretation anywhere?

Mr. HULINGS. I do not know that they have.

Mr. DEWALT. Is it not a fact that the term "foster parent" and the relation as established under that term is largely a matter of custom which differs in different localities?

Mr. HULINGS. I think so; yes, sir.

Mr. DEWALT. If that be true, then, is there not a great deal of danger in inserting the words "foster parent"?

Mr. HULINGS. Not at all, for this reason: The soldier has the right to choose the beneficiary. It may be under the act a father or mother, a brother or sister; but "foster parent" was left out. I know some cases where the soldier has designated his foster mother as a beneficiary. That has been thrown out by the department, because he was not authorized to make any such designation. Now, if you introduce this language here and give that soldier the right to designate, he is not going to designate half a dozen parents. He may have a dozen foster parents, if you choose, but he has got the right to designate which one of them shall be the beneficiary.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. HULINGS. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. Would you not stand in great danger of having foster parents determined by different customs in different localities? For instance, in Ireland they have foster parents when they actually have their own parents. I suppose the gentleman knows that.

Mr. HULINGS. Well, suppose that is true, and suppose the soldier had half a dozen foster parents. The time comes for him to designate who shall be the beneficiary. This act is simply to give him the right to designate who the beneficiary shall be, and if he does not designate a beneficiary that is within the class he has no right under that insurance; that is, the named beneficiary has no right to that insurance.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULINGS. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to the fact that this is not only applicable to the insurance feature, but also is applicable to the allotment and allowance features, so that a foster parent under the gentleman's amendment might claim the Government allowance in addition to the allotment that the foster son might make to the foster parent.

Mr. HULINGS. That might be.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. ESCH rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin, chairman of the committee, is recognized.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words in regard to the propriety of inserting the words "foster parent." Those words were used in the bill which passed the House in the Sixty-fifth Congress. When the bill reached the Senate, the Senate conferees unanimously objected to the use of the words. The Senate conferees were Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi, Mr. SMITH of Georgia, and Mr. SMOOT of Utah. The two Senators, WILLIAMS and SMITH, opposed the use of the words "foster parents" because they believed it might open the doors of the Treasury and might lead to fraud, the charge being that there might be lax family relationships or lax vital statistics or records in many sections that would make it impossible for the War Risk Insurance Bureau to follow up the matter and demonstrate the true relationship. Senator SMOOT, of Utah, joined these two Senators by saying that like objections would arise in the Western and Mountain States as to the Indians. There are 7,000 Indians that were enlisted in this war. Many of them have no family relationships. They have tribal relationships. If you open this up by the use of the language suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS], it may lead to possible frauds on the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, may I offer an amendment that is purely corrective? I call the gentleman's attention to it because I think it should be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Page 2, line 19, after the word "mother," strike out "include stepfathers and stepmothers."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, the reason I do that is that in the original act as it exists to-day subdivision 4 defines a parent to include "father and mother and stepfather and stepmother."

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; that is exactly it. We are defining "father" and "mother" and not "parent." "Parent" includes "father and mother." Here we are defining "father" and "mother."

Mr. GARD. What is the object in doing that?

Mr. RAYBURN. So as to include "loco parentis."

Mr. GARD. The old definition determined "parent" as including "father" and "mother" and "grandfather" and "grandmother."

Mr. RAYBURN. I know; but we have not defined "father" and "mother."

Mr. GARD. Does the gentleman think that is necessary?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. GARD. I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONNALLY: Page 2, line 22, after the word "forces," insert "at any time prior to his enlistment or induction."

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered to line 22, page 2, in order to make it entirely clear that the relationship of "in loco parentis" should have continued at least a year prior to the soldier's or sailor's induction into the military or naval forces of the United States. I perhaps would not have been interested in this except that two very prominent and able members of the committee differed as to the construction of this section. It seems to me this language will make it entirely clear that the relationship must have existed prior to the induction or enlistment of the soldier.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Is it the gentleman's idea that if this relationship existed 10 or 15 years ago and then terminated and the soldier ceased to recognize that relationship, still the money should be paid?

Mr. CONNALLY. In a case where there is no blood relationship the relationship of "in loco parentis" may have existed while the boy was a youth. He may have become 21 years of age and gone out into the world for himself, yet he should have the right in designating a beneficiary to designate the aunt or other person who is not even related to him if, as a matter of fact, she was for the period of one year at any time in the relationship of "in loco parentis" to him.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I do not know that I caught the gentleman's amendment exactly. It seems to me that if it is intended to mean that the relationship of loco parentis must have immediately preceded the soldier's enlistment——

Mr. CONNALLY. That is not the intention.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Then will the gentleman explain just what his amendment is?

Mr. CONNALLY. My amendment provides that anyone who at any time prior to the soldier's enlistment occupied the position of loco parentis for as long as one year shall be eligible to be designated as a beneficiary.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Is the designation necessary?

Mr. CONNALLY. To be sure. Of course the soldier has to designate the beneficiary, but under the present law he has not the privilege of designating some one who stood "in loco parentis," as I understand it.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Suppose the soldier is dead?

Mr. RUCKER. His insurance policy shows for whom he meant it.

Mr. CONNALLY. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] is correct. I will say for the benefit of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] that in some of the cases an attempt has been made to designate a foster parent, or some one who was in the relationship of "in loco parentis." The designation has already been made, but under the present law payment can not be made to such beneficiary unless the amendment proposed in this bill is adopted, making it legal.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I may have misunderstood the bill, but I thought this was for the benefit of parents who had not been designated.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, no; I do not so understand it. I do not think the committee has any objection to this amendment.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. If two or three persons have stood in the relationship of in loco parentis, would it not be better to insert in the bill a provision for designating the person who last stood in that relationship?

Mr. CONNALLY. No; I think in that case the soldier is the one who should have the right of designating which one of the persons who had stood "in loco parentis" should get the insurance.

Mr. STEVENSON. In the case of the allotment allowance the soldier does not designate, but it is automatic and involuntary.

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Does the gentleman propose to make that reach back to a case where a person was in loco parentis to a boy 10 years before the war?

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman from South Carolina overlooks the fact that only allotments to wives and children are compulsory, and the soldier must designate the beneficiary, where that beneficiary is in loco parentis.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the gentleman for making that statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARD. I offer a substitute for the gentleman's amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Texas. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD as a substitute for the amendment of Mr. CONNALLY: Page 2, line 21, after the word "parentis," insert "before his enlistment or induction in the military or naval forces."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were 15 ayes and 43 noes.

So the amendment by way of substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. Let us be entirely sure as to what we are about to do before we do it. In the original provision in this section we find that the terms father and mother include stepfathers and stepmothers, fathers and mothers through adoption, and persons who have stood in loco parentis to the member of the military or naval forces for a period of not less than one year.

Mr. RICKETTS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. RICKETTS. I would like to know when that one year begins.

Mr. DEWALT. That is what I am getting at. If this provision is to be strictly construed in favor of the party who made the contract of insurance, to wit, the insurance company, and for the purposes of this argument we must take the Government as the insurance company, it would be construed to mean one year previous to the time designated, for a period of not less than one year previous to his induction or enlistment.

What we propose to do by this amendment is this: We now propose to say that it shall not be confined to a year previous to his induction or enlistment in the service, but that one year shall be one year at any time previous to his induction, to wit, the establishment of that relation may have been 15 or 20 years prior to that time.

Mr. RICKETTS. What would the gentleman say to an amendment in line 23 by striking out the colon and inserting a comma and this language, "prior to his induction into said service"? Does not that clarify the situation?

Mr. DEWALT. No; it resolves itself into this concrete proposition and this only, Does the House desire to confine this period to one year prior to the date of the induction and enlistment, or does it desire to leave that one year period indefinite and make it any one year during the lifetime of the enlisted man? This is the clear proposition. Suppose the enlisted man is 35 years of age. Suppose he went into the Army and prior to that time—20 or 25 years ago—there was a party who had stood in that relation or had assumed the obligation and responsibilities of loco parentis to this young man. Suppose for some reason best known to the parties themselves there was a change in that relationship. In other words, the party who stood in relation of a parent to him had gone out of the country and the young man had gone somewhere else, perhaps to an orphan asylum, 25 years before the young man ever went into the Army. The relation had ceased to exist. The responsibilities had not continued and had ceased to exist when the boy was 5 years of age. By your amendment you give the privilege to the enlisted man to designate anybody who has at any time assumed that relationship to him, and you open the door so wide that you give him the privilege of saying that anyone occupying that relation at any time, however long ago it may have been dissolved, however long ago it may have ceased to continue, to have the right to designate that person, and I say it is not an equitable proposition for the Government.

Mr. DAVEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. DAVEY. Suppose in the case the gentleman has just stated the relation existed from the age of 10 years to 21 years and then the obligation ceased. The boy went away into some other locality but still maintained his affection for the man or woman who stood in that relation to him. Does not the gentleman think he might designate that party?

Mr. WALSH. I do not agree with the gentleman's premises.

Mr. DAVEY. I have a case exactly in that condition.

Mr. DEWALT. My friend will agree in saying that the mere fact that the young man became 21 years of age does not determine the question of loco parentis. The man may be in the place of a parent to an individual over 21 years of age.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] just now is based on the proposition that you construe this language most strongly in favor of the Government, strictly in its favor, it being the insurer. The rule, in so far as I am conversant with it, is that you always construe it most strongly against the insurer. That is the universal rule of construction, so far as I know. You take the language as it stands to-day and you construe it in that way, and it can reach back to the birth of the enlisted man. As it reads it is:

And persons who have stood in loco parentis to a member of the military or naval forces for a period of not less than one year.

That means when you construe it most strongly against the Government—and that is the rule as to all insurance contracts—that they have stood in that relationship for a year any time before enlistment, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] merely emphasizes that proposition and does not add anything to it at all except emphasis.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that there is nothing in the section (4a) that prescribes that it must be before enlistment.

Mr. STEVENSON. That is the only useful function of the amendment which the gentleman has offered.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is the object of the amendment.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman offers an amendment which does make it occur prior to enlistment, and it is useful to that extent.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is its only object.

Mr. STEVENSON. But it does not add anything to the reach backward.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is the only object of my amendment.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Does not the proviso at the end of the subsection make it reach back beyond enlistment?

Mr. STEVENSON. I have been trying to understand the meaning of the proviso; but, as I understand it, that means this, that a man who entered at any time after the adoption of the war-risk insurance act should have the right to have the beneficiaries specified in this section, and that it does not mean that it must have occurred prior to that time.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. Would not the purpose be carried out by providing after the word "year," in line 23, the words "next preceding the date of enlistment or induction into the service"?

Mr. STEVENSON. That would carry out the idea of the committee as expressed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT].

Mr. BRIGGS. Is there anything now in this act by which it could be construed to mean any such thing as that.

Mr. STEVENSON. No; there is nothing in it now, as I have emphasized, that fixes any period at which this relation of loco parentis must have existed prior to enlistment, not even prior to enlistment, and, therefore, the amendment as suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BRIGGS] or the amendment suggested by the other gentleman from Texas [Mr.

CONNALLY] would necessarily limit it to a period prior to enlistment, or a period immediately prior to enlistment.

Mr. BRIGGS. Is not the purpose of the proviso here to correct a condition where a soldier has attempted heretofore to designate the person, and when the law did not give any authority for it, and this simply makes it retroactive—it validates that action.

Mr. STEVENSON. I understand it to be a provision to correct these difficulties and to open the door, so that all men can have that privilege.

Mr. BRIGGS. There are two such cases in my own district, where a soldier has designated his foster parents, where the soldier has died, and they are unable to collect the insurance.

Mr. RICKETTS. Does not the gentleman think that the proviso there fixes the time? It reads:

Provided, That this subdivision shall be deemed to be in effect as of October 6, 1917.

Does not the gentleman think this one year carries the date back from that date?

Mr. STEVENSON. It means that it may do so, and it means that a man who entered the service prior to or at that time, who at that time recognized the relationship, has a right to have these payments made in accordance with that recognition and designation made at that time but ineffective for want of this clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto be closed——

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I do not yield for that purpose.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I want 10 minutes.

Mr. ESCH. In 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California has already been recognized and refuses to yield for the purpose of that motion.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I understand the purpose of this amendment is this: There are young men who are in the service who have been treated by men and women as their children; stood in the relation of father and mother or mother or father.

They have taken care of them and provided for them. They have furnished them with schooling—in fact, assumed the rôle and relation of parent. The boy entering the service knew no other except this man or this woman as his father and his mother, because he supposed, by virtue of their care and treatment for many years he was in fact adopted—not legally, but that he was to be cared for. The question now is, not a year before his induction into the service but at any time, because it is very evident that some of these men were 25 years of age, some were 30, some were 23 or 24. The time they received their care and attention was when they were from 5 to 13, 14, and 15 years of age, sometimes running on to 19 or 20 years, when they were treated as the children of these people. The boy then went off to business or got married, as the case might be, and he would return to his foster parents for love and affection; but that relation created from his childhood was still with him, and he said when he entered the service that any benefit by virtue of his death, in the way of insurance, should go to that lady or to that gentleman. Now, that is the purpose of this bill. To defeat it would be to say the year before enlistment, or 2 years or 5 years or 10 years, for having stood in relation of parent to any of these men who entered the service one, two, or three, or five years, giving him love, giving subsistence, giving clothing and advice, and looking after him as a father and a mother should look after a child; and there are hundreds of cases where, if there should be an amount due as an allowance or claim, these foster parents should receive that money. I understand that that is the purpose of this amendment. It means that they must have held that relation for one year at any time during the boy's existence while they were acting as a parent; otherwise it would be very detrimental legislation.

I think the construction placed upon it by gentlemen is clear, but the amendment of the gentleman from Texas clarifies it so that there can be no possible question in regard to the proposed amendment. Why, there are many cases under the common law where a boy has been taken in a home and told, "We will make you our child; we will take care of you; we will provide for you." They have done so. Even the courts, not only in our State but in many States, upon the death of the parents, has directed that all the property, although a will has been made directing its disposition otherwise, if there has been no subsequent marriage, be conveyed to this child. And yet there is no legal adoption. There are cases of that kind when people realize that that can be done and has been done, and this Congress is to carry out what has been done repeatedly by the court in directing that property be conveyed to the child after the death of the parents when he has lived with them, has treated them as his parents, and they have treated him as their child and the legal formalities have been avoided or neglected. This ought to be amended as the gentleman suggests it ought to be. This amendment and the general purposes of this bill will give proper relief and correct many just cases so they can be paid.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I will.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. The terms of the act now read:

Who have stood in loco parentis to a member of the military or naval forces for a period of not less than one year.

Mr. RAKER. That is all right; it should not be in the future.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. That is in the past tense, is it not?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. It is tautological if you say before enlistment——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 70, noes 10.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KEARNS. Would it be a parliamentary inquiry for me to ask this question? The gentleman from Texas has on all occasions this afternoon asked for a division of the House——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. There is nothing before the committee.

Mr. KEARNS. And the Chair announces that a certain number of gentlemen voting when probably not half of the Members present have voted.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, well, if the gentleman is going to continue to camouflage, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Texas rise?

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present, so that we will get an actual count of everybody here.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and eleven gentlemen are present, a quorum. [Applause.]

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, the Chair's count would establish the veracity of the statement made by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BLANTON. I only wished to show that there were less than——

The CHAIRMAN. There is nothing before the committee.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from California. I am opposed to striking out even two words. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of the provisions of this bill as well as the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

I think that this matter should be cleared up, and I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas helps to accomplish that result. The provision of the bill under discussion certainly ought to be adopted, because throughout this country there are many deserving and meritorious cases which ought to be taken care of by just such a provision as is here proposed.

I know of a case myself where a boy was taken into a family when he was only 8 months old. He entered this family and grew up with the husband and wife, believing them his own father and mother, and in fact they were the only father and mother he really ever had, for he never knew any other; and when war came he volunteered when about 20 years old, did not wait to be drafted, but went into the service voluntarily, and crossed to the other side and made the supreme sacrifice upon the fields of France, and was buried in a lonely woods far from home, loved ones, and native land. In his application for insurance he designated that sweet name, "my mother," naming her in the application. When that noble, patriotic boy wrote those words, "my mother," in that application and paid each month out of his soldier's pay the premiums required, he believed this great rich Government would promptly pay that mother the $10,000 insurance which was issued to him, and this Government ought to and must pay it. [Applause.] Payment, however, in that case was denied by the War Risk Insurance Bureau because they contended, and rightfully contended, from the bare, naked legal and technical standpoint, that it could not pay that insurance because that boy had never been legally adopted; that is, he had never been adopted through the instrumentality of any order of court. His foster parents entered into an agreement of adoption with the orphans' home from which they secured the child. They signed what purported to be "articles of adoption" and the officers of the orphans' home signed them. They thought it was legal. The orphans' home thought it was legal. No one questioned or doubted it. They believed and the orphans' home believed the child had been legally adopted. When the question arose, when it was investigated, when the proof was offered in order to secure the payment of the insurance, it was shown that the adoption had not been accompanied by the necessary legal formalities, and hence the insurance has not up to date been paid. Certainly all cases like that one and similar to it happening throughout the country should be covered by the law so the insurance will be paid, and I am in favor of making the law broad enough so that these boys who were willing to go into the service of their country and fight beneath the flag and pay the supreme sacrifice on the field of honor should have their wishes carried out, and that those whom they have designated to receive their insurance should receive the benefit of it, for it has been purchased and paid for not only by the prompt payment of the premiums but also by the patriotic blood they shed in the defense of the country and to add new glory to our flag. [Applause.]

If the provision in this bill is not broad enough to cover such cases, let us here and now broaden it until its provisions will require the payment of all insurance taken out by these brave boys where they paid the premiums and made the noble, unselfish, and supreme sacrifice of their lives upon the sacred altar of their country. This Government can not afford to take their money in premiums and their patriotic blood and noble young lives on the "field of honor" and then deny their expressed wishes by refusing to pay their insurance. Let it be paid and thus show the gratitude and justice that this Government owes to every soldier who sacrificed his life. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. PELL. Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to ask the chairman of the committee why it is that there should be any limitations on the beneficiary? Why should not a man taking out insurance be able to designate anybody he sees fit? It might be a friend or person who had helped him, not really anyone in loco parentis, or any person that he really thought needed it.

I know of a case of a constituent of mine who took out this insurance and named the American Red Cross as the beneficiary. That organization, naturally, not standing in loco parentis or being any relation of his, was denied the money.

I can see no reason why any person who pays insurance should not be permitted to designate whom he wishes. I am asking this question merely for information.

Mr. SWEET. The object of the Rayburn Act was to give insurance to those who entered the military and naval service and to protect those who were dependent upon the soldiers. That was the whole thought of the original insurance act. In this particular act we increased the permitted class of beneficiaries. We have added uncles, aunts, nieces, and nephews, brothers-in-law and sisters-in-law, and endeavored in section 4a to so extend the insurance as to include those standing in loco parentis. For instance, where a young man has designated a certain person who has stood in the position of a parent and that relationship is shown, that person will get the money.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. EMERSON. Why did you insert one year? Why was that?

Mr. SWEET. That was inserted there to guard against fraud. In other words, if there was not some limitation put in there a young man just prior to entering the service might endeavor to establish that relation—not as a fact but as a pretext. So is it not plain that the relationship should exist for one year before a person should obtain the benefits of this act?

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. What was in the minds of the committee in putting that at one year? One year during the life of the boy or during or preceding the time of enlistment?

Mr. SWEET. One year during the life of the boy and prior to enlistment.

Mr. BRIGGS. Is it not a fact that the committee has found that there are a number of cases where the soldiers have designated certain persons like foster parents, and the War Risk Insurance Bureau has been unable to pay them, but is desirous to do it, although those boys were acknowledged by those people as their children, because they had no legal adoption papers, and they have been unable to carry out what was really the will of the soldier?

Mr. SWEET. Absolutely. And this provision is put in so that the intent of the soldier may be carried out as to those who have supported and maintained him?

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, before the Chair counts, could we have the amendment reported again?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the request for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. ESCH. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 48, noes 46.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. There is another amendment on the Clerk's desk, offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD], which the Clerk will report.

Mr. GARD. I ask that the amendment be reported. It is one which I think the chairman will accept.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GARD: Page 2, line 2, after the word "through," insert the word "legal."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 10 minutes on this section.

The CHAIRMAN. On the section just passed?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes; the section they have been considering.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for 10 minutes on the section just passed. Is there objection?

Mr. MERRITT. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That section 23 of the war-risk insurance act is hereby amended by the addition thereto of a new paragraph to read as follows:

"If any person entitled to receive payments under this act shall be an inmate of any asylum or hospital for the insane maintained by the United States, or by any of the several States or Territories of the United States, and no guardian or curator of the property of such person shall have been appointed by competent legal authority, the director, if satisfied after due investigation that any such person is mentally incompetent, may order that all moneys payable to him or her under this act shall be held in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of such person. All funds so held shall be disbursed under the order of the director and subject to his discretion, either to the chief executive officer of the asylum or hospital in which such person is an inmate, to be used by such officer for the maintenance and comfort of such inmate, subject to the duty to account to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and to repay any surplus at any time remaining in his hands in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the director; or to the wife (or dependent husband if the inmate is a woman), minor children, and dependent parents of such inmate, in such amounts as the director shall find necessary for their support and maintenance, in the order named; or, if at any time such inmate shall be found to be mentally competent, or shall die, or a guardian or curator of his or her estate be appointed, any balance remaining to the credit of such inmate shall be paid to such inmate, if competent, and otherwise to his or her guardian, curator, or personal representatives."

Mr. GARD, Mr. SWEET, and Mr. HUDDLESTON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] is recognized.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, it is evident that we can not complete the work on this bill to-day, and I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. It is understood by this procedure that the section will be subject to amendment when we meet again?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly; it will be subject to amendment. It has just been read for that purpose. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8778) to amend and modify the war-risk insurance act, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MEAD, until Thursday, September 11, on account of attending home coming of soldiers and sailors of city of Buffalo.

To Mr. MICHENER, indefinitely (at the request of Mr. CURRIE of Michigan), on account of death in his family.

STATEMENT AS TO VOTE.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I have a general pair with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PAIGE], who has been absent for several days on account of business. On yesterday on the roll call on the bill making permanent admirals of Rear Admiral Benson and Rear Admiral Sims I voted "yea" by inadvertence, forgetting that I had this pair. I am sure the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PAIGE] would have voted as I did, but as the RECORD shows I am paired with him I wish to withdraw my vote and be recorded as "present."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has made his statement. The Chair does not think the gentleman can withdraw his vote.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I made the statement because the yeas were 245 and the nays were 9. It would not change the result.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's statement can go in the RECORD.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARNER. May I ask the gentleman from Wyoming if he expects to go on with this bill to-morrow?

Mr. MONDELL. No. The Calendar for Wednesday will be taken up to-morrow, and this bill will be taken up on the day following.

TICKETS FOR PERSHING PARADE.

The SPEAKER. May the Chair state to the House, inasmuch as it has come to his attention and it is of interest to the Members, that he understands that tickets are to be provided for the Members of the House for the parade on the stand north of the Treasury next Wednesday.

Mr. MONDELL. Am I correct in my understanding that there are to be four tickets for each Member?

The SPEAKER. The Chair was so advised informally. He does not think the number has been quite definitely settled yet, though probably so.

Mr. BANKHEAD. A parliamentary inquiry. I would like to know how the Members are to get those tickets.

The SPEAKER. The Members are being notified through the Sergeant at Arms.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTIONS AND BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolutions and bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 2622. An act to provide necessary commissioned personnel for the Army until June 30, 1920.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the White House for the approval of the President the following bill:

H. R. 6808. An act to incorporate the American Legion.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 16 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Wednesday, September 10, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, September 10, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we desire to perform the duties of this day in Thy fear. Thou hast not left us in the dark concerning the way of peace and prosperity. Thou hast not left us alone in the discharge of our duties that pertain to the rights of men. Thou hast revealed to us Thy will, and the history of all men bears the unchanging will of God. Grant us to-day to know Thy way and have in our hearts the supreme desire to do the will of God. We ask it for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Monday, September 8, 1919, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a joint resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, ratifying the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women, which was ordered to be filed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, announced that the House had passed the bill (H. R. 6863) to regulate the height, area, and use of buildings in the District of Columbia and to create a zoning commission, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6810) to prohibit intoxicating beverages, and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. VOLSTEAD, Mr. MORGAN, and Mr. WEBB managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 2622. An act to appoint necessary commissioned personnel for the Army until June 30, 1920; and

S. J. Res. 100. Joint resolution making Wednesday, September 17, 1919, a legal holiday in the District of Columbia.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CURTIS presented a memorial of sundry Civil War veterans of the Neosho County Regiment, of Erie, Kans., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented resolutions adopted by Local Union No. 332, Iron Molders' Union, of Pittsburg, Kans., favoring the return to England of Miss Lillian Scott Troy, who was deported by the British Government, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Chanute, Kans., praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Lehigh, Kans., remonstrating against universal military training, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the Jewell Baptist Association, of Oak Creek, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the enforcement of prohibition, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ELKINS presented a petition of sundry citizens of Morgantown, W. Va., and a petition of sundry citizens of Sistersville, W. Va., praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of sundry citizens of Lynn, Mass., praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented telegrams in the nature of memorials from sundry citizens of Boston, Mass.; a memorial of the Democratic city committee of Somerville, Mass.; and a memorial of sundry citizens of Butler, Ind., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Captain Lester S. Wass Post, No. 3, American Legion, of Gloucester, Mass., praying for the restriction of immigration, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a petition of the St. John the Baptist Benefit Lithuanian Association, of Cambridge, Mass., praying for the independence of Lithuania, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CAPPER presented memorials of sundry citizens of Newton, Hillsboro, Syracuse, Moundridge, and McPherson, all in the State of Kansas, remonstrating against universal military training, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of Local Union No. 1926, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners, of Chanute, Kans., praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, as in open executive session I report from the Committee on Foreign Relations the treaty of peace with Germany. Senators will find a copy on their desks showing the amendments. I also present the report of the committee and the reservations reported by the committee. Each Senator will find on his desk a copy, with his name upon it, which contains the maps. He will also find his copy of the treaty containing the amendments. He will also find data on the German peace treaty prepared by Maj. Reuben Clark, formerly of the State Department, with cross references; also a provisional draft of the economic clauses by Mr. Baruch, who was at the head of the commission at Paris in charge of the drafting of economic clauses of the treaty. Senators will also find copies of the hearings held before the committee.

I am sorry to say that we have not sufficient copies of the report of the committee containing reservations, which is a leaflet of one page, and copies of the committee report, which will now, of course, be printed under the rule. I had copies printed beforehand, in order to supply the Senate to-day, but I am sorry that most of these have been exhausted. The doorkeepers, however, have some copies for any Senator who desires them. The others will be here in a few hours.

I ask unanimous consent that the minority may have permission to present the views of the minority, and I desire to give notice that I shall ask the Senate on Monday next to take up the treaty for action. I shall endeavor, after it is taken up, to keep it before the Senate until disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the permission requested for the minority to file views is granted.

Mr. LODGE subsequently said: Mr. President, I intended to ask that the report which I made this morning from the Committee on Foreign Relations and the report of the reservations also be printed in the RECORD. I do so now, and ask that they be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Senate Report No. 176, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session.]

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

"Mr. LODGE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, submitted the following report:

"The treaty of peace with Germany was laid before the Senate by the President on July 10, 1919. Three days were consumed in printing the treaty, which was in two languages and filled 537 quarto pages. The treaty, therefore, was not in the possession of the committee for action until July 14, 1919. The report upon the treaty was ordered by the committee on September 4. Deducting Sundays and a holiday, the treaty has been before the Committee on Foreign Relations for 45 days. The committee met on 37 of those working days, sitting whenever possible both in the morning and afternoon. The eight working days upon which the committee did not sit were lost, owing to unavoidable delays in securing the presence of witnesses summoned by the committee. In view of the fact that six months were consumed by the peace conference in making the treaty, in addition to a month of work by the various delegations before the assembling of the conference, the period of six weeks consumed by the committee in considering it does not seem excessive.

"These facts are mentioned because there has been more or less clamor about delay in the committee. This demand for speed in the consideration of the most important subject which ever came before the Senate of the United States, involving as it does fundamental changes in the character of our Government and the future of our country for an unlimited period, was largely the work of the administration and its newspaper organs, and was so far wholly artificial. Artificial also was the demand for haste disseminated by certain great banking firms which had a direct pecuniary interest in securing an early opportunity to reap the harvest which they expected from the adjustment of the financial obligations of the countries which had been engaged in the war. The third element in the agitation for haste was furnished by the unthinking outcry of many excellent people who desired early action and who for the most part had never read the treaty or never got beyond the words 'league of nations,' which they believed to mean the establishment of eternal peace. To yield helplessly to this clamor was impossible to those to whom was intrusted the performance of a solemn public duty.

"The responsibility of the Senate in regard to this treaty is equal to that of the Executive, who, although aided by a force of 1,300 assistants, expert and otherwise, consumed six months in making it, and the Senate and its Committee on Foreign Relations can not dispose of this momentous document with the light-hearted indifference desired by those who were pressing for hasty and thoughtless action upon it. The committee was also hampered by the impossibility of securing the full information to which they were entitled from those who had conducted the negotiations. The committee were compelled to get such imperfect information as they secured from press reports, by summoning before them some of the accessible experts who had helped to frame the complicated financial clauses, and certain outside witnesses. As an illustration in a small way of the difficulties in securing information, it may be stated that no provision had been made to supply the Senate with the maps accompanying the treaty, and it was necessary to send to Paris to procure them. The only documents of the many asked for by the committee which were furnished by the Executive were the American plan for the league of nations, submitted to the commission on the league covenant, and the composite draft made by experts of that commission.

"The treaties with Poland and with France as well as the Rhine protocol, all integral parts of the treaty with Germany, were obtained by the Senate, prior to their transmission by the President, from the documents laid before the House of Commons and the Chamber of Deputies early in July by the prime ministers of England and France. The records of the peace conference and of the conferences of the representatives of the five great powers were asked for by the committee and refused by the Executive. The committee had before them the Secretary of State, who was one of the American delegates and a signer of the treaty, and they also had the privilege of a meeting with the President at the White House which they had themselves requested. The testimony of the Secretary of State and the conversation of the committee with the President, published in the record of the committee hearings, have been laid before the country by the press, and it is not necessary to say anything further in regard to them, because the people themselves know how much information in regard to the treaty was received by the committee upon those two occasions.

"The character of the clamor for speedy action is well illustrated by the fact that it was directed solely against the Senate of the United States and its Committee on Foreign Relations. The treaty provides that it shall go into force when ratified by Germany and by three of the principal allied and associated powers, which are the United States, France, Great Britain, Italy, and Japan. Great Britain very naturally ratified at once, but no one of the other four has yet acted. Persons afflicted with inquiring minds have wondered not a little that the distressed mourners over delay in the Senate have not also aimed their criticism at the like shortcomings on the part of France, Italy, and Japan, an act of even-handed justice in faultfinding which they have hitherto failed to perform.

"Perhaps it is well also to note and to consider for a moment one of the reasons given for the demand for hasty action, which was to the effect that it was necessary to have prompt ratification in order to renew our trade with Germany, for even the most ardent advocate of unconsidered action was unable to urge that the channels of trade to the allied countries were not open. The emptiness of this particular plea for haste, now rather faded, is shown by the fact that we have been trading with Germany ever since the armistice. Between that event and the end of July we have exported to Germany goods valued at $11,270,624. In the month of June we exported more to Germany than we did to Spain. In July, by orders of the War Trade Board, the provisions of the trading-with-the-enemy act were set aside by the authorization of licenses to trade, and exports to Germany for the month of July amounted to $2,436,742, while those to Austria and Hungary were $1,016,518.

"It is an interesting fact that the exports in June to Germany, before the relaxation of the trading-with-the-enemy act, were much larger than after that relaxation, brought about by allowing licenses, was ordered, an indication of the undoubted truth that our trade with foreign countries is not affected by the treaty, but is governed by the necessarily reduced purchasing power of all countries in Europe engaged in the war. As a matter of fact, therefore, we are trading with Germany, and it is a mere delusion to say that we can not trade with Germany until the ratification of the treaty, because in order to do so we require a new treaty of amity and commerce and the reestablishment of our consular system in that country. The United States, following the usual custom, was represented in Germany by Spain, both in the consular and in the diplomatic service, after the outbreak of the war, and we can transact all the business we may desire through the good offices of Spanish consuls until a new consular treaty with Germany has been made.

"Before leaving this subject it may not be amiss to remark that Mr. Lloyd-George has recently made two important speeches expressing grave apprehensions as to the social and political unrest and the economic troubles now prevalent in England. He seems to have failed to point out, however, that the ratification of the covenant of the league of nations by Great Britain had relieved the situation which he had described. He was apparently equally remiss in omitting to suggest that prompt action by the Senate of the United States in adopting the covenant of the league of nations would immediately lower the price of beef.

"In reporting the treaty to the Senate for action the committee propose certain amendments to the text of the treaty and certain reservations to be attached to the resolution of ratification and made a part of that resolution when it is offered.

"In regard to the amendments generally it should be stated at the outset that nothing is more groundless than the sedulously cultivated and constantly expressed fear that textual amendments would require a summoning of the peace conference, and thereby cause great delay. There will be no necessity of summoning the peace conference, because it is in session now in Paris, with delegates fully representing all the signatory nations, as it has been for six months, and it seems likely to be in session for six months more. Textual amendments, if made by the Senate, can be considered in Paris at once, and the conference would be at least as usefully employed in that consideration as they now are in dividing and sharing southeastern Europe and Asia Minor, in handing the Greeks of Thrace over to our enemy, Bulgaria, and in trying to force upon the United States the control of Armenia, Anatolia, and Constantinople through the medium of a large American Army. Still more unimportant is the bugbear which has been put forward of the enormous difficulties which will be incurred in securing the adhesion of Germany. No great amount of time need be consumed in bringing German representatives to Paris. The journey is within the power of a moderate amount of human endurance, and it is also to be remembered that Germany is not a member of the league and need not be consulted in regard to the terms of the covenant. When Germany enters the league she will take it as she finds it.

AMENDMENTS.

"The first amendment offered by the committee relates to the league. It is proposed so to amend the text as to secure for the United States a vote in the assembly of the league equal to that of any other power. Great Britain now has under the name of the British Empire one vote in the council of the league. She has four additional votes in the assembly of the league for her self-governing dominions and colonies, which are most properly members of the league and signatories to the treaty. She also has the vote of India, which is neither a self-governing dominion nor a colony but merely a part of the Empire and which apparently was simply put in as a signatory and member of the league by the peace conference because Great Britain desired it. Great Britain also will control the votes of the Kingdom of Hejaz and of Persia. With these last two, of course, we have nothing to do. But if Great Britain has six votes in the league assembly no reason has occurred to the committee and no argument had been made to show why the United States should not have an equal number. If other countries like the present arrangement, that is not our affair; but the committee failed to see why the United States should have but one vote in the assembly of the league when the British Empire has six.

"Amendments 39 to 44, inclusive, transfer to China the German lease and rights, if they exist, in the Chinese Province of Shantung, which are given by the treaty to Japan. The majority of the committee were not willing to have their votes recorded at any stage in the proceedings in favor of the consummation of what they consider a great wrong. They can not assent to taking the property of a faithful ally and handing it over to another ally in fulfillment of a bargain made by other powers in a secret treaty. It is a record which they are not willing to present to their fellow citizens or leave behind them for the contemplation of their children.

"Amendment No. 2 is simply to provide that where a member of the league has self-governing dominions and colonies which are also members of the league the exclusion of the disputants under the league rules shall cover the aggregate vote of the member of the league and its self-governing dominions and parts of empire combined if any one of them is involved in the controversy.

"The remaining amendments, with a single exception, may be treated as one, for the purpose of all alike is to relieve the United States from having representatives on the commissions established by the league which deal with questions in which the United States has and can have no interest and in which the United States has evidently been inserted by design. The exception is amendment No. 45, which provides that the United States shall have a member of the reparation commission, but that such commissioner of the United States can not, except in the case of shipping, where the interests of the United States are directly involved, deal with or vote upon any other questions before that commission except under instructions from the Government of the United States.

RESERVATIONS.

"The committee proposes four reservations to be made a part of the resolution of ratification when it is offered. The committee reserves, of course, the right to offer other reservations if they shall so determine. The four reservations now presented are as follows:

"'1. The United States reserves to itself the unconditional right to withdraw from the league of nations upon the notice provided in article 1 of said treaty of peace with Germany.'

"The provision in the league covenant for withdrawal declares that any member may withdraw provided it has fulfilled all its international obligations and all its obligations under the covenant. There has been much dispute as to who would decide if the question of the fulfillment of obligations was raised, and it is very generally thought that this question would be settled by the council of the league of nations. The best that can be said about it is that the question of decision is clouded with doubt. On such a point as this there must be no doubt. The United States, which has never broken an international obligation, can not permit all its existing treaties to be reviewed and its conduct and honor questioned by other nations. The same may be said in regard to the fulfillment of the obligations to the league. It must be made perfectly clear that the United States alone is to determine as to the fulfillment of its obligations, and its right of withdrawal must therefore be unconditional, as provided in the reservation.

"'2. The United States declines to assume, under the provisions of article 10, or under any other article, any obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country, or to interfere in controversies between other nations, members of the league or not, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States in such controversies, or to adopt economic measures for the protection of any other country, whether a member of the league or not, against external aggression or for the purpose of coercing any other country, or for the purpose of intervention in the internal conflicts or other controversies which may arise in any other country, and no mandate shall be accepted by the United States under article 22, Part I, of the treaty of peace with Germany, except by action of the Congress of the United States.'

"This reservation is intended to meet the most vital objection to the league covenant as it stands. Under no circumstances must there be any legal or moral obligation upon the United States to enter into war or to send its Army and Navy abroad or without the unfettered action of Congress to impose economic boycotts on other countries. Under the Constitution of the United States the Congress alone has the power to declare war, and all bills to raise revenue or affecting the revenue in any way must originate in the House of Representatives, be passed by the Senate, and receive the signature of the President. These constitutional rights of Congress must not be impaired by any agreements such as are presented in this treaty, nor can any opportunity of charging the United States with bad faith be permitted. No American soldiers or sailors must be sent to fight in other lands at the bidding of a league of nations. American lives must not be sacrificed except by the will and command of the American people acting through their constitutional representatives in Congress.

"This reservation also covers the subject of mandates. According to the provisions of the covenant of the league, the acceptance of a mandate by any member is voluntary, but as to who shall have authority to refuse or to accept a mandate for any country the covenant of the league is silent. The decision as to accepting a mandate must rest exclusively within the control of the Congress of the United States as the reservation provides and must not be delegated, even by inference, to any personal agent or to any delegate or commissioner.

"'3. The United States reserves to itself exclusively the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction, and declares that all domestic and political questions relating to its affairs, including immigration, coastwise traffic, the tariff, commerce, and all other domestic questions, are solely within the jurisdiction of the United States and are not under this treaty submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or of the assembly of the league of nations, or to the decision or recommendation of any other power.'

"This reservation speaks for itself. It is not necessary to follow out here all tortuous windings, which to those who have followed them through the labyrinth disclose the fact that the league under certain conditions will have power to pass upon and decide questions of immigration and tariff, as well as the others mentioned in the reservation. It is believed by the committee that this reservation relieves the United States from any dangers or any obligations in this direction.

"The fourth and last reservation is as follows:

"'4. The United States declines to submit for arbitration or inquiry by the assembly or the council of the league of nations provided for in said treaty of peace any questions which in the judgment of the United States depend upon or relate to its long-established policy, commonly known as the Monroe doctrine; said doctrine is to be interpreted by the United States alone, and is hereby declared to be wholly outside the jurisdiction of said league of nations and entirely unaffected by any provision contained in the said treaty of peace with Germany.'

"The purpose of this reservation is clear. It is intended to preserve the Monroe doctrine from any interference or interpretation by foreign powers. As the Monroe doctrine has protected the United States, so, it is believed by the committee, will this reservation protect the Monroe doctrine from the destruction with which it is threatened by article 21 in the covenant of the league and leave it, where it has always been, within the sole and complete control of the United States.

"This covenant of the league of nations is an alliance and not a league, as is amply shown by the provisions of the treaty with Germany which vests all essential power in five great nations. Those same nations, the principal allied and associated powers, also dominate the league through the council.

"The committee believe that the league as it stands will breed wars instead of securing peace. They also believe that the covenant of the league demands sacrifices of American independence and sovereignty which would in no way promote the world's peace but which are fraught with the gravest dangers to the future safety and well-being of the United States. The amendments and reservations alike are governed by a single purpose, and that is to guard American rights and American sovereignty, the invasion of which would stimulate breaches of faith, encourage conflicts, and generate wars. The United States can serve the cause of peace best, as she has served it in the past, and do more to secure liberty and civilization throughout the world by proceeding along the paths she has always followed and by not permitting herself to be fettered by the dictates of other nations or immersed and entangled in all the broils and conflicts of Europe.

"We have heard it frequently said that the United States 'must' do this and do that in regard to this league of nations and the terms of the German peace. There is no 'must' about it. 'Must' is not a word to be used by foreign nations or domestic officials to the American people or their representatives. Equally unfitting is the attempt to frighten the unthinking by suggesting that if the Senate adopts amendments or reservations the United States may be excluded from the league. That is the one thing that certainly will not happen. The other nations know well that there is no threat of retaliation possible with the United States because we have asked nothing for ourselves and have received nothing. We seek no guaranties, no territory, no commercial benefits or advantages. The other nations will take us on our own terms, for without us their league is a wreck and all their gains from a victorious peace are imperiled. We exact nothing selfish for ourselves, but we insist that we shall be the judges, and the only judges, as to the preservation of our rights, our sovereignty, our safety, and our independence.

"At this moment the United States is free from any entanglements or obligations which legally or in the name of honor would compel her to do anything contrary to the dictates of conscience or to the freedom and the interests of the American people. This is the hour when we can say precisely what we will do and exactly what we will not do, and no man can ever question our good faith if we speak now. When we are once caught in the meshes of a treaty of alliance or a league of nations composed of 26 other powers our freedom of action is gone. To preserve American independence and American sovereignty and thereby best serve the welfare of mankind the committee propose these amendments and reservations."

[Senate Document No. 86, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session.]

DATA ON GERMAN PEACE TREATY.

DATA PRESENTED TO THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS, UNITED STATES SENATE, RELATING TO THE TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

[Prepared by Maj. J. Reuben Clark, jr., formerly Solicitor of the Department of State.]

Table of cessions, renouncements, grants, deliveries, releases, waivers, recognitions, obligations, and undertakings by Germany, and of compensation for and credits against the same, under the treaty of Versailles.

[NOTE 1. The "Principal Allied and Associated Powers" are the United States, France, Great Britain, Italy, and Japan. The "Allied and Associated Powers" are the foregoing powers and all other signatory of the Treaty, except Germany. The "High Contracting Parties" are all signatories of the Treaty. It is not clear who are designated as "Allies."

NOTE 2. The page references first given are to the two-language text (Senate Doc. 51, 66th Cong., 1st sess.). The italic page references are to the English text (Senate Doc. 49, 66th Cong., 1st sess.).

NOTE 3. The table below is designed to show side by side the property or rights given up by Germany, whether it be territory ceded or renounced, obligations assumed or acknowledged, rights renounced or abrogated, rights recognized, or property rights surrendered (placed in the left-hand column); and the credit, if any allowed, for such property on the general reparation account (placed in the right-hand column). As to items as to which it is expressly provided that credit shall be given, it is so stated in the right-hand column opposite the item. If it is expressly provided in the Treaty that no credit shall be given, this also is stated in that column. When the matter is doubtful, a question mark is placed in that column, after the entry. If no entry at all is made in the credit column, it means nothing has been found in the Treaty to indicate that any credit at all shall be given.

NOTE 4. Speaking broadly and generally the theory of the Treaty in the matter of the making up by Germany of damages and losses, appears to be this: Restitution shall be made of all Allied and Associated property taken by or coming into the possession of Germany since the war began, if the property is now in existence. In addition to this, reparation shall be made for property lost or destroyed and for civilian personal injuries caused by the war. The Reparation Commission is to make the adjustment for this, seemingly by making one bill against Germany covering everything and by then giving on this account credit for the assets turned over by Germany for which credit is to be allowed. No credit is allowed for the proportion of public debt assumed by cessionaries of territory.

NOTE 5. The Treaty also provides for the liquidation of all German property in Allied and Associated countries, and of the property of all nationals of such Powers in Germany, including the private securities held in Germany of companies of Allied and Associated Powers. All cash assets of such liquidation held by an Allied or Associated Power go to the payment of claims (in respect of property, rights, and interests) against Germany by the Powers' nationals, the balance, if retained by the Power, is to be paid to the Reparation Commission and credited on the reparation account.]

I. ELEMENTS AND PRINCIPLES OF GERMAN RESPONSIBILITIES AND LIABILITIES.

Property and rights given up and duties and obligations undertaken by Germany.	Credit allowed for same.
DAMAGES.
Germany accepts the responsibilities of Germany and her Allies for causing all the loss and damage to which the Allied and Associated Governments and their nationals have been subjected as a consequence of the war imposed upon them by the aggression of Germany and her Allies. (Art. 231, p. 249; p. 91.)
Germany undertakes that she will make compensation for all damage done to the civilian population of the Allied and Associated Powers and to their property during the period of the belligerency of each as an Allied or Associated Power against Germany by such aggression by land, by sea, and from the air. (Art. 232, p. 249; p. 91.)
The amount of such damage for which compensation shall be made is to be determined by the Reparation Commission and notified to Germany. (Art. 233, p. 251; p. 92.)
Compensation may be claimed from Germany for damages under following heads (Art. 244, Annex I, p. 259; p. 95):
(1) Damage to injured persons and to surviving dependents by personal injury to or death of civilians caused by acts of war, including bombardments or other attacks on land, on sea, or from the air, and all the direct consequences thereof, and of all operations of war by the two groups of belligerents wherever arising.
(2) Damage by Germany or her Allies caused to civilian victims by acts of cruelty, violence, or maltreatment (including injuries to life or health as a consequence of imprisonment, deportation, internment, or evacuation, of exposure at sea or of being forced to labor), wherever arising, and to the surviving dependents of such victims.
(3) Damage caused by Germany or her Allies, in their own territory or in occupied or invaded territory to civilian victims of all acts injurious to health or capacity to work or to honor, as well as to surviving dependents of such victims.
(4) Damage caused by any kind of maltreatment of prisoners of war.
(5) As damages caused to the peoples of the Allied and Associated Powers, all pensions and compensations in the nature of pensions to naval and military victims of war (including members of the air force), whether mutilated, wounded, sick, or invalided, and to the dependents of such victims, the amount due to the Allied and Associated Governments being calculated for each of them as being the capitalized cost of such pensions and compensation at the date of the coming into force of the present treaty on the basis of the scales in force in France at such date.
(6) The cost of assistance by the Governments of the Allied and Associated Powers to prisoners of war and to their families and dependents.
(7) Allowances by the Governments of the Allied and Associated Powers to the families and dependents of mobilized persons or persons serving with the forces, the amount due to them for each calendar year in which hostilities occurred being calculated for each Government on the basis of the average scale for such payments in force in France during that year.
(8) Damage caused to civilians by being forced by Germany or her allies to labor without just remuneration.
(9) Damage in respect of all property wherever situated belonging to any of the Allied or Associated States or their nationals, with the exception of naval and military works or materials, which have been carried off, seized, injured, or destroyed by the acts of Germany or her allies on land, on sea, or from the air, or damage directly in consequence of hostilities or of any operations of war.
(10) Damage in the form of levies, fines, and other similar exactions imposed by Germany or her Allies upon the civilian population.
"The measures which the Allied and Associated Powers shall have the right to take, in case of voluntary default by Germany, and which Germany agrees not to regard as acts of war, may include economic and financial prohibitions and reprisals and in general such other measures as the respective Governments may determine to be necessary in the circumstances." (Art. 244, Annex II, par. 18, p. 275; p. 101.)
Damage for repairing, reconstructing, and rebuilding property in the invaded and devastated districts, including reinstallation of furniture, machinery, and other equipment, will be calculated according to the cost at the dates when the work is done. (Art. 244, Annex II, par. 12 (e), p. 269; p. 99.)
Interest shall be debited to Germany as from May 1, 1921, in respect of her debt as determined by the Commission, after allowing for sums already covered by cash payments or their equivalent, or by bonds issued to the Commission, or under Article 243. The rate of interest shall be 5 per cent unless the Commission shall determine at some future time that circumstances justify a variation of this rate.
The Commission, in fixing on May 1, 1921, the total amount of the debt of Germany, may take account of interest due on sums arising out of the reparation of material damage as from November 11, 1918, up to May 1, 1921. (Art. 244, Annex II, par. 16, p. 273; p. 100.)
RESTITUTION.
Restitution in cash of cash taken away, seized, or sequestered; and restitution of animals, objects of every nature and securities taken away, seized, or sequestrated, in the cases in which it proves possible to identify them in territory belonging to Germany or her allies. (Art. 238, p. 255; p. 93.)	"The following shall be reckoned as credits to Germany in respect of her reparation obligations: "(a) Any final balance in favor of Germany under Section V (Alsace-Lorraine) of Part III (Political Clauses for Europe) and Sections III and IV of Part X (Economic Clauses) of the present treaty: "(b) Amounts due to Germany in respect of transfers under Section IV (Saar Basin) of Part III (political clauses for Europe), Part IX (financial clauses) and Part XII (ports, waterways, and railways); "(c) Amounts which in the judgment of the Reparation Commission should be credited to Germany on account of any other transfers under the present Treaty of property, rights, concessions, or other interests. "In no case, however, shall credit be given for property restored in accordance with Article 238 of the present part." (Art. 243, p. 257; p. 94.) Article 238 relates to the restitution of cash or the identical property taken from the Allied or Associated Powers. And see Article 250, p. 307, p. 112.
Germany undertakes to devote her economic resources directly to the physical restoration of the invaded areas of the Allied and Associated Powers to the extent that these Powers may determine (Art. 244, Annex IV, par. 1, p. 283; p. 104) and	Germany shall be given credit on the Reparation Account for the value as assessed by the Reparation Commission of material handed over under Article VII of the Armistice of November 11, 1918, and Article III of the Armistice Agreement of January 16, 1919, and for any other material handed over in accordance with the Armistice of November 11, 1918, and all subsequent Armistice Agreements, for which, as having nonmilitary value credit should, in the judgment of the Reparation Commission, be allowed to the German Government. (Article 250, p. 307; p. 112.)
	No credit on compensation account. (Art. 243, p. 257; p. 94; Art. 250, p. 307; p. 112.)
	"The value of the property transferred and any services rendered by her under these Annexes (Part VIII) assessed in to make direct application of Germany's economic resources to reparation as specified in Annexes III, IV, V, and VI (Part VIII, sec. 1) relating, respectively, to merchant shipping, to physical restoration, to coal and derivatives of coal, and to dyestuffs and other chemical products. (Art. 236, p. 253; p. 93.) Whatever part of the full amount of the proved claims is not paid in gold, or in ships, securities and commodities or otherwise, Germany shall be required, under such conditions as the Commission may determine, to cover by way of guarantee by an equivalent issue of bonds, obligations or otherwise, in order to constituto an acknowledgment of the said part of the debt. (Art. 244, Annex II, par. 12 (a), p. 267; p. 98.)	the manner therein prescribed, shall be credited to her (Germany) towards liquidation of her obligations under the above articles." (Art. 236, p. 253; p. 93.)

APPLICATION OF GERMAN ASSETS. PRIORITIES. "Subject to such exceptions as the Reparation Commission may approve, the first charge upon all the assets and revenues of the German Empire and its constituent states shall be the cost of reparation and all other costs arising under the present Treaty, or any treaties or agreements supplementary thereto or under arrangements concluded between Germany and the Allied and Associated Powers during the Armistice or its extensions. "Up to May 1, 1921, the German Government shall not export or dispose of, and shall forbid the export or disposal of, gold without the previous approval of the Allied and Associated Powers acting through the Reparation Commission." (Art. 248, p. 305; p. 111.) "The priority of charges established by Article 248 shall, subject to the qualifications made below, be as follows: "(a) The cost of the armies of occupation as defined under Article 249 during the Armistice and its extensions. "(b) The cost of any armies of occupation as defined under Article 249 after the coming into force of the present treaty. "(c) The cost of reparation arising out of the present treaty or any treaties or conventions supplementary thereto. "(d) The cost of all other obligations incumbent on Germany under the Armistice Conventions or under this Treaty or any treaties or conventions supplementary thereto. "The payment for such supplies of food and raw material for Germany and such other payments as may be judged by the Allied and Associated Powers to be essential to enable Germany to meet her obligations in respect of reparation will have priority to the extent and upon the conditions which have been or may be determined by the Governments of the said Powers." (Art. 251, pp. 307–309; p. 112.) The foregoing provisions do not affect the rights of the Allied and Associated Powers to dispose of enemy assets and property within their respective jurisdictions. (Art. 252, p. 309; p. 113.) "Nothing in the foregoing provisions shall prejudice in any manner charges or mortgages lawfully effected in favor of the Allied or Associated Powers or their nationals respectively, before the date at which a state of war existed between Germany and the Allied or Associated Power concerned, by the German Empire or its constituent states, or by German nationals, on assets in their ownership at that date." (Art 253, p. 309; p. 113.) The successive installments paid over by Germany in satisfaction of the claims will be divided by the Allied and Associated Governments in proportions which have been determined upon by them in advance on a basis of general equity and of the rights of each. (Art. 237, p. 253; p. 93.)
PROPERTY, RIGHTS, AND INTEREST. The Allied and Associated Powers reserve the right (subject to contrary stipulations in the Treaty) to retain and liquidate all property, rights, and interests belonging at the date of the coming into force of the present treaty to German nationals, or companies controlled by them, within their territories, colonies, possessions, and protectorates, including territories ceded to them by the present treaty. (Art. 297, p. 367; p. 134; and see also Art. 252, p. 309; p. 113.) This applies to industrial, literary, and artistic property dealt with under war legislation by the Allied and Associated Powers (Art. 298, Annex, par. 15, p. 385; p. 141), but rights of industrial, literary, and artistic property not so treated shall be restored, and rights which would have been established except for the war shall be recognized and established (Art. 306, pp. 415, 417; p. 152). The German owner shall not be able to dispose of such property, rights, or interests nor to subject them to any charge without the consent of that state. (Art. 297 (b), p. 367; p. 134.) Until the completion of the liquidation so provided for, the property, rights, and interests of German nationals will continue to be subject to exceptional war measures that have been or will be taken with regard to them. (Art. 298, Annex, par. 9, p. 381; p. 139.) The nationals of Allied and Associated Powers shall be entitled to compensation in respect of damage and injury inflicted upon their property, rights, or interests, including any company or association in which they are interested in German territory as it existed on August 1, 1914, by the application either of the exceptional war measures or measures of transfer mentioned in paragraphs 1 and 2 of the Annex hereto. This compensation shall be borne by Germany, and may be charged upon the property of German nationals within the territory of or under the control of the claimant's state, which property may be constituted as a pledge for enemy liabilities under the con-	Price or amount of compensation fixed in accordance with the methods of sale or valuation adopted by the laws of the country in which the property has been retained or liquidated. (Art. 297 (c), p. 367; p. 134.) No credit on compensation account for the product of the liquidation of the property covered by these sections, except in so far as concerns any final balance in favor of Germany under Article 243. (Art. 242, p. 257; p. 94.) Compensation shall be determined by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal provided for in Section VI or by an arbitrator appointed by that Tribunal. (Art. 297 (e), p. 369; p. 134; and see Art. 298, Annex, p. 4, p. 379; p. 138, opposite column below.)

ditions fixed by paragraph 4 of the Annex thereto. The payment of this compensation may be made by the Allied or Associated state, and the amount will be debited to Germany. (Art. 297 (e), p. 369; p. 134.)
All property rights and interests of German nationals within the territory of any Allied or Associated Powers and the net proceeds of their sale, liquidation, or other dealing therewith, may be charged by that Allied or Associated Power in the first place with payment of amounts due in respect of claims by the nationals of that Allied or Associated Power with regard to their property, rights, and interests, including companies and associations in which they are interested in German territory, or debts owing to them by German nationals, and with payment of claims growing out of acts committed by the German Government or by any German authorities since July 31, 1914, and before that Allied or Associated Power entered into the war. The amount of such claims may be assessed by an arbitrator appointed by Mr. Gustave Ador, or he being unwilling, by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal. They may be charged in the second place with payment of the amounts due in respect of claims by the nationals of such Allied or Associated Power with regard to their property, rights, and interests, within the territory of other enemy powers in so far as those claims are otherwise unsatisfied. (Art. 298, Annex, par. 4, p. 379; p. 138).
Each of the Allied and Associated Powers reserves the right to impose limitations on industrial, literary, or artistic property, acquired before or during the war, or hereafter, of a character deemed necessary by the Power for national defense or the public interest, or except as to rights hereafter acquired, as a coercive or preventative measure against Germany, or for securing performance of the obligations of the present Treaty. But these provisions shall not apply to properties dealt with under war measures. (Art. 306, p. 419; p. 152.) Rights lapsed on account of nonperformance of any formality because of the war shall be revived. (Art. 307, p. 421; p. 153.) Such revival to be subject to regulations of war time.
Rights of priority as to such property shall be extended. (Art. 308, p. 421; p. 153).
Any claim for compensation in respect of damage or injury to property, rights, or interests by the application of measures of transfer shall be satisfied by the restitution of the said property, if it still exists in specie (Art. 297 (f), p. 369; p. 135); but such right of restitution is reserved to owners who are nationals of Allied or Associated Powers within whose territory legislative measures prescribing the general liquidation of enemy property, rights, or interests were not applied before the signature of the Armistice. (id. (g) p. 371; p. 135.)
Up to the time when restitution is carried out under Article 297, Germany is responsible for the conservation of property, rights, and interests of the nationals of allied and associated powers, including companies and associations in which they are interested that have been subjected by her to exceptional war measures. (Art. 298, Annex, par. 6, p. 381; p. 139.)
All investments, wheresoever effected, with the cash assets of nationals of the High Contracting Parties, including companies and associations in which such nationals were interested, by persons responsible for the administration of enemy properties or having control over such administration, or by order of such persons or of any authority whatsoever shall be annulled. These cash assets shall be accounted for irrespective of any investment. (Art. 298, Annex, par. 12, p. 383; p. 140; Art. 306, p. 417; p. 151.)
Germany undertakes to transfer to any Power to which German territory in Europe is ceded and to any Power administering former German territory as a mandatory, under Article 22 of Part I (League of Nations) such portion of the reserves accumulated by the Government of the German Empire or of German states, or by public or private organizations under their control, as is attributable to the carrying on of social or state insurance in such territory, the funds transferred to be applied to the performance of obligations arising from such insurance. (Art. 312, p. 427; p. 155.)
Without prejudice to other announcements in the Treaty the Reparation Commission may within one year from the coming into force of the Treaty demand that the German Government shall become possessed of rights and interests of German nationals in any public utility, undertaking or in any concession, operating in Russia, China, Turkey, Austria, Hungary, and Bulgaria or in the possessions or dependencies of these states or in any territory formerly belonging to Germany or her allies, to be ceded by Germany or her allies to any power or to be administered by a mandatory under the present Treaty, and may require that the German Government transfer, within six months of the date of demand, all such rights and interests and any similar rights and interests the German Government may itself possess to the Reparation Commission. (Art. 260, p. 317; p. 116.) The provisions of this article apply in the case of all agreements concluded with German nationals for the construction or exploitation of German works in the German oversea possessions, as well as any sub-concessions or contracts resulting therefrom which may have been made to or with such nationals. (Art. 123, p. 171; p. 63.)	Credit given on reparation account for the value assessed by the Reparation Commission of the transferred rights. (Art. 260, p. 317; p. 116.)
WAIVER OF CLAIMS BY GERMANY.
To China and any Allied or Associated Government:
All claims arising out of the internment of German nationals in China and their repatriation, and all claims arising out of the capture and condemnation of German ships in China or the liquidation, sequestration, or control of German property rights and interests in that country since August 14, 1917. (Art. 133, p. 177; p. 65.) Rights of individuals are protected under Part X of the Treaty (id.).

I. ELEMENTS AND PRINCIPLES OF GERMAN RESPONSIBILITIES AND LIABILITIES—Continued.

Property and rights given up and duties and obligations undertaken by Germany.	Credit allowed for same.
To Siam: Germany waives all claims against the Siamese Government on behalf of herself and her nationals arising out of the seizures and condemnation of German ships, the liquidation of German property, or the internment of German nationals in Siam. (Art. 137, p. 179; p. 66.) Rights of individuals are protected under Part X of the Treaty (id.). To Allied and Associated Governments: Germany waives all claims of any description against the Allied and Associated Governments and their nationals in respect of the detention, employment, loss, or damage of any German ships or boats, exception being made of payments due in respect of the employment of ships in conformity with the Armistice Agreement of January 13, 1919, and subsequent agreements. Germany waives all claims to vessels or cargoes sunk by or in consequence of naval action and subsequently salved, in which any of the Allied or Associated Governments or their nationals may have any interest either as owner, charterer, insurer, or otherwise, notwithstanding any decree of condemnation which may have been made by a prize court of Germany or her allies. (Art. 244, Annex III, pars. 8–9, pp. 281–283; pp. 103–104.) No claims or indemnities which may result from the annulment of concessions, privileges, and favors of any kind granted since August 1, 1914, to Germany or to a German national by Russia or a state or government of which the territory formerly constituted a part of Russia, shall be charged against the Allied or Associated Powers or the powers or states, governments, or public authorities which are released from their engagements by the present article. (Art. 293, p. 345; p. 126.) Without prejudice to the provisions of the present treaty Germany undertakes not to put forward directly or indirectly against any allied or associated power signatory of the present Treaty, including those which, without having declared war, have broken off diplomatic relations with the German Empire, any pecuniary claims based on events which occurred at any time before the coming into force of the present Treaty. The present stipulation will bar completely and finally all claims of this nature, which will be thenceforward extinguished whoever may be the parties in interest. (Art. 439, p. 535; p. 193.) No claim shall be made or action brought by Germany or German nationals in respect of any industrial, literary, or artistic property used during the war by any Allied or Associated Power or the nationals thereof, nor in respect of any sale, offering for sale, or use of any products, articles, or apparatus whatsoever to which such rights applied. (Art. 236, p. 253; p. 93.) The material is to be purchased at a price which shall be the same as that at which they are sold to German nationals. (Art. 244, Annex V, par. 9, p. 295; p. 108.)
Per year, seven million tons for ten years, and in addition, for ten years, coal equal to the difference between the annual output of the mines of the Nord and Pas de Calais before the war and the output of these mines during the ten years period. In place of coal, metallurgical coke may be accepted in the proportions of 3 tons of coke to 4 tons of coal (Art. 244, Annex V, par. 7, p. 293; p. 107), total delivery not to exceed 20,000,000 tons per year for the first five years, and 8,000,000 tons in any one year of the succeeding five years. (Art. 244, Annex V, par. 2, p. 291; p. 106.)	Credit on reparation account. (Art. 236, p. 253; p. 93.) Coal to be purchased by France under stipulations as to price. (Art. 244, Annex V, par. 6, p. 293; p. 107.)
To Belgium: Eight million tons of coal (option covering) annually for ten years with same privileges as to exchanging coal for coke that control with France. (Art. 244, Annex V, par. 3, p. 291; p. 107.)	Same conditions that control supply of coal to France. (Supra.)
To Italy: Coal (option covering) in the following quantities: July 1919 to June 1920, four and one-half million tons. July 1920 to June 1921, six million tons. July 1921 to June 1922, seven and one-half million tons. July 1922 to June 1923, eight million tons. July 1923 to June 1924, and each of the following five years, eight and one-half million tons. Two-thirds of actual deliveries to be land borne. Coal may be replaced by coke as in case of France. (Art. 244, Annex V, par. 4, p. 291; p. 107.)	Same conditions that control supply of coal to France. (Supra.)
To Luxemburg: Coal (option covering) equal to the prewar annual consumption of German coal in Luxemburg, if Reparation Commission so directs. (Art. 244, Annex V, par. 5, p. 293; p. 107.) Coal may be replaced by coke as in the case of France. If Reparation Commission determines that full exercise of foregoing options would interfere unduly with industrial requirements of Germany, the commission is authorized to postpone or cancel deliveries, and in so doing to settle all questions of priority; but the coal to replace the coal from destroyed mines shall receive priority over other deliveries. (Art. 244, Annex V, par. 10, p. 295; p. 108.)	Same conditions that control supply of coal to France. (Supra).
To Reparation Commission: Dyestuffs and chemicals (option covering) as commission may designate, up to 50 per cent of the total stock of each and every kind in or under German control at date of coming into force of Treaty. "Dyestuffs and chemical drugs" includes all synthetic dyes and drugs and intermediate or other products used in connection with dyeing. This arrangement also includes cinchona bark and salts of quinine. (Art. 244, Annex VI, pars. 1 and 5, pp. 295–299; pp. 108–109.) Dyestuffs and chemical drugs each six months until January 1, 1925, up to an amount not exceeding 25 per cent of the German production of such dyestuffs and chemical drugs during the previous six months' period. (Id. par. 2, p. 297; p. 109.)	Credit on compensation account. (Art. 236; p. 253; p. 93.) Price fixed by Reparation Commission. (Art. 244, Annex VI, par. 3, p. 297; p. 109.)
To Allied and Associated Powers: Reconstruction materials (stones, bricks, refractory bricks, tiles, wood, window glass, steel, lime, cement, etc.), machinery, heating apparatus, furniture, and like articles of a commercial character which Powers desire to have produced and manufactured in Germany and delivered to them to permit of the restoration of invaded areas. (Art. 244, Annex IV, par. 2 (b), pp. 283, 285; p. 104.)	Credit on reparation account. (Arts. 236–237, p. 253; p. 93; Art. 244, Annex IV, par. 5, p. 287; p. 105.)
Animals, machinery, equipment, tools, and like articles of a commercial character now in Germany which Governments desire to replace animals and articles of the same nature that have been seized, consumed, or destroyed by Germany or destroyed in direct consequence of military operations. (Art. 244, Annex IV, par. 2 (a), p. 283; p. 104.)	Credit on reparation account. (Arts. 236, 237, p. 253; p. 93; Art. 244, Annex IV, par. 5–6, p. 289; p. 105.)

XV. GERMANY ACCEPTS THE FOLLOWING RESTRICTIONS, GRANTS THE FOLLOWING RIGHTS, AND MAKES THE FOLLOWING OBLIGATIONS AS TO HER EXTERNAL COMMERCE.

Property and rights given up and duties and obligations undertaken by Germany.	Credit allowed for same.

Duties, Charges, Prohibitions, and Restrictions Affecting Allied or Associated States:

Importations into Germany from any such states, from whatsoever place arriving, of goods, the product or manufacture of such states, shall not be subjected to other or higher duties, including internal charges, or to the maintenance or imposition of other prohibitions and restrictions, than those to which are subjected like goods the produce or manufacture of any other such state or of any other foreign country. (Art. 264, p. 321; p. 117.)

The same principles apply as to exports from Germany and her duties, charges, prohibitions, and restrictions, levied thereon by Germany. (Art. 266, p. 323; p. 117.)

Germany shall not, in administrative régime, make any discrimination against the commerce of any of the Allied and Associated States, as compared with any other of the said states or any other foreign country, even by indirect means. (Art. 265, p. 321; p. 117.)

RECIPROCITY TREATIES.

Every favor, immunity, or privilege in regard to the importation, exportation, or transit of goods granted by Germany to any Allied or Associated State or to any other foreign country whatever shall simultaneously and unconditionally without request and without compensation be extended to all the Allied and Associated States. (Art. 267, p. 323; p. 118.)

CUSTOMS PROVISIONS.

To France:

For five years, all natural or manufactured products which both originate in and come from Alsace-Lorraine shall be admitted into German customs territory free of all customs duty. The French Government shall fix the amount of such importations for each year, which shall not exceed annually the average amounts of 1911–1913.

For the same period, Germany shall allow free export from Germany and reimportation to Germany exempt from all customs duties and other charges (including internal charges), yarns, tissues, and other textile materials or textile products of any kind and in any condition sent from Germany into Alsace-Lorraine, to be subjected there to any finishing process, such as bleaching, dyeing, pointing, mercerization, gassing, twisting, or dressing. (Art. 268 (a), p. 323; p. 118; Art. 68, p. 193; p. 39.)

Germany shall establish no railway or canal tariff which directly or indirectly discriminate to the prejudice of the transport of the personnel or products of the Saar mines and their accessories or subsidiaries, or of the material necessary to their exploitation, all of which shall enjoy the rights and privileges which are guaranteed to similar products of French origin. (Art. 50, Annex, Chap. I, par. 6, p. 71; p. 27.)

French customs régime shall apply to the Saar Basin. (Art. 50, Annex, Chap. II, par. 31, p. 85; p. 32.)

Products which both originate in and pass from the basin into Germany shall for five years be free of import duties. (Id.)

To Poland:

For a period of three years, the same privileges as to natural or manufactured products from Poland that are granted to France in respect of Alsace-Lorraine (supra) with analogous limitations. (Art. 268 (b), p. 325; p. 118.)

To Luxemburg:

The Allied and Associated Powers reserve the right to require Germany to accord freedom from customs duty, on importation into German customs territory, to natural products and manufactured articles which both originate in and come from the Grand Duchy of Luxemburg, for five years, subject to certain prescribed limitations as to amounts. (Art. 268 (c), p. 325; p. 119.)

For first six months after Treaty comes into force, German duties on imports from Allied and Associated States shall not be higher than the most favorable duties which were applied to imports into Germany on July 31, 1914. For a further period of thirty months, this provision applies to products which comprised in section A of the First Category of the German Customs Tariff of December, enjoyed rates conventionalized by Treaty (on July 31, 1914) with the addition of all kinds of wine and vegetable oils, of artificial silk, and of washed or scoured wool. (Art. 269, pp. 325–327; p. 119.)

The Allied and Associated Powers reserve the right to apply to German territory occupied by their troops a special customs régime as regards imports and exports, in the event of such a measure being necessary in their opinion in order to safeguard the economic interests of the population of these territories. (Art. 270, p. 327; p. 119.)

To Morocco:

Moroccan goods entering Germany shall enjoy the treatment accorded to French goods. (Art. 146, p. 183; p. 68.)

To Egypt:

Egyptian goods entering Germany shall enjoy the treatment accorded to British goods. (Art. 154, p. 185; p. 69.)

SHIPPING.

Allied and Associated Powers:

Vessels of, entitled to treatment of most-favored nation, in German territorial waters, as regards sea fishing, maritime coasting trade, and maritime towage (Art. 271, p. 327; p. 119), and as to fishing boats all rights of inspection exercised solely by ships belonging to such Powers. (Art. 272, p. 327; p. 119.) These provisions are terminable in five years. (Art. 280, p. 333; p. 122.) New states without seacoast may have a merchant marine. (Art. 273, pp. 327-329; p. 120.) UNFAIR COMPETITION. Allied and Associated Powers: Goods of, to be protected from unfair competition by all legislative and administrative measures necessary, Germany to seize all fraudulently marked as to maker, origin, type, nature, or special characteristics (Art. 274, p. 329; p. 120), with special provisions relating to wines and spirits and their markings. (Art. 275, pp. 329-331; p. 120.) TREATMENT OF NATIONALS OF ALLIED OR ASSOCIATED POWERS. All measures relating to occupations, professions, trade, and industry must be equally applicable to all aliens and the same as enjoyed by the nationals of the most-favored nation; and all taxes, charges, and imposts direct or indirect, as to the property, rights, or interests of nationals or companies of such powers, and restrictions, must be those applied to German nationals and none other. (Art. 276, p. 331; p. 121.) Germany will recognize new nationalities acquired by her nationals under the laws of the Allied and Associated Powers. (Art. 278, p. 333; p. 121.) Germany will admit and permit to exercise their functions, consuls, appointed by the Allied or Associated Powers. (Art. 279, p. 333; p. 121.) Germany will extend to nationals of Allied and Asssociated Powers all rights and advantages of any kind which she has granted to nationals of Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria, or Turkey, by treaties, conventions, or arrangements concluded before August 1, 1914, so long as such treaties, etc., remain in force. (Art. 291, p. 345; p. 125.) Germany will give to Allied and Associated Powers the benefit ipso facto of the rights and advantages of any kind which she has granted by treaties, conventions, or arrangements to non-belligerent states or their nationals since August 1, 1914, until the coming into force of this Treaty, so long as such treaties, conventions, or arrangements remain in force. (Art. 294, p. 347; p. 126.)

XVI. GERMANY ACCEPTS THE FOLLOWING RESTRICTIONS ON HER CONTROL OF INLAND COMMERCE AND NAVIGATION, AND THE INSTRUMENTALITIES THEREOF.

FREEDOM OF TRANSIT. Germany grants freedom of transit, including crossing of territorial waters by rail, navigable waterways, or canal, to persons, goods, vessels, carriages, wagons, and mails coming from or going to the territories of any of the Allied or Associated Powers, without subjection to any transit duty or undue delay, and to national treatment as regards charges, facilities, and other matters, all charges imposed in traffic to be reasonable and not dependent directly or indirectly on ownership or nationality of the vessel or other vehicle. (Art. 321, p. 435; p. 157.) Goods in transit shall be exempt from all customs and other similar duties. (Art. 321, p. 435; p. 157.) Transmigration traffic across Germany is to be free and unimpeded. (Art. 322, p. 435; p. 158.) Importations and exportations: Germany will make no discrimination or preference, direct or indirect, in duties, charges, and prohibitions on goods or persons entering or leaving her territory on account either of origin or destination. (Art. 323, p. 437; p. 158.) Germany will not establish, as against the ports and vessels of any of the Allied and Associated Powers, any surtax or direct or indirect bounty for export or import by German vessels or ports, or by those of another Power, for example, by means of a combined tariff; and goods or persons passing through ports or by vessels of the Allied and Associated Powers shall be subject to no formality or delay other than is incident to such traffic on German vessels or through German ports. (Art. 323, p. 437; p. 158.) Germany shall take all necessary administrative and technical measures to expedite transmission and forwarding of Allied and Associated goods, particularly perishable goods, equally with any other goods similarly routed and carried. (Art. 324, p. 437; p. 158.) Seaports of the Allied and Associated Powers shall enjoy all favors and all reduced tariffs granted on German railways or navigable waterways for the benefit of German ports or the port of another Power. (Art. 325, p. 439; p. 159.) And Germany must participate in the tariffs or combinations of tariffs intended to secure for ports of any Allied or Associated Power advantages similar to those granted by Germany to her own ports or the ports of any other Power. (Art. 326, p. 439; p. 159.) Nationals, vessels, and property of Allied or Associated Powers shall, without impediment, enjoy in all German ports and on the inland navigation routes of Germany, national treatment in all respects, with complete freedom of access to all places in Germany, and with national treatment as to port and harbor facilities, including stationing, loading and unloading, duties, charges of tonnage, harbor, pilotage, lighthouse, quarantine and all analogous duties. Any preferential régime granted by Germany to any Power is immediately and unconditionally extended to all Allied and Associated Powers. (Art. 327, p. 441; p. 159.)

FREE ZONES.

Existing free zones in ports shall be maintained, and, with others to be established (Hamburg and Stettin, Art. 363, p. 469; p. 170), shall be subject to the Treaty régime. Goods entering or leaving such zones shall be subject to no import or export duty (except they leave the zone for consumption in the country where the zone is situated, or enter the zone for export, when the duties shall be the regular normal import or export duties Art. 330, p. 443; p. 160), except handling charges and specified statistical duty used for defraying the expenses of the port. (Art. 328, p. 441; p. 160.) All goods consumed in the zone shall be free of duty. (Art. 329, p. 443; p. 160.)

The foregoing stipulations and provisions are subject to revision at any time after five years by the Council of the League of Nations. Failing such revision, the privileges may be enjoyed only on a basis of reciprocity, unless the Council extends the period. (Art. 378, p. 481; p. 175.)

INTERNATIONALIZATION OF WATERWAYS.

Rivers Elbe, Vltava, Oder, Niemen (Russgrom-Memel-Niemen), and Danube are, as to certain parts thereof, declared international, and also all navigable parts of these river systems which naturally provide more than one state with access to the sea, together with lateral canals and channels, and any Rhine-Danube navigable waterway. (Art. 331, p. 443–445; p. 161.)

On international waterways, declared by the Treaty, nationals, property, and flags of all nations are on a perfect equality—no distinctions being made between shipping of riparian and nonriparian state to the detriment of the latter, except that Germany may not engage in traffic between the ports of any Allied or Associated Power without the consent of that Power. (Art. 332, p. 445; p. 161.) This article also is subject to review and adjustment by the council of the League of Nations, as above set out. (Art. 378, p. 481; p. 175.) Only maintenance charges may be levied for the use of such waterways (Art. 333, p. 445; p. 161), or for use of port facilities. (Art. 335, p. 447; p. 162.) Riparian states obliged to remove obstacles to navigation (Art. 336, p. 447; p. 162), and to erect no impeding work. (Art. 337, p. 447; p. 162.)

To France:

On the French frontiers, subject to the provisions of the Convention of Mannheim, or a substituted Convention, or the stipulations of this Treaty, France has the right to take water from the Rhine to feed navigation and irrigation canals, with the right to execute necessary works on the German banks, and the exclusive right to the power derived from the works of regulation on the river (subject to payment to Germany of half the power actually produced), the exercise of such rights not to impede navigation or involve increase to tolls, Germany undertaking not to allow construction of lateral canals on the right bank opposite French frontiers and recognizing France's right to use lands on right bank for necessary works, compensation being made to Germany therefor. (Art. 358, p. 465; p. 168.)

To Switzerland:

Equivalent rights as to her Rhine frontier if she demands. (Art. 358, p. 465; p. 168.)

To Belgium:

An equivalent right to take water to feed a Rhine-Meuse navigable waterway, if constructed. (Art. 358, p. 465; p. 168.)

Germany agrees to offer no objection to extending the jurisdiction of the central Rhine Commission, to designated portions of the Moselle, to additional portions of the upper part of the Rhine, and to lateral canals established to improve naturally navigable sections of the Rhine and Moselle, etc. (Art. 362, p. 469; p. 170.)

RAILWAY PROVISIONS.

German railway lines to carry goods of Allied and Associated Powers, either on through transit across Germany or to a destination in Germany, under the most favorable treatment as to rates, facilities, etc., accorded to any traffic by the railroads under similar conditions of transport, for example, length of route. The same treatment shall be accorded on request of any Allied or Associated Powers to specially designated goods coming from Germany to the Power. International tariffs involving through way bills shall be established. (Art. 365, p. 471; p. 171.) This article also subject to review and adjustment by the Council of the League of Nations as above set out. (Art. 378, p. 481; p. 175.)

Germany must cooperate in the establishment of a through ticket service (for passengers and their luggage) which any Allied or Associated Power may require; must accept trains and carriages coming from the territories of such Powers, forward the same at her best speed for long-distance trains, at rates no higher than for German internal service for the same distance. Most favorable tariffs must be applied to emigrant traffic going to or coming from ports of the Allied or Associated Powers. (Art. 367, p. 473; p. 171.)

Germany must not apply to such through service, or to emigrant service, any technical, fiscal, or administrative measures, such as customs examinations, general police, sanitary police, and control, which would impede or delay the service. (Art. 368, p. 475; p. 172.)

Property and rights given up and duties and obligations undertaken by Germany.	Credit allowed for same.
Articles 367, 368 are also subject to review and adjustment by the Council of the League of Nations as above set out. (Art. 378, p. 481; p. 175.) German railway rolling stock must be so fitted with apparatus as to permit their inclusion in trains of such Allied and Associated Powers as are parties to the Berne Convention (May 15, 1886, modified May 18, 1907) without hampering the action of the continuous brake, which may within ten years be adopted by Allied and Associated Powers and the acceptance of Allied and Associated rolling stock in German trains, which rolling stock shall have on the German lines the same treatment as German rolling stock as regards movement, upkeep, and repairs. (Art. 370, p. 475; p. 172.) Germany's railway administration must make arrangements with contiguous states as to the working of interstate railways; if these fail to make an agreement, the points of difference will be settled by a Commission of experts, designated by the Allied and Associated Powers, on which Germany will be represented. (Art. 372, p. 479; p. 173; Art. 371, p. 477; p. 173.) For the present Germany must carry out instructions given her on behalf of the Allied and Associated Powers for the carriage of troops under the provisions of this treaty, and of material, ammunition, and supplies for any use, for the transportation of supplies for certain regions, for the restoration, as rapidly as possible, of the normal conditions of transport, and for the organization of postal and telegraphic services. (Art. 375, p. 481; p. 174.) Disputes between the interested Powers regarding the "interpretation and application of the preceding articles" (seemingly articles 321–375) are to be settled as provided by the League of Nations (Art. 376, p. 481; p. 174), which may at any time "recommend the revision of such of these Articles as relate to a permanent administrative régime." (Art. 377, p. 481; p. 174.) KIEL CANAL. Kiel Canal and its approaches must be maintained free and open to vessels of commerce and of war, of all nations at peace with Germany on terms of entire equality. (Art. 380, p. 483; p. 175.) Vessels of all nations to be treated on an absolute equality as to charges and facilities and in all other respects, with vessels of Germany or of the most favored nation, without impediment as to movements of vessels or persons beyond reasonable and necessary police, customs, sanitary, immigration and emigration regulations. (Art. 381, p. 483; p. 175.) Charges levied are to be such only as are necessary for maintenance, improvements, and expenses incurred in the interests of navigation. (Art. 382, p. 485; p. 176) and no other charges shall be levied. (Art. 384, p. 485; p. 176.) Germany is bound to remove obstacles or dangers to navigation, to insure maintenance of good conditions, and not to undertake any works of a nature to impede navigation on the canal or its approaches. (Art. 385, p. 485; p. 176.) Violations of the foregoing or disputes as to the interpretations of these articles are to be referred "to the jurisdiction instituted for the purpose by the League of Nations," but small questions shall be settled in the first instance by a local authority established at Kiel by Germany. Complaints thereto may be presented by the consuls of the interested Power. (Art. 386, p. 485; p. 176.)

"MEMORANDUM NO. 1.

"SPECIAL OBLIGATIONS OF GERMANY RELATING TO ALSACE-LORRAINE.

"Shall apply no special measures to German money or monetary instruments current in Alsace-Lorraine. (Art. 57, p. 97; p. 36.)

"Shall refund exceptional war expenditures advanced by Alsace-Lorraine or public bodies therein, beyond a proportional amount based on the ratio of the revenues of the Empire to the revenues of Alsace-Lorraine. (Art. 58, p. 97; p. 36.)

"Restore to Alsace-Lorraine all property rights and interests belonging to them November 11, 1918, and now in Germany. (Art. 60, p. 99; p. 37.)

"Shall bear expense of civil and military pensions earned on November 11, 1918. (Art. 62, p. 99; p. 37.)

"Pay damages for injuries suffered by the civilian population as if Alsace-Lorraine were an Allied or Associated Country. (Art. 63, p. 99; p. 37; Art. 244, Annex I, p. 259; p. 95.)

"For ten years, furnish electrical energy (power) under contracts in force, at a rate not higher than paid by German nationals. (Art. 69, p. 105; p. 39.)

"Property rights of Alsace-Lorrainers dealt with as if they had been during war on part of allied territory. (Art. 73, p. 107; p. 40.)

"France may retain and liquidate all German national and society interests, Germany compensating her nationals. (Art. 74, p. 109; p. 40.)

"Germany to cancel any contract notified by French Government between Alsace-Lorrainers and Germans or German States or Empire, save certain contracts partly performed before November 11, 1918; who makes the compensation not specified. (Art. 75, p. 109; p. 41.)

"Alsace-Lorrainers preserve full and entire enjoyment of industrial property rights in Germany. (Art. 76, p. 111; p. 41.)

"France may prohibit—

"Management or exploitation by Germans.

"Ownership of mines and quarries by Germans.

"German participation in metallurgical establishments.

"(Art. 70, pp. 105–107; p. 40.)

"Germany is to pay to the French Government such proportion of all reserves accumulated by the Empire or by public or private bodies dependent upon it, for the purposes of disability and old-age insurance, as would fall to the disability and old-age insurance fund at Strasbourg. The same shall apply in respect of the capital and reserves accumulated in Germany falling legitimately to other social insurance funds, to miners; superannuation funds, to the fund of railways of Alsace-Lorraine, to other superannuation organizations established for the benefit of the personnel of public administrations and institutions operating in Alsace-Lorraine, and also in respect of the capital and reserves due by the insurance fund of private employees at Berlin, by reason of engagements entered into for the benefit of insured persons of that category resident in Alsace-Lorraine. (Art. 77, p. 111; p. 41.)

"REDUCTION OF MILITARY, NAVAL, AND AIR FORCES.

"1. Military Clauses:

"Army must not exceed 100,000 effectives, who must be used only to maintain order in Germany, of whom 4,000 may be officers (Art. 160, p. 191; p. 71), the Army organization, equipment, armament, munitions, and material being specified by provisions and tables in the Treaty. (Arts. 160–162, pp. 191–193; pp. 71–72, and tables following Art. 180, p. 207; p. 77.) Compulsory military service is abolished and hereafter the German Army can be constituted and recruited by voluntary enlistment only. (Art. 173, p. 201, p. 74.) The period of enlistment of noncommissioned officers and privates is twelve consecutive years (Art. 174, p. 201; p. 75), and the period of service for officers is twenty-five consecutive years. (Art. 175, p. 201; p. 75.) Officers remaining in the service must serve till they are 45 years old, and officers previously in the service must not take part in any military exercise, theoretical or practical. (Art. 175, pp. 201–203; p. 75.) Provisions covering allowable military schools are inserted (Art. 176, p. 203; p. 75), and 'Educational establishments, the Universities, societies of discharged soldiers, shooting or touring clubs, and, generally speaking, associations of every description, whatever be the age of their members, must not occupy themselves with military matters. In particular they are forbidden to instruct or exercise their members or allow them to be instructed or exercised in the profession or use of arms.' (Art. 177, p. 203; p. 75.) All measures of or appertaining to mobilization are forbidden. (Art. 178, p. 205; p. 76.) Germany must not send or accredit to any foreign country any naval, military, or air mission, nor allow any such mission to leave her territory, and must prevent her nationals enrolling in the Army, Navy, or Air Service of a foreign power, or being attached thereto as instructors. No Allied or Associated Power must enroll in or attach to their armies or naval or air forces any German national as instructors, but this shall not affect France's right to recruit for the Foreign Legion under her laws. (Art. 179, p. 205; p. 76.) Maintenance of military forces or assembling them, or upkeep of permanent works of mobilization, are forbidden on the left bank of the Rhine or within fifty kilometers of the right bank. (Art. 43, p. 61; p. 24.) All surplus arms, munitions, and war materials, including aircraft, must be surrendered to the Principal Allied and Associated Powers. (Art. 169, p. 199; p. 73.)

"2. Naval Clauses:

"German naval forces in commission must not exceed after 2 months from coming into force of Treaty, 6 battleships, 6 light cruisers, 12 destroyers, 12 torpedo boats, but no submarines, and an equal number of vessels constructed to replace these (Art. 181, p. 211; p. 78), but replacement ships must not exceed a specified displacement (10,000 tons for armored ships), and except when a ship is lost replacement shall not occur except after 20 years for battleships and cruisers, and 15 years for destroyers and torpedo boats, counting from the launching of the ship. (Art. 190, p. 217; p. 81.) All other warships must be placed in reserve or devoted to commercial purposes. (Art. 181, p. 211; p. 78.) The navy personnel shall not exceed 15,000 officers and men, with a total officers' strength of 1,500, and including naval and military corps or reserves (Art. 183, p. 211; p. 79), all raised by voluntary enlistment, for periods of 25 consecutive years for officers and 12 consecutive years for petty officers and enlisted men; replacements shall not exceed 5 per cent per annum of totals; and no officer or man of the mercantile marine shall receive any training in the Navy. (Art. 194, pp. 219–221; p. 82.) All surface warships not in German ports, and all now interned in neutral ports or in the ports of the Allied and Associated Powers, 'cease to belong to Germany, who renounces all rights over them.' (Art. 184, p. 213; p. 79.) Eight named German battleships, 8 named light cruisers, 42 modern destroyers, and 50 modern torpedo boats chosen by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers. (Art. 185, p. 213; p. 79.) Surface warships now under construction are to be broken up (Art. 186, p. 215; p. 80) and certain named auxiliary cruisers and flat auxiliaries are to be disarmed and treated as merchant ships. (Art. 187, p. 215; p. 80.)

"All German submarines, submarine salvage vessels, and docks for submarines, 'including the tubular dock,' are to be delivered to the Principal Allied and Associated Powers. If any are unfit to proceed under their own power or to be towed to allied ports, they and all others in course of construction are to be broken up. (Art. 188, p. 217; p. 80.)

"No materials derived from any of this breaking up shall be used except for purely industrial or commercial purposes; they may not be sold or disposed of to other countries. (Art. 189, p. 217; p. 81.)

"The construction or acquisition of any submarine even for commercial purposes is forbidden. (Art. 191, p. 219; p. 81.)

"3. Air Clauses:

"The armed forces of Germany must not include any military or naval air forces and no dirigibles shall be kept. (Art. 198, p. 223; p. 83.) All military and naval aeronautical material (except 100 seaplanes, with a spare engine for each to be used in searching for submarine mines), must be delivered to the Principal Allied and Associated Powers. (Art. 198, p. 223; p. 83.)

"In addition to the foregoing clauses, others in this Part may be noted as follows:

"Within three months Germany must disclose to the Principal Allied and Associated Powers the nature and mode of manufacture of all explosives, toxic substances, and other like chemical preparations used or prepared for use by them in the war. (Art. 172, p. 201; p. 74.)

"Moreover, the importation into Germany and the manufacture for and export out of Germany of all arms, munitions, and war materials (Art. 170, p. 199; p. 74), the manufacture and importation of asphyxiating, poisonous, or other gases, and all analogous liquids, materials, or devices (Art. 171, p. 199; p. 74), the manufacture and importation into Germany of armored cars, tanks, and similar constructions suitable for use in war (id. p. 199; p. 74), the manufacture for and export from Germany of arms, munitions, or naval war material (Art. 192, p. 219; p. 81), and for a period of six months 'the manufacture and importation of aircraft, engines for aircraft, and parts of engines for aircraft' (Art. 201, p. 225; p. 84) is forbidden.

"All the forgoing clauses are carried out under inter-Allied Commissions (one for military matters, Art. 208, p. 229, p. 85; one for naval, Art. 209, p. 231, p. 86; and one for aeronautics, Art. 210, p. 233, p. 86) whose 'upkeep and cost,' and 'expenses of their work' shall be borne by Germany (Art. 207, p. 229, p. 85), which shall attach a qualified representative to each Commission, and which will give to the Commission 'all necessary facilities for the accomplishment of their missions.' (Art. 206, p. 229, p. 85.) At the end of three months, 'German laws must have been modified and shall be maintained by the German Government in conformity with this part of the present treaty.' (Art. 211, p. 233; p. 87.)

"4. Fortifications:

"No fortification on left bank of Rhine nor on right bank within 50 kilometers of the river. (Art. 42, p. 61; p. 23.)

"No fortifications in plebiscite areas of Kreise of Stuhm and Rosenberg and part of Kreise of Marienburg, if plebiscite gives them to East Prussia. (Art. 97, p. 147; p. 54.)

"Of Heligoland—destroyed—neither they nor any similar works shall be reconstructed. (Art. 115, pp. 165, 167; p. 61.)

"In territory occupied by Allied and Associated troops, disarmed and dismantled, and no new ones erected. (Art. 180, pp. 205–207; p. 76.)

"On east coast of Schleswig, Holstein, and north coast of Mecklenburg, existing fortifications demolished and guns removed, and no guns installed commanding maritime routes. (Art. 195, p. 221; p. 82.)

"Fortifications on southern and eastern frontiers maintained as now. (Art. 180, p. 207; p. 76.)

"Those already established within 50 kilometers of the German coast or on German islands off that coast (other than those specified in Art. 195) considered as of defensive character, and may remain where they are. (Art. 196, p. 221; p. 82.)

"5. Evacuation by Military Forces of Germany:

"From Poland, the German plebiscite area, within 15 days of coming into force of Treaty. (Art. 88, Annex I, p. 129; p. 48.)

"From East Prussia—the plebiscite area, within 15 days of coming into force of Treaty. (Art. 95, p. 141; p. 52.)

"From Kreise of Stuhm and Rosenberg and portion of Kreise of Marienburg—a plebiscite area—within 15 days of coming into force of Treaty. (Art. 97, p. 145; p. 54.)

"From Schleswig—designated portion—within 10 days of coming into force of Treaty. (Art. 109, p. 157; p. 58.)

"MEMORANDUM No. 3.

"1. Belgium Boundary Commission:

"A commission composed of seven persons—five appointed by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers, one by Germany, and one by Belgium—will be set up within 15 days from the coming into force of the present Treaty and will settle on the spot the new frontier lines between Belgium and Germany, taking into account the economic factors and means of communication. Decisions will be taken by a majority and will be binding on the parties concerned. (Art. 35, p. 57; p. 22.)

"2. Saar Basin Boundary Commission:

"A commission composed of five members—one appointed by France, one by Germany, and three by the Council of the League of Nations, which will select nationals of other powers—will be constituted within 15 days from the coming into force of the present Treaty, and will trace on the spot the frontier line prescribed by the Treaty, taking into consideration so far as possible local economic interests and existing communal boundaries. The decisions of this commission will be taken by a majority and will be binding on the parties concerned. (Art. 48, p. 67; p. 24.)

"3. Saar Basin Governing Commission:

"The government of the territory of the Saar Basin shall be entrusted to a commission representing the League of Nations. This commission shall be composed of five members chosen by the Council of the League of Nations—one to be a citizen of France, one a native of the Saar Basin not a citizen of France, and three members belonging to three countries other than France or Germany. The members are appointed for one year and may be reappointed. They may be removed by the Council of the League of Nations, which will refill the positions so vacated. (Art. 50, Annex, Chap. II, pars. 16, 17, pp. 77, 79; p. 29.) The chairman, appointed from the members by the Council of the League, will act as the executive of the commission. (Id., par. 18, p. 79; p. 30.)

"Within the territory of the Saar Basin the governing commission shall have all the powers of government hitherto belonging to the German Empire, Prussia, or Bavaria, including the appointment and dismissal of officials and the creation of such administrative and representative bodies as it may deem necessary. It shall have full powers to administer and operate the railroads, canals, and the different public services. Its decisions shall be taken by a majority. (Id., par. 19, p. 79; p. 30.)

"4. Commission of Experts:

"A commission of three experts—one nominated by Germany, one by France, and one, who will be neither a Frenchman or German, by the Council of the League of Nations—the decisions of the experts to be given by a majority, will determine the price in gold which Germany is to pay for France's right of ownership in the Saar Basin coal mines, which may be situated in such part of the territory of the Saar Basin as the League of Nations may decide favors a union with Germany as the result of the plebiscite to be held 15 years from the coming into force of the treaty. (Art. 50, Annex, Chap. III, pars. 34, 36, pp. 87, 89; pp. 33, 34.)

"5. Boundary Commission for Czecho-Slovak State:

"A commission composed of seven members—five nominated by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers, one by Poland, and one by the Czecho-Slovak State—will trace on the spot the frontier line between Poland and the Czecho-Slovak State. "The members are appointed by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers. (Art. 203, p. 227; p. 85.)

"The number of members or the internal procedure of the commission are not provided for.

"15. Prisoners' Commission:

"A commission composed of representatives of the Allied and Associated Powers on the one part and of the German Government on the other will carry out the repatriation of German prisoners of war and interned civilians.

"For each of the Allied and Associated Powers a subcommission, composed exclusively of representatives of the interested Power and of delegates of the German Government, shall regulate the details of carrying into effect the repatriation of the prisoners of war. (Art. 215, p. 237; p. 88.)

"The repatriation of prisoners of war and interned civilians shall take place as soon as possible after the coming into force of the present treaty and shall be carried out with the greatest rapidity. (Art. 214, p. 237; p. 87.)

"16. Commission on Graves:

"Germany agrees to recognize any commission appointed by an Allied or Associated Government for the purpose of identifying, registering, caring for, or erecting suitable memorials over the graves of soldiers and sailors buried in German territory, and to facilitate the discharge of the duties of such commissions. This provision seems to be reciprocal in favor of Germany. (Art. 225, p. 243; p. 89.)

"17. Commission on Social and State Insurance in Ceded Territory:

"A commission of five members, one appointed by the German Government, one by the other interested Government, and three by the governing body of the International Labor Office from the nationals of other States, shall determine the conditions of transfer of such portions of the reserves accumulated by the Government of the German Empire or of German States, or by public or private organizations under their control, as is attributable to the carrying on of social or State insurance in ceded territory, unless such transfer has been arranged by special convention within three months after the coming into force of the present treaty. (Art. 312, p. 427, 429; p. 155–156.)

"18. International Commission for the Elbe (Labe) River:

"The Elbe (Labe) shall be placed under the administration of an international commission which shall comprise four representatives of the German States bordering on the river, two representatives of the Czecho-Slovak State, one representative of Great Britain, one representative of France, one representative of Italy, and one representative of Belgium. Whatever be the number of members present, each delegation shall have the right to record a number of votes equal to the number of representatives allotted to it. If certain of these representatives can not be appointed at the time of the coming into force of the present Treaty, the decisions of the commission shall nevertheless be valid. (Art. 340, p. 451; p. 164.)

"This commission shall proceed immediately to prepare a project for the revision of existing international agreements and regulations (Art. 343, p. 453; p. 164), which project shall designate the headquarters of the commission, prescribe the manner in which its president is to be nominated, specify the extent of the commission's powers, particularly in regard to the execution of works of maintenance, control, and improvements on the river system, the financial régime, the fixing and collection of charges and regulations for navigation, and shall define the sections of the river or its tributaries to which the international régime shall be applied. (Art. 344, p. 453; p. 165.)

"19. International Commission for the Oder (Odra) River:

"The Oder (Odra) shall be placed under the administration of an international commission which shall comprise one representative of Poland, three representatives of Prussia, one representative of the Czecho-Slovak State, one representative of Great Britain, one representative of France, one representative of Denmark, and one representative of Sweden.

"If certain of these representatives can not be appointed at the time of the coming into force of the present Treaty, the decisions of the commission shall nevertheless be valid. (Art. 341, p. 451; p. 164.)

"This commission shall proceed immediately to prepare a project for the revision of existing international agreements and regulations (Art. 343, p. 453; p. 164), which project shall designate the headquarters of the commission, prescribe the manner in which its President is to be nominated, specify the extent of the commission's powers, particularly in regard to the execution of works of maintenance, control, and river improvements on the river system, the financial régime, the fixing and collection of charges and regulations for navigation, and shall define the sections of the river or its tributaries to which the international régime shall be applied. (Art. 344, p. 453; p. 165.)

"20. International Commission of the Niemen (Russstrom-Memel-Niemen) River:

"Upon request to the League of Nations by any riparian State, the Niemen (Russstrom-Memel-Niemen) shall be placed under the administration of an international commission, which shall comprise one representative of each riparian State and three representatives of other States specified by the League of Nations. (Art. 342, p. 453; p. 164.)

"21. International Commission for the Danube System:

"A commission shall be appointed composed of two representatives of German riparian States, one representative of each other riparian State, and one representative of each non-riparian represented in the future on the European Commission of the Danube, and shall be placed in charge of the administration of the Danube system referred to in Article 331 (p. 443; p. 161).

"If certain of these representatives can not be appointed at the time of the coming into force of the present Treaty, the decisions of the commission shall nevertheless be valid. (Art. 347, p. 455; p. 165.)

"This commission shall undertake provisionally the administration of the river in conformity with the principles of Articles 332 to 337 (pp. 445–447; pp. 161, 162) until such time as a definite statute regarding the Danube is concluded by the Powers nominated by the Allied and Associated Powers. (Art. 348, p. 455; p. 165.) This conference will be of the Powers nominated by the Allied and Associated Powers. (Art. 349, p. 457; p. 166.)

"22. Commission Free Zones in Northern Ports:

"A commission consisting of one delegate of Germany, one delegate of the Czecho-Slovak State, and one delegate of Great Britain shall decide as to the delimitation of the free zones in Hamburg and Stettin, which Germany shall lease to the Czecho-Slovak State for a period of 99 years (Art. 363, p. 469; p. 170) and the equipment of such areas, their exploitation, and in general all conditions for their utilization, including the amount of the rental. Such conditions shall be susceptible of revision every 10 years in the same manner and Germany declares in advance that she will adhere to the decisions so taken. (Art. 364, p. 471; p. 170.)

"23. Commission of Experts on Railways:

"Commission of Experts on Railways designated by the Allied and Associated Powers, on which Germany shall be represented, shall as regards railway lines, ceded by Germany to States obtaining part of her territory, where said railway lines have no special rolling stock, fix the proportion of the stock existing on the system to which the lines belong, which Germany shall hand over to the ceded system. These commissions shall also specify the locomotives, 'carriages,' and 'wagons' to be handed over in each case; they shall decide upon the conditions of their acceptance and shall make the provisional arrangement necessary to ensure their repair in German workshops. (Art. 371, p. 477; p. 173.)

"The High Contracting Parties agree that, in the absence of any subsequent agreement to the contrary, the chairman of any commission established by the present Treaty shall in the event of an equality of votes be entitled to a second vote. (Art. 437, p. 533; p. 19.)

"MEMORANDUM NO. 4.

"THE REPARATION COMMISSION.

"1. Constitution and Personnel of the Commission (Art. 244, Annex II, p. 261 et seq.; p. 96 et seq.):

"Each of the Powers named below will appoint one delegate and also one assistant delegate, who takes the delegate's place in case of the latter's illness or necessary absence, the assistant delegate at other times having merely the right to be present at proceedings without taking any part therein.

"These powers are the United States of America, Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, Belgium, and the Serb-Croat-Slovene State. On no occasion shall more than five of the Powers have the right to take part in the proceedings of the commission and record votes, and the delegates of the United States, Great Britain, France, and Italy shall have the right on all occasions. The delegate of Belgium shall sit whenever the delegate of Japan (who sits on questions relating to damage at sea and the condemnation of concessions in Russia, China, etc., Art. 260, p. 317; p. 116, or the delegate of the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, who sits on questions relating to Austria, Hungary, or Bulgaria) does not sit.

"Any Government represented on the commission may withdraw upon 12 months' notice filed with the commission, the notice being confirmed in the course of the sixth month after the date of the original notice.

"Other interested Allied and Associated Powers may appoint a delegate to be present and act as assessor in respect to that Power's claims and interests when under examination or discussion, but the assessor has no right to vote.

"Proceedings of the commission are private unless the commission otherwise determines.

"There shall be a chairman or vice chairman of the commission holding office for one year and eligible for reelection.

"The German Government will accord to the members of the commission and its authorized agents the same rights and immunities as are enjoyed in Germany by duly accredited diplomatic agents of friendly Powers and will pay the salaries and expenses of the commission and of its staff. (Art. 240, p. 255; p. 94.)

"A member of the commission is responsible to his own Government for his acts of omission or commission, and no Allied or Associated Government assumes any responsibility in respect to any other Government.

"The commission shall be dissolved when all the amounts due from Germany and her Allies under the present Treaty or the decisions of the commission have been discharged and all sums received, or their equivalents shall have been distributed to the Powers interested. (Art. 244, Annex II, par. 23, p. 277; p. 101.)

"Powers and Jurisdiction of the Commission (Art. 244, Annex II, p. 261; p. 96):

"The commission is not bound by any code or rules of law or by any particular rule of evidence of procedure, 'but shall be guided by justice, equity, and good faith.' Cases involving the same principles and rules should be similarly decided. The commission will establish rules relating to methods of proof of claims and will act on any trustworthy modes of computation. (Par. 11.)

"The commission has the right to appoint all necessary officers, agents, and employees requisite for the executions of its functions and fix their remuneration; may constitute committees, whose members need not be members of the commission; take all executive steps necessary for the discharge of its duties; and delegate authority and discretion to officers, agents, and committees. (Par. 7.)

"'The commission shall in general have wide latitude as to its control and handling of the whole reparation problem as dealt with in this part of the present Treaty and shall have authority to interpret its provisions. Subject to the provisions of the present Treaty, the commission is constituted by the several Allied and Associated Governments referred to in paragraphs 2 and 3 above (those appointing delegates and assessors) as the exclusive agency of the said Governments, respectively, for receiving, selling, holding, and distributing the reparation payments to be made by Germany under this part of the present Treaty.' (Par. 12.)

"The Reparation Commission determines the amount of damage for which compensation is to be made by Germany after giving the German Government a 'just opportunity' to be heard (Art. 233, p. 251; p. 92), but Germany may take no part in the decisions of the commission, which shall also afford a similar opportunity to the Allies of Germany when it shall consider that their interests are in question. (Art. 244, Annex II, par. 10, p. 265; p. 97.)

"The following additional functions are worthy of note:

"The Reparation Commission shall—

"Draw up a schedule of payments prescribing the time and manner for securing and discharging the entire obligation within a period of 30 years from May 1, 1921. (Art. 233, p. 251; p. 92.)

"Determine in its discretion when and to what extent the payments of Germany shall be extended or modified (Arts. 233, 234, p. 251; p. 92), and shall hear evidence and arguments on the part of Germany on any questions connected with her capacity to pay. (Art. 244, Annex II, par. 9, p. 265; p. 97.)

"Determine within the limits of rules laid down the amount of bonds or other obligations which Germany shall issue and as to when they shall be issued, which bonds are to be both a guarantee and an acknowledgment of the debt they cover. (Art. 244, Annex II, par. 12, p. 269, et seq.; p. 99.)

"Lay down the procedure under which shall be restored cash and property seized or sequestrated by Germany during the war. (Art. 238, p. 255; p. 93.)

"Receive from Germany the merchant ships and fishing boats which she must deliver. (Art. 244, Annex III, p. 277; p. 102.)

"Determines the specifications of the ships to be built by Germany for the account of the Allied and Associated Governments, the conditions under which they are to be built and delivered, the price per ton at which they are to be accounted for by the Reparation Commission, and all other questions relating to the accounting, ordering, building, and delivery of the ships. (Id., p. 279; p. 103.)

"Take title to that portion of the German River fleet which is turned over to make good the losses incurred during the war by the Allied and Associated Powers. (Id., p. 281; p. 103.)

"Consider the lists filed with it by the Allied and Associated Governments showing animals, machinery, equipment, tools, and like articles of a commercial character, which have been seized, consumed, or destroyed by Germany, or destroyed in direct consequence of military operations, which the Governments desire to have restored for meeting their immediate and urgent needs, as also of reconstruction materials (stones, bricks, refractory bricks, tiles, wood, window glass, steel, lime, cement, etc.), machinery, heating apparatus, furniture and like articles which the powers desire to have produced and manufactured in Germany and delivered to them to permit of the restoration of the invaded areas. The commission shall then determine the amount and number of materials and animals mentioned in the lists which Germany is to be required to furnish. (Id., Annex IV, pp. 283, 285; p. 104–105.)

"Give the representatives of the German Government an opportunity and a time to be heard on their ability to furnish such materials, articles, and animals. (Id., p. 287; p. 105.)

"Determine the value to be attributed to such materials, articles, and animals and the amount thereof to be credited against the reparation account. (Id., p. 287; p. 105.)

"Pass upon the amount of coal which Germany should be called upon to furnish under the options granted in the Treaty, as also the replacement of coke for coal, the delivery of benzol, coal tar, and sulphate of ammonia. (Art. 244, Annex V, p. 291, et seq.; p. 106, et seq.)

"Have the right to require the delivery of 50 per cent of the total stock of each and every kind of dyestuff and chemical drug in Germany or under German control at the date of the coming into force of the treaty, the price to be paid for such dyestuffs and so to be credited against the reparation account to be fixed by the commission. (Art. 244, Annex VI, p. 295, et seq.; p. 108.) Germany also agrees to deliver during any six months period up to January 1, 1925, up to 25 per cent of the German production of such dyestuffs and chemicals produced during the preceding six months, or 25 per cent of the normal production. (Id., par. 2, p. 297; p. 109.)

"Have the power to make exceptions to the priority distribution provided by the Treaty for the revenue of the German Empire and its constituent States. (Art. 248, p. 305; p. 111.)

"Determine the amount of the public debt (Empire or State) which cessionary States shall assume in respect to the territorial areas ceded to them, as also the method of discharging such obligation. (Art. 254, p. 309; p. 113.)

"Fix the value of all State property ceded by the Treaty to the Allied and Associated Powers, which property shall include the private property of the former German Emperor and other royal personages, such value to be paid by the acquiring States to the Reparation Commission for credit on the reparation account in favor of the German Government. (Art. 256, p. 311; p. 114.)

"May demand that the German Government become possessed of rights and interests of German nationals in public utilities and concessions in Russia, China, Turkey, Austria, Hungary, and Bulgaria or in the possessions or dependencies of these States or any territory formerly belonging to Germany or her allies to be ceded by Germany or her allies to any Power or to be administered by a mandatory under the present Treaty; and may require the German Government to transfer all such rights and interests to the Reparation Commission, which shall credit Germany on the reparation account the value of said rights and interests as assessed by itself. (Art. 260, p. 317; p. 116.)

"Is authorized to accept on account of the bill against Germany for the total amount of her damage (which shall be concluded and notified to the German Government on or before May 1, 1921, as representing the extent of the Government's obligations) (Art. 233, p. 251; p. 92) chattels, properties, commodities, businesses, rights, concessions, within or without German territory, ships, bonds, shares or securities of any kind, or currencies of Germany or other States, the value of such substitutes for gold being fixed at a fair and just amount by the commission itself, which shall have due regard in accepting such payments, for any legal or equitable interests of the Allied and Associated Powers or of neutral Powers or of their nationals therein. (Art. 244, Annex II, pars. 19, 20, p. 275; p. 101.)

"Determine the debt Belgium owes to the Allied and Associated Powers, incurred up to November 11, 1918, with interest at 5 per cent, and accept German bonds for this amount. (Art. 232, p. 249; p. 91.)

"Make decisions regarding cancellation of German debt (Art. 234, p. 251, p. 92; Art. 244, Annex II, par. 13, p. 271; p. 99), accompanied by a statement of reasons (Art. 244, Annex II, par. 12 (f), p. 269, p. 99), but any cancellation must be with the specific authority of the several Governments represented upon the commission. (Art. 234, p. 251; p. 92.)

"Require information from German Government relative to financial situation and operation and to the property productive capacity, and stocks and current production of raw materials and manufactured articles of Germany and her nationals, also information regarding military operations. (Art. 240, p. 255; p. 94.)

"Determine credits to be made to Germany on account of transfers, rights, concessions, or other interests not specifically covered. (Art. 243, p. 257; p. 94.)

"Must take bonds and undertakings from Germany as stipulated. (Art. 244, Annex II, par. 12 (c), p. 267; p. 98.)

"May take into account in fixing total amount of debt against Germany, interest due on sums arising out of the reparation of material damages as from November 11, 1918, up to May 1, 1921. (Art. 244, Annex II, par. 16, p. 273; p. 100.)

"Make recommendation of action to be taken against Germany in case of default by Germany in performance of any obligation imposed by Part VIII. (Art. 244, Annex II, par. 17, p. 273; p. 100; and see Art. 430, p. 521; p. 189.)

"Indicate to German Government measures to be taken by it to secure full title to ships transferred to neutral flags during war, or now in process of such transfer without consent of Allied or Associated Governments. (Art. 244, Annex III, par. 7, p. 281; p. 103.)

"Determine amounts representing expenditures by the German Empire or States upon the Government properties referred to in Article 256. (Art. 255, p. 311; p. 113.)

"Determine value of Saar Basin property ceded to France. (Art. 50, Annex, Chap. I., par. 5, p. 71; p. 27.)

"Determine amount of German debt arising from measures adopted by the German and Prussian Governments with a view to German colonization of Poland. (Art. 92, p. 137; p. 51.)

"Approve estimates of French Government relating to deposits, credits, and advances effected under the agreements dealing with Equatorial Africa. (Art. 125, p. 171; p. 64.)

"Determine value of buildings, forests, and other State property which belonged to former Kingdom of Poland. (Art. 92, p. 137; p. 51.)

"Determine value of Germany's portion of the capital of the State Bank of Morocco. (Art. 145, p. 183; p. 68.)

"All proceedings of the commission shall be private, unless on particular occasions the commission shall otherwise determine for special reasons. (Art. 244, Annex II, par. 8, p. 265; p. 97.)

"MEMORANDUM NO. 5.

"CLEARING OFFICES.

"Property, rights, and interests, including pecuniary obligations of German nationals in allied and associated countries and of the nationals of the Allied and Associated countries in Germany.

"[See generally Part X, Sec. III, pp. 347–367, pp. 127–133, and Sec. IV, pp. 367–385, pp. 134–141.]

"First. As to the property of German nationals in Allied and Associated territory:

"Under the Treaty the Allied and Associated Powers reserve the right to retain and liquidate all property, rights, and interests belonging at the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty to German nationals, or companies controlled by them, within their territories, colonies, possessions, and protectorates, including territory ceded to them by the present Treaty, this liquidation to be carried out in accordance with the laws of the allied or associated state concerned, the price to be fixed in accordance with the methods of sale or valuation adopted by the laws of the country in which the property has been retained or liquidated. Proceeds of industrial property dealt with in the same way, unless legislation in force at the time of signature of treaty, otherwise directs. (Art. 306, p. 417; p. 152.) The German owner shall not be able to dispose of his property, right, or interests, nor to subject them to any charge without the consent of the State in which the property is located. (Art. 297 (b), p. 367; p. 134.)

"The Treaty also provides that as between the Allied and Associated Powers or their nationals on the one hand and Germany or her nationals on the other hand all the exceptional war measures or measures of transfer (both of which terms are defined in the Treaty, see Art. 298, Annex, par. 3 and 4, p. 377, 379, p. 138, and cover roughly activities such as those of the Alien Property Custodian in the United States) or acts done or to be done in execution of such measures as defined in paragraphs 1 and 3 of the Annex to Article 298 (pp. 375–377; pp. 137–138) shall be considered as final and binding upon all persons except as regards the reservations laid down in the Treaty.

"Paragraph 1 (p. 375; p. 137) of the Annex above mentioned amplifies this confirmation of the exceptional war measures or measures of transfer by the powers (and as to the provisions of paragraph 1, of Germany also). Paragraph 2 (p. 377; p. 137) provides further that no claim or action shall be made or brought against any Allied or Associated Power or against any person acting on behalf of or under the direction of any legal authority or department of the Government of such a Power by Germany or by any German national wherever resident in respect of any action or omission with regard to his property, right, or interests during the war or in preparation for the war. Similarly no claim or action shall be made or brought against any person in respect of any act or omission under or in accordance with the exceptional war measures, laws, or regulations of any Allied or Associated Power.

"The property, rights, and interests of German nationals will continue to be subject to exceptional war measures that have been or will be taken with regard to them pursuant to the authorization above recited until the complete liquidation therein contemplated has been completed. (Art. 298, Annex, par. 9, p. 381; p. 139.)

"Furthermore all investments wheresoever effected with the cash assets of the nationals of the Allied and Associated Powers and Germany, including companies and associations in which such nationals were interested, by persons responsible for the administration of enemy property or having control over such administration or by order of such persons or of any authority whatsoever, shall be annulled. These cash assets shall be accounted for irrespective of any such investments. (Art. 298, Annex, par. 12, p. 383; p. 140.)

"Again compensation in respect of damages or injuries inflicted upon the property of the nationals of Allied and Associated Powers in Germany may be charged upon the property of German nationals within the territory or under the control of the creditor national's State. This German property may be constituted as a pledge for enemy liabilities under the conditions fixed by paragraph 4 of the Annex hereto. The payment of the compensation may be made by the Allied or Associated State and the amount will be debited to Germany. (Art. 297 (e), p. 369; p. 134.)

"Finally Germany undertakes to compensate her nationals in respect of the sales or retention of their property, rights, or interests in Allied or Associated States. (Art. 297 (i), p. 373, p. 136.)

"Second. The property of the nationals of Allied and Associated Powers of Germany:

"In the first place the exceptional war measures and measures of transfer (defined as already indicated), taken by Germany with respect to the property, rights, and interests of the nationals of Allied and Associated Powers including companies and associations in which they are interested, when liquidation has not been completed, shall be immediately discontinued or stayed and the property, rights, and interests concerned restored to their owners who shall enjoy full rights therein as provided in the Treaty. (Art. 297 (a), p. 367; p. 134.)

"As to the confirmation (of paragraph 1 of the Annex to Art. 298, p. 375; p. 137) of the complete acts of the German Government instrumentalities (equivalent to the American Alien Property Custodian) there is this proviso: This confirmation will not apply to such of the measures mentioned as have been taken by the German authorities in invaded or occupied territory, nor to such of the mentioned measures as have been taken by Germany or the German authorities since November 11, 1918, all of which shall be void. (Art. 298, Annex, par. 1, p. 377; p. 137.)

"As to the property and rights of the nationals of the Allied or Associated Powers within whose territory legislative measures prescribing the general liquidation of enemy property, rights, or interests were not applied before the signature of the armistice the following procedure may be had. (Art. 297 (f) (g), pp. 369–371; p. 135.)

"Whenever a national of such a power is entitled to property which has been subjected to a measure of transfer in German territory, and expresses a desire for its restitution, his claim for compensation shall be satisfied by the restitution of the said property, if it still exists in specie, free from any encumbrances or burdens with which it may have been charged after the liquidation, all third parties injured by the restitution being indemnified. Allied and Associated Powers must specify the property, rights, and interests as to which they intend to exercise this right of restitution which will be carried out by order of the German Government or of the authorities which have been substituted for it. (Art. 298, Annex, par. 7, p. 381; p. 139.)

"As to all such property, rights, and interests so restored Germany undertakes to restore and maintain such property in the legal position obtaining in respect of the property, rights, and interests of German nationals under the laws in force before the war, and not to subject any such property, rights, or interests to any measures in derogation of property rights which will not apply equally to property, rights, and interests of German nationals and to pay adequate compensation in the event of the application of these measures. (Art. 298, p. 373; p. 136.) These provisions apply also to property as to which exceptional war measures of transfer have been discontinued.

"Furthermore, the nationals of Allied and Associated Powers shall be entitled to compensation in respect of damages or injury inflicted upon their property, rights, or interests, including any company or association in which they are interested in German territory as it existed on August 1, 1914, by the application either of the exceptional war measures or measures of transfer mentioned in paragraphs 1 and 3 of the Annex hereto. The claims made in this respect by such nationals shall be investigated and the total of the compensation shall be determined by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal provided for in Section VI of Part X or by an arbitrator appointed by that tribunal. (Art. 297 (e), p. 369; p. 134.)

"Finally, Germany must, within six months from the coming into force of the present Treaty, deliver to each Allied or Associated Power all securities, certificates, deeds, or other documents of title held by its nationals and relating to property, rights, or interests situated in the territory of that Allied or Associated Power, including any bonds, stocks, debentures, debenture stocks, or other obligations of any company incorporated in accordance with the laws of that power. (Art. 298, Annex, par. 10, p. 383; p. 139.)

"In brief, Germany is to cease all exceptional war measures and measures of transfer and restore to the nationals of the Allied and Associated Powers their property affected thereby; is to restore any of their property still existing in specie; is to grant compensation for all damages or injuries inflicted upon their property; and is to deliver to each of the Powers the securities held by Germans of any company created under the laws of the Power.

"Third. Disposition of the proceeds of enemy property:

"The net proceeds of the sales of enemy property, rights, or interests wherever situated carried out either by virtue of war legislation or by the application of the provisions of Article 297, and in general all cash assets of enemies shall be dealt with as follows:

"Two plans are provided—one for those not adopting the provisions of Section III and the Annex thereto (Part X) and the other that provided for by said section. (Art. 297 (h-1, 2) p. 371; p. 135.)

"A. Plan to be followed by those not adopting Section III of Part X:

"(1) Property of the nationals of Allied or Associated Governments held by Germany.

"The proceeds of property, rights, and interests and the cash assets of the nationals of Allied or Associated Powers held by Germany shall be paid immediately to the person entitled thereto or to his Government. (Art. 297 (h-2), p. 371; p. 135).

"(2) Property of German nationals held by Allied or Associated Powers.

"The proceeds of property, rights, and interests and the cash assets of German nationals received by an Allied or Associated Power shall be subject to disposal by such power in accordance with its laws and regulations and may be applied in payment of claims and debts defined by this article or paragraph 4 of the Annex hereto. (Art. 297 (h-2), p. 371; p. 135.)

"The provisions of paragraph 4 referred to are as follows:

"All property, rights, and interests of German nationals within the territory of any Allied or Associated Power and the net proceeds of their sale, liquidation or other dealing therewith may be charged by that Allied or Associated Power in the first place with payment of amounts due in respect of claims by the nationals of that Allied or Associated Power with regard to their property, rights, and interests, including companies and associations in which they are interested in German territory, or debts owing to them by German nationals, and with payment of claims growing out of acts committed by the German Government or by any German authorities since July 31, 1914, and before that Allied or Associated Power entered into the war. The amount of such claims may be assessed by an arbitrator appointed by Mr. Gustave Ador, if he is willing, or if no such appointment is made by him, by an arbitrator appointed by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal provided for in Section VI. They may be charged in the second place with payment of the amounts due in respect of claims by the nationals of such Allied or Associated Power with regard to their property, rights, and interests in the territory of other enemy powers, in so far as those claims are otherwise unsatisfied." (Art. 298, Annex, par. 4, p. 379; p. 138.)

"Any property, rights, and interests or proceeds thereof or cash assets not used as above provided may be retained by the said Allied or Associated Power, and if retained the cash value thereof shall be dealt with as provided in Article 243 (p. 257; p. 94)—that is to say, it will be credited to Germany in respect of her reparation obligations. (Art. 297 (h-2), p. 371; p. 135; and see Arts. 242, 243, p. 257; p. 94.)

"Liquidation effected in new States signatories of the present Treaty or in States which are not entitled to share in the reparation payments to be made by Germany. The proceeds of liquidations effected by such States shall, subject to the rights of the Reparation Commission under the present Treaty, particularly under Articles 235 (p. 253; p. 93) and 260 (p. 317; p. 116), be paid direct to the owner. If the owner be not satisfied and apply to the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal, such tribunal shall itself or by an arbitrator examine the case and if satisfied that the conditions of the sale or measures taken by the Government of the State in question outside its general legislation were unfairly prejudicial to the price obtained shall have discretion to award to the owner equitable compensation to be paid by that State. (Art. 297 (h-2), p. 373; p. 136.)

"B. Powers adopting Section III (p. 347; p. 127) and the Annex thereto proceed as follows:

"It is in the first place to be observed that this section is entitled 'Debts' and apparently relates, primarily at least, only to the settlement and adjustment of debts between German nationals and the nationals of Allied and Associated Powers. It does not appear clear in what manner property, rights, and interests other than debts, which are covered by Section IV, which follows (p. 367; p. 134), are to be adjusted under Section III, although the plan for adjustment under Section IV is reasonably clear, and it seems in contemplation (Art. 296, p. 349; p. 127) that such property, rights, and interests mentioned in Section IV shall be accounted for under this procedure. Moreover, the class of debts which may be adjusted under this section are confined to the following (Art. 296, p. 347; p. 127):

"1. Debts payable before the war and running from a national of one of the Contracting Powers residing within its territory and due to a national of an Opposing Power residing within its territory;

"2. Debts which became payable during the war to nationals of one of the Contracting Powers residing within its territory and arose out of transactions or contracts with the nationals of an Opposing Power, resident within its territory, of which the total or partial execution was suspended on account of the declaration of war;

"3. Interest which has accrued due before and during the war to a national of one of the Contracting Powers in respect of securities issued by an Opposing Power, provided that the payment of interest on such securities to the nationals of that Power or to neutrals has not been suspended during the war;

"4. Capital sums which have become payable before and during the war to nationals of one of the Contracting Powers in respect of securities issued by one of the Opposing Powers, provided that the payments of such capital sums to nationals of that Power or to neutrals has not been suspended during the war.

"The settlement of these debts is accomplished under the following principles and plan:

"A. Each Government guarantees the payment of all such debts of its nationals except where the debtor was in a state of bankruptcy before the war or had given formal indication of insolvency or where the debt was due by a company whose business had been liquidated under emergency legislation during the war. This does not apply to territory invaded or occupied by the enemy before the armistice. (Art. 296 (b), p. 349; p. 127.) This guaranty is effective whenever for any reason a debt is not recoverable because of the reasons above mentioned or where the debt has been barred by the statute of limitations in force in the debtor's country. (Id., Annex, par. 4, p. 355; p. 129.)

"Within six months of the establishment of the Clearing Office, creditors must give notice of debts due them, and shall furnish the office with any document and information required of them. (Art. 296, Annex, par. 5, p. 355; p. 129.)

"A debtor Clearing House must credit a Creditor Clearing House with every debt admitted by the debtor even though it be unable to collect it. The Government concerned will, nevertheless, invest their respective Clearing Offices with all necessary powers for the recovery of debts which have been admitted. (Id., par. 14, p. 359; p. 131.)

"B. Each of the High Contracting Parties shall prohibit, as from the coming into force of the present Treaty, both the payment and the acceptance of payment of such debts and also of communications between the interested parties with regard to the adjustment of said debts otherwise than through the Clearing Offices to be established. (Art. 296 (a), p. 349; p. 127.) Violations of this prohibition shall be punished with the same penalties which are provided by legislation for trading with the enemy (id., Annex, par. 3, p. 353; p. 129), and the parties to the Treaty agree to take all suitable measures to trace and punish collusion between enemy creditors and debtors and to communicate one with another any evidence and information which might help the discovery and punishment of such collusion. (Id., Annex, par. 5, p. 355; p. 129.) Moreover, each country must prohibit within its territory all legal processes relating to the payment of enemy debts except in accordance with the provisions of the Treaty. (Id., par. 3, p. 353; p. 129.)

"C. Each country shall establish a Clearing Office for the collection and payment of debts due to its nationals and for the collection for payment of debts due from its nationals to nationals of the opposing party. (Art. 296, Annex, par. 1, p. 353; p. 128.) It moreover appears that by agreement between the Allied and Associated Powers, these Clearing Offices may similarly act with reference to the nationals of one resident in the other; that is, an American Clearing Office could act in the settlement of a debt running from a German to a Frenchman resident in the United States. (Art. 296 (f), p. 353; p. 128.)

"In appointing the personnel of a Clearing Office or of the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal due regard shall be paid to the knowledge possessed by the personnel of the language of the other country concerned. (Id., Annex, par. 21, p. 363; p. 132.)

"D. Each Clearing Office is both a debtor Clearing Office and a Creditor Clearing Office. As a creditor Clearing Office it notifies the Clearing Office of the other country (which for this purpose is a debtor Clearing Office) of all the debts which have been declared against the other Clearing Office. (Id., Annex, par. 5, p. 355; p. 129.) As a debtor Clearing Office it informs the Clearing Office of the other country (which for that purpose is a Creditor Clearing Office) of all debts which have been admitted and of debts which are contested, in the latter case giving the grounds for the nonadmission of the debts. (Id.)

"Or, differently stated, the American Clearing Office notifies the German Clearing Office of all debts claimed by American citizens against Germans and of all claims admitted by American citizens in favor of Germans; and the German Clearing Office notifies the American Clearing Office of all debts admitted by Germans in favor of Americans and of all claims made by Germans against Americans.

"If any person makes a claim which in whole or in part is not admitted, he must pay by way of fine, interest at 5 per cent on the part not admitted. If any person denies liability of the whole or part of a debt claimed he shall pay by way of fine interest at 5 per cent on the amount with regard to which his refusal is disallowed. (Id., par. 10, p. 357; p. 130.) The amount recovered from these fines applies on the expenses of the Clearing Office. (Id.)

"Where any debt is not admitted in whole or in part, the two Clearing Offices (debtor and creditor) examine the matter jointly and endeavor to bring the parties to an agreement. (Id., par. 8, p. 357; p. 130.) Seemingly, if creditor and debtor are unable to reach an agreement, the two Clearing Offices may undertake to reach an agreement. (Id., par. 16, p. 361; p. 131.)

"If the Clearing Offices do not reach an agreement, the dispute shall be either referred to arbitration on terms agreed to by the parties or referred to the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal provided for in the Treaty. However, if the creditor Clearing Office so requests, the dispute shall be submitted to the jurisdiction of the courts of the place of domicile of the debtor (that is, an American claim would go to the German courts). (Id., par. 16, p. 361; p. 131.) Sums found due by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal or by the court or the tribunal agreed to by the parties shall be recovered through the Clearing Office, as if the sums were debts admitted by the debtor Clearing Office. (Id., par. 17, p. 361; p. 132.) In case an appeal is taken to the Mixed Tribunal from a decision of the Clearing Office, the appellant shall make a deposit against the costs. A fee of 5 per cent of the amount in dispute shall be charged in respect of all cases brought before the Mixed Tribunal and shall unless the tribunal directs otherwise be borne by the unsuccessful party. 'Such fee shall be added to the deposit referred to.' (Id., par. 20, p. 363; p. 132.)

"If the Clearing Offices or the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal hold that the claim does not fall within Article 296 (p. 347; p. 127), the creditor may prosecute the claim before the courts or otherwise as he may wish. (Id., par. 23, p. 365; p. 133.)

"Persons who have suffered injuries from acts of war and who admit owing debts shall not have their debts charged against them until the compensation due to such persons concerned in respect of such injuries has been paid. (Id., par. 14, p. 359; p. 131.)

"Unless an agreement otherwise is reached by the Governments concerned, debts shall carry interest in accordance with rules set out in the Treaty. (Id., par. 22, p. 363; p. 133.)

"Balances between the Clearing Offices shall be struck monthly and the credit balance paid in cash by the debtor State within a week. (Id., par. 11, p. 359; p. 131.)

"Statutes of limitation are suspended from the time of the presentation of the claim to the Clearing Office. (Id., par. 23, p. 365; p. 133.)

"Each Government defrays the expenses of the Clearing Office set up in its territory, including the salaries of the staff. (Id., par. 15, p. 361; p. 131.) Fines that may be levied (as above provided) are credited by the Clearing Office collecting them, which is responsible therefor to the other Clearing Office 'which shall retain them as a contribution towards the costs of carrying out the present provisions.' (Id., par. 10, p. 357; p. 130.) The expenses for postal and telegraphic communication through the intervention of the Clearing Offices by the debtors and creditors desirous of coming to agreement as to the amount of their debts shall be borne by the parties concerned. (Id., par. 5, p. 355; p. 129.)

"Debts shall be paid or credited in the currency of such one of the Allied and Associated Powers, their colonies or protectorates, of the British Dominions, of India, as may be concerned. If the debts are payable in some other currency, they shall be paid or credited in the currency of the country concerned, whether Allied or Associated Power, colony, protectorate, British Dominion, or India, at the prewar rate of exchange, which the treaty defines. If a contract provides for a fixed rate of exchange in the transaction, then the above provisions concerning the rate of exchange shall not apply. (Art. 296 (d), p. 351; p. 128.)

"The foregoing provisions may, however (as to matters provided for in Art. 297), be rendered inapplicable by notice to that effect to Germany on the part of the Allied or Associated Power concerned within six months of the coming into force of the present treaty. (Art. 296 (e), p. 351; p. 128.)

"The creditor Clearing Office pays to the individual creditor the sums due him out of the funds placed at its disposal by its own Government. (Art. 296, Annex, par. 9, p. 357; p. 130.)

"MEMORANDUM NO. 6.

"MIXED ARBITRAL TRIBUNAL.

"[Art. 304, and Annex, pp. 409–415; pp. 139–151.]

"Within three months of the coming into force of this treaty, the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal shall be established by each of the Allied and Associated Powers on the one hand and Germany on the other. Each tribunal is to consist of three members, one appointed by Germany, one appointed by the Allied and Associated Powers concerned, and the third, who is to be the president of the tribunal, shall be chosen by agreement of the two Governments, or that failing, by the Council of the League of Nations, and until that is set up, by M. Gustave Ador. The Council of the League and Mr. Ador shall name two other persons who may take the place of the president in case of need, and all three persons named by either of them must be nationals of powers who were neutral during the war.

"Where the number of cases before a tribunal justifies it, the personnel may be increased, and the tribunal may then sit in divisions.

"In case vacancies in personnel are not filled by the Governments concerned within one month, the members shall be chosen by the other Government from the two persons named as alternates for the presidency.

"Decisions shall be reached by a majority vote and shall be final.

"The jurisdiction of the tribunal shall relate to cases coming up to it from the Clearing Offices (provided for in Part X, Section III); cases in reference to compensation for damage done to nationals of the Allied or Associated Powers in Germany and also the adjustment of claims of nationals of new States and of States not entitled to share in the reparation payments made by Germany, and to cases arising under Sections V and III of Part X, none of which latter concern the United States because of reservations made in the Treaty.

"Each tribunal determines its own procedure, except as provided in the Annex to Article 304, which establishes the tribunal.

"Each Government pays the expenses of its own representative upon the tribunal and a proportionate part of the joint expenses, including the compensation, etc., of the president.

"The national courts of each of the parties are required to render all assistance in their power, particularly as regards transmitting notices and collecting evidence.

"There are no rules of law laid down by which the tribunals are to be guided, and the procedure is practically unprovided for on all matters pertaining thereto, except that it is stipulated that 'The tribunal shall decide all questions and matters submitted upon such evidence and information as may be furnished by the parties concerned.'

"The language in which the proceedings shall be conducted shall unless otherwise agreed be English, French, Italian, or Japanese, as may be determined by the Allied or Associated Power concerned.

"MEMORANDUM NO. 7.

"ADDITIONAL CONVENTIONS OR AGREEMENTS TO BE MADE.

"1. A further agreement to be made between France and Germany, dealing with the interests of the inhabitants of territories ceded to Germany in 1871. (Art. 53, p. 93; p. 35.)

"2. A special convention to determine the conditions for repayment, in marks, of the exceptional war expenditures advanced during the course of the war by Alsace-Lorraine, or by public bodies in Alsace-Lorraine. (Art. 58, p. 97; p. 36.)

"3. A special convention between France and Germany which shall be submitted to the approval of the Central Rhine Commission to fix the details particularly as regards financing of the administration of the port of Strasbourg and the port of Kehl. (Art. 65, p. 101; p. 38.)

"4. An agreement establishing frontier railway stations, it being stipulated in advance that on the Rhine frontier they shall be situated on the right bank. (Art. 67, p. 103; p. 39.)

"5. A special convention to determine the conditions and procedure of transferring of funds covering social insurance from the German Government to the French Government. (Art. 77, p. 111; p. 42.)

"6. A special convention between France and Germany, settling all questions not covered by the Treaty, as to competence, procedure, or administration of justice. (Art. 78, p. 113; p. 42.)

"7. Further convention between France and Germany covering all questions concerning Alsace-Lorraine, which are not regulated by Section V, and the Annex thereto of Part III, or by the general provisions of the Treaty. (Art. 79, p. 113; p. 42.)

"8. Subsequent agreements to decide questions not decided by the present Treaty which may arise in consequence of the cession of German territory to the Czecho-Slovak State. (Art. 86, p. 123; p. 46.)

"9. A treaty between the Czecho-Slovak State and the Principal Allied and Associated Powers, containing the provisions deemed necessary by the Powers to protect the inhabitants of the Czecho-Slovak State who differ from the majority of the population in race, language, or religion. (Art. 86, p. 123; p. 46.)

"10. A treaty between the Czecho-Slovak State and the Principal Allied and Associated Powers, containing such provisions as the Powers deem necessary to protect freedom of transit and equitable treatment of the commerce of other nations. (Art. 86, p. 123; p. 46.)

"11. A treaty between Poland and the Principal Allied and Associated Powers containing provisions deemed necessary by the Powers to protect the interests of the inhabitants of Poland who differ from the majority of the population in race, language, or religion. (Art. 93, p. 139; p. 52.)

"12. A treaty between Poland and the Principal Allied and Associated Powers containing the provisions deemed necessary by the Powers to protect freedom of transit and equitable treatment of the commerce of other nations. (Art. 93, p. 139; p. 52.)

"13. Convention between Germany and Poland (differences to be settled by the Council of the League of Nations) securing to Germany and to Poland, respectively, full and adequate railroad, telegraphic, and telephonic facilities over one another's territories. (Art. 98, p. 147; p. 55.)

"14. An agreement between the Principal Allied and Associated Powers of the one part, the Polish Government of another part, and the Free City of Danzig of a third part, relating to customs, use of waterways, docks, basins, wharves, etc., railway administration, postal, telegraphic, and telephonic communications; to provide against discrimination within the Free City of Danzig to the detriment of citizens of Poland, and other persons of Polish origin or speech; to provide that the foreign affairs of the Free City of Danzig shall be taken care of by the Polish Government. (Art. 104, p. 153; p. 57.)

"15. Further agreements to settle all other questions which may arise from the cession of territory made by Germany to the Principal Allies and Associated Powers, in establishing the Free City of Danzig. (Art. 108, p. 155; p. 58.)

"16. International agreements between the Allied and Associated Powers and the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg, fixing their relations. (Art. 40, p. 61; p. 23.)

"17. Special agreements regarding the interest on debts (these not necessarily entered into.) (Art. 296, Annex, par. 22, p. 363; p. 133.)

"18. Special conventions between the German Government and the Governments concerned covering social and State insurance in ceded territory. (Art. 312, p. 427; p. 156.)

"19. General convention drawn up by the Allied and Associated Powers, and approved by the League of Nations, relating to waterways recognized in such convention as having international character. (Art. 338, p. 449; p. 163.)

"20. Régime for the Danube, formulated by a conference of the Powers. (Art. 349, p. 457; p. 166.)

"21. Revision of the convention of Mannheim. (Art. 354, p. 459; p. 166.)

"22. A new convention to replace the Berne convention of 1890, covering the transportation of passengers, luggage, and goods by rail. (Art. 366, p. 473; p. 171.)

"23. General conventions regarding the international regime of transit, waterways, ports, or railways, which may be concluded by the Allied and Associated Powers with the approval of the League of Nations. (Art. 379, p. 483; p. 175.)

"24. Subsequent agreements covering all matters, not covered by the present Treaty, relating to the occupation of German territory by troops of the Allied and Associated Governments. (Art. 432, p. 521; p. 189.)

"(And see Table, Section VIII, Germany consents beforehand to any other treaties which the Allied or Associated Powers may make.)

"MEMORANDUM NO. 8.

"CONVENTION OR AGREEMENTS MADE BUT NOT SUBMITTED.

"The agreement for the division by the Allied and Associated Governments, in determined proportions, of the sums paid by Germany in satisfaction of claims. (Art. 237, p. 253; p. 93.)

Mr. HITCHCOCK. On behalf of the minority members of the Committee on Foreign Relations I desire to state that we hope to-morrow to be able to file our minority views in reply to the majority report of the committee.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 2976) relating to the issuance of passports; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. PITTMAN:

A bill (S. 2977) to amend section 8 of an act to provide for the sale of desert lands in certain States and Territories, approved March 3, 1877, as amended by an act to repeal timber culture laws, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1891; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. NEWBERRY:

A bill (S. 2978) to establish additional fish-cultural subsidiary stations in the State of Michigan; to the Committee on Fisheries.

By Mr. CURTIS:

A bill (S. 2979) to appropriate additional sums for Federal aid in the construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

A bill (S. 2980) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain widows and former widows of soldiers and sailors of the Civil War;

A bill (S. 2981) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain Army nurses; and

A bill (S. 2982) granting a pension to James W. Murphy (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. ELKINS:

A bill (S. 2983) granting an increase of pension to Robert L. Boseley; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KENDRICK:

A bill (S. 2984) authorizing the acquirement of a site and the construction of a building for a post office at Greybull, Wyo.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. SPENCER:

A bill (S. 2985) granting a pension to James W. Wilson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. NELSON:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 107) extending the provisions of the act of Congress approved the 22d day of May, 1918, entitled "An act to prevent in time of war departure from and entry into the United States contrary to the public safety"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CONTROL OF FOOD PRODUCTS.

Mr. DIAL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 8624) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Washington, it was Ordered, That the manuscript entitled "Discussion of river and harbor improvements by the United States, by Rinehart J. Swenson," presented to the Senate and referred to Committee on Printing, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, there having been no adverse report thereon.

ARTS AND CRAFTS EXPOSITION AT ST. LOUIS.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, there is to be held from October 15 to November 11 in the city of St. Louis an industrial arts and crafts exposition, the first of its kind in the United States. In behalf of my colleague, the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and myself I ask for the adoption of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 182) was read and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate learns with gratification of the proposed exposition of industrial arts and crafts which is to be held in St. Louis, Mo., from October 15 to November 11. The sole purpose of the exposition is to display manufactured and wrought articles combining beauty with utility for the purpose of arousing an interest in American designs and craftsmanship.

Particularly because it is the first exposition of its kind ever held in the United States it marks a step in advance in industrial art and deserves the support and approval of the American people alike from the standpoint of industry and from the standpoint of art.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I desire to lay before the Senate some facts in regard to this industrial exposition.

Every product of industry, the elements of utility and price being equal, possesses an additional commercial value in direct proportion to its attractiveness in appearance.

The rule is universal and applies to every industrial product—to furniture, to hardware, to clothing, to all things having practicable utility. Of any two articles, equal so far as utility and price are concerned, the one that possesses artistic merit has the more ready market.

In fact, it is often true that an article beautiful to look upon commands a far more ready sale than a competitive article of greater utility and strength that is unattractive to the eye.

It is as difficult to understand as it is unfortunate that in our industrial educational plans the United States has comparatively made no provision for art in industry. There are industrial schools that train for manufacture, that teach economy in production, but there is no provision for art in industry.

Other nations are forging ahead in this schooling. England has 40 schools of industrial arts and crafts; France has 30 industrial schools; Germany, before the war, led the world both in the number of schools of industrial art and in exploiting expositions; and what is true of these nations is strikingly true of Italy and of Japan.

Even the savage in primitive production seeks constantly for beauty and teaches his children, in the manufacture of pottery or beads or works of brass or articles of wear, to produce in color and in artistic lines an article that is beautiful to the eye as well as durable for usefulness.

The Industrial Arts and Crafts Exposition to be held in St. Louis for four weeks, beginning October 15, is the first such exposition to be held in the United States. It heralds a great national exposition along similar lines. It will call the attention of the country to our need of American industrial designers. We now depend upon Europe. There are 100 lines of trade in the United States that need to-day tens of thousands of designers for American patterns and for the development of American art, for at the present time our industrial enterprises either copy the designs of Europe or are almost entirely dependent upon industrial designers who have been educated in foreign schools.

This exposition will educate the people to appreciate and demand beauty in industrial production. It will make the stamp "Made in America" signify at once both beauty of design and efficiency of use. It will promote trade with the Latin Americans. Their love of the artistic is a hereditary characteristic. It will give added strength to our friendly competition with every other nation in the world in every industrial article man uses.

It is, Mr. President, from whatever angle you use it, a great step in American industrial progress and deserves the commendation which this resolution calls for.

If there is no objection, Mr. President, I ask that a few short articles upon this general subject may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE EXPOSITION.

[By F. E. A. Curley, secretary of the St. Louis Art League.]

"With general cooperation and the support of large interests in the city, the St. Louis Art League is organizing a St. Louis Exposition of Industrial Arts and Crafts, to open October 15 for four weeks, and a National Art Exposition to follow about a year later.

"For this year's big art show the league has engaged the old Southern Hotel Building, reminiscent of grand traditions, which with its spacious chambers and corridors offers remarkable opportunities for installation; and all will readily understand how St. Louis with the record of the greatest world's fair and other memorable civic achievements is going to set forth then and there an art exposition of outstanding and wide effect—how all the art spirit in this great community will be evoked and every means will be taken to make this the preeminent enterprise of the city—how the highest available forms of art will be displayed for their educational value and as public attractions; music and the varied forms of expressional arts which entertain as well as instruct will be drawn upon to the fullest extent to make a 'live show,' with the cooperation of the numerous specialized art organizations that lead in their respective art forms; how sentiment associated with the old St. Louis and the South and West, with pleasantly remembered forms of folk art, will be revived for this occasion.

"It will be recalled that Belgium had opened a big national exposition of industrial art at Brussels—Germany a gigantic International Kunstgewerbe Show at Cologne—and all Europe was quick with art spirit when the conflagration broke that has given America its wonderful opportunity to take leadership.

"The fact that this country is far behind as to availing itself of the arts of design makes it singularly appropriate that St. Louis, which appealed to the world with the trail-breaking Louisiana Purchase Exposition, should now undertake this greatly needed educational work of national import.

"Thus attempting a service to the country, we intend primarily a great educational influence upon ourselves, the people of St. Louis, and thus aspire to make our city a high place.

"In the work just outlined we strive for all possible cooperation, confident of the good will of patriotic Americans everywhere, and especially we believe that we shall serve the interests and deserve the cooperation of all those who have any business relationship with the arts.

"Follows a symposium by leaders whose qualifications to speak for the city will not be questioned."

GREAT OPPORTUNITY FOR ST. LOUIS.

[By George S. Johns, editor of the editorial page of the Post-Dispatch, chairman of the Exposition Committee.]

"The primary purpose of the Art League in originating and planning the St. Louis Exposition of Industrial Arts and Crafts is to awaken the business men to the importance of original designs in industry.

"Design is a fundamental necessity for industrial production. It enters as an essential factor in practically every branch of manufacture. The producer who considers utility only without regard to beauty will fail. He will be hopelessly handicapped in the market, because there is no purchaser quite so ignorant that he can not distinguish some marks or lines of beauty in the article he purchases, or judge between ugliness and sightliness. As public taste improves the demand for beauty combined with utility becomes more insistent and the judgment more critical.

"There are two phases of the question of providing original design in American industry: The first is the necessity of good design for ourselves for two reasons—one, the desirability of cultivating the taste for and the love of the beautiful in the articles that we use in everyday life, and thus adding to the joy of life; the other concerns the growing public taste among our own people and the satisfaction of this rising demand for good design in articles of common use.

"Another phase of the subject is the necessity of good design for American industrial products in competition for world trade.

"The close of the war marks the beginning of a tremendous opportunity for American business in the world market. We are now organizing branch banks and exchanges for the purpose of extending trade and carrying credits. Millions of dollars of investment will be put in banks, exchanges, shipping, industrial plants, commercial agencies, and all the factors necessary to American success in world trade. But of what avail will all of this organization and investment be if we can not deliver the goods? We must compete with the manufacturers of the world not alone in quality and price, but in design.

"Beauty of design, or line, form, color—the perfect combination of beauty and utility—is now a governing factor in salesmanship. Other things being equal, purchasers choose the more attractive and well-designed article. Many intelligent business men would rather have design than quality in the goods they sell. Attractive articles of inferior quality frequently sell better than unattractive articles of superior quality. The lines of an automobile is one of the principal arguments of the advertiser and the salesman. So with household furniture, clothing, every form of textile pottery, glassware, and a thousand other articles that might be mentioned.

"In preparing for this competition in the world market as well as the home market, where will the American manufacturer get the designs which he must have in order to compete successfully with the manufacturers of other nations? In the main hitherto we have either copied European designs or imported designers trained in European schools of design. We can do it no longer. Competition with copied designs will be a sorry failure. Europe no longer has the corps of designers from which we can draw; it has need of all its designers and is preparing to train many more. England has 40 schools of industrial arts and crafts. Craftsmanship is just as important as design. France has not less than 30. Germany before the war practically led all the rest in schools of design and in expositions of industrial arts and crafts. There is no doubt that this activity will be revived with tenfold intensity after the war.

"America lacks both schools of design and teachers of design. The few beginnings we have made in this direction are woefully inadequate to the needs of American industry. It has been estimated that there are at least 100 lines of trade in which original design is essential, and that we need now not less than 200,000 trained designers.

"American business men—for the subject is of vital interest not only to manufacturers but to all business men who handle their products—must awaken to the necessity of making adequate provision for this vital necessity.

"American industry should stand on its own feet hereafter and supply its own designs as well as its own goods. We should be wholly independent of any other nation. We should develop our own industrial arts and crafts—our own designers and craftsmen. .

"The St. Louis Art League proposes to begin the work of arousing the business men at home. We want to awaken the manufacturers and the business men in and around St. Louis. The first step is the St. Louis Exposition of Industrial Arts and Crafts. If this is successfully organized, it will demonstrate not only what St. Louis industries have, but what they need. If it does nothing more than demonstrate the needs of our industries in the way of designs and designers, crafts and craftsmen, it will accomplish a great end. It will be the beginning of better things.

"In order to make this exposition a success in fully covering the field which it occupies, it will be necessary to have the cooperation, not merely of the members of the Art League, but of all the industrial and business organizations in St. Louis and in the St. Louis industrial district. The best-laid plans will not succeed unless the manufacturers and business men vitally interested in this subject join with the Art League in making the exposition a thoroughgoing success.

"We need the backing of the business men. We need their moral and financial support. We need their cooperation in obtaining exhibits of St. Louis industries and of industrial products on sale in St. Louis. The exposition is limited only in name to St. Louis and the St. Louis industrial district; we shall not put up the bars against manufacturers who are interested in St. Louis or against designers or schools of design, or movements similar to the art-league movement in other cities.

"We hope in this preliminary St. Louis exposition to lay the foundation for a great national exposition, which will exhibit the industrial arts and crafts of the United States. We hope eventually to have an international exposition.

"For the Art League and the advisory committee I ask the active and liberal support and cooperation of all the interests and organizations in St. Louis and of all individual St. Louisans.

"The success of the exposition will be a long step forward toward industrial and commercial supremacy. Out of it undoubtedly will grow the adequate facilities for teaching and training designers and craftsmen who are necessary for our industries."

THE INDUSTRIAL ARTS AND CRAFTS EXPOSITION.

[By Clark McAdams, chairman of the Executive Committee of the St. Louis Art League.]

"In undertaking the Industrial Arts and Crafts Exposition the St. Louis Art League is making the most ambitious effort in its career to prove itself useful to the community. What such an exposition will mean to the community is abundantly revealed upon other pages. What it will mean to the Art League is the thing which concerns us here. No other American art organization, so far as we know, has thus deliberately linked itself with business. Why this is so is difficult to understand. Surely American industry needs art. That need, as more than one writer in this issue points out, is to be the greater from this time on, when we shall seek to compete in foreign markets with an American marine. Where are the American designers coming from in such a development? How are we to compete with the industrial art products of Germany, France, Italy, and Japan without having first trained American designers in the art of making manufactured things beautiful? The whole country is awakening to a realization of this. We are to have ships—but what are we to ship in them? We had not thought of that. We are thinking of it now. Every big city is moving to a common end of preparedness, and the Art League has taken the initiative in this movement in St. Louis. It ought to mean to the league a usefulness even beyond the expectation of its founders. It ought to mean to it greater strength and power. It ought to mean to it a stronger support from the community. It will mean these things. The league shall never come out of the time ahead as it went in. It shall come out immensely strengthened and proven—a real citizens' body in the promotion of art. They say in Chicago and some other cities that St. Louis is the best organized city in art in America. That probably is true. If it is not quite true, we are going to make it true; and its fruits shall be beautiful."

BLAZING THE PATHWAY.

[By Charles D. Platt, director of the St. Louis Exposition of Industrial Arts and Crafts.]

"My statement will deal only with some salient facts in relation to the St. Louis Exposition of Industrial Arts and Crafts as arranged by the St. Louis Art League, leading to a national exposition of similar character at a later date.

"From many sources and localities comes the testimony that the arts in America are coming into their own—a recognition brought about primarily through the war and its aftermath.

"In our work of rehabilitation, reconstruction, and looking forward into the future of world relations art looms up as one of the dominating factors.

"Art is destined to play a conspicuous part in the domain of world commerce, which beckons us with outstretched hands. For supremacy in design America is sadly in need of trained craftsmen. But first we must study our needs, deficiencies, and accomplishments.

"A decade ago we had here in St. Louis a distinguished citizen—the late Dr. Halsey C. Ives—whose life ambition was the furtherance of distinctive American art, not only in painting and sculpture, but also in the arts and crafts—the applied arts. To show what art meant in dollars and cents, he frequently carried with him a common railroad spike, worth intrinsically only a few cents, and a candleholder made from a similar piece of metal through art craftsmanship was enhanced in value several dollars.

"The St. Louis Art League, an outgrowth of the old art museum membership, proposes to carry out the ideas so long advocated by Dr. Ives in a practical manner through an industrial arts exposition here in the fall.

"In this exposition will be shown art in its various relations to the world of commerce, with the idea of stimulating craftsmanship and developing American style, so that 'Made in America' shall be synonymous with beauty as well as utility. Americanization can best be stimulated through the arts—the highest form for inculcating American ideas.

"To introduce beauty and the love of the beautiful into the lives of the people is the surest cure for social unrest. Take away the saloon and the substitution of beauty is imperative. 'Beautiful St. Louis' will be an asset second to none in drawing to itself and holding a gratified and contented people. Some cities, by making themselves less ugly, have increased real estate values 200 per cent. Beauty in the home means efficiency in the shop.

"No less an authority in practical matters than Charles M. Schwab pronounced in New York a few days ago that 'it is the duty of patriotic men and women to encourage movements which tend to develop the beautiful and the good. A successful civilization is one in which the love of the arts has been cultivated, and such a people need not fear Bolshevism.'

"Expositions of industrial art have been held successfully abroad, but St. Louis, the center of our population, will be the first city in America to blaze the pathway in this direction.

"Not only will there be 'still life' exhibits in this exhibition but processes will be illustrated; and it is proposed to have the arts deliver their messages to the public at the same time in various interpretations of music, drama, pageantry, interpretive dancing, etc., making a striking representation in this way of the things for which the St. Louis Art League stands in the community.

"There will be special lighting features and decorations, lecturers, and docents, talks on house planning and interior decoration, the 'city beautiful,' planting of shrubbery, and so on. Rooms will be built up before your eyes and a singer placed at the piano to sing a song or two, the audience joining in the chorus. Community service in the arts will be exemplified. Educational displays from the public schools, the School of Fine Arts, and demonstrations from hospitals in occupational therapy will be featured.

"The industrial life of this region will be in touch with the exposition at every point, whether it be through architecture, building materials, house furnishing, lighting devices, floral displays, the graphic arts, art metals, art fabrics of all descriptions, including fashions, leather novelties, art furniture, hardware labels, laces and embroideries, glass products, lithography, art dyes, art tiles, ornamental iron and bronze, art paints, awnings, photography, plastic relief work, printing processes, automobile accessories, saddlery, art shoes, fancy goods, stamping and enameling, terra cotta, upholstery, woodenware, theater and movie arts, and so on down the line.

"The Latin-American countries in particular demand artistry in the articles of commerce presented for their approval.

"As expositions of similar character when properly set forth and exploited have invariably netted certain sums of money for the organizations promoting the same, it is confidently expected that some moneys for future art-league activities in furthering the national exposition from suitable headquarters will be forthcoming.

"The Industrial Arts Exposition will occupy the Southern Hotel Building. The Southern Hotel was one of the most famous hostelries in the United States. With parlors, ballrooms, cafés, buffets, its many high-ceilinged rooms, and immense corridors, it provides the variety of room and space so necessary to exhibition purposes. Extending from Broadway or Fifth Street east to Fourth Street and from Walnut to Elm Street, the Southern Hotel Building is easily accessible from all parts of the city."

AMERICAN MADE FROM THE GROUND UP.

[By Jackson Johnson, chairman of the board of the International Shoe Co. and president of the St. Louis Chamber of Commerce.]

"The reconstruction of American business is bringing us face to face with many new conditions, the least important of which is by no means the question of designs. We can no longer look to Europe, with its training schools for applied art, to supply us designers. Their members have been greatly depleted by the war, and for the next decade Europe will retain all such well-trained men.

"America for the first time, and this is particularly true of St. Louis, is going forth to foreign nations of the world with her merchandise. There will be the keenest sort of competition between the greater nations of the world for this business. America will find herself selling to a class of trade that has been educated to seeking an article of utility plus one of appealing form and color. Usefulness, of course, is always the first essential, but our foreign customers, perhaps more than our domestic market, have been trained to seek articles expressed in design of pleasing form. Taste must be the keynote of American industry if we expect to compete successfully for our share of the vast foreign business. More especially does this apply to St. Louis, because we in this industrial center are making a bid for the big portion of Latin-American trade, which naturally belongs to us through the advantage of direct water-borne commerce. The Latin American is especially attracted and educated to the artistry of ordinary everyday merchandise.

"I construe art in industry to even extend to the manner in which we pack our foreign shipments. For instance, we have found through experience that this one small item has been one of the most serious drawbacks to an increase of foreign trading, because we did not understand the conditions under which the merchandise we were shipping would be handled and received; consequently the form in which we sent it was wholly unsatisfactory. This is all being changed through the application of our experience in this respect, and the successful packing and handling of our foreign shipments is, to my mind, but another phase of applied art in industry.

"The great industrial struggle for foreign trade must include the art value. The United States can not expect to create wares that will compete in the markets of the world so long as Europe dominates the field of designing art. Our goods must be after patterns and shapes of our own—distinctively American.

"We all know the advantage of a trade-mark, the big selling phase of a popularized brand. That is exactly the idea in truly American designs for our merchandise. I know, and all the business men know, the wonders which American minds accomplish once they assume the initiative. Once directed along the lines of applied arts, the style and design in which our goods will reach foreign markets will be such as to retain the trade once secured. The patterns and models will appeal to the people they are made for—that's America's way when once started—and this appeal will hold them to the distinctively American article, purchasable only on the American market.

"So you see that in the readjustment of world trade good designing will not only be an investment but an asset. The objects of manufactured production must from now on possess more and more the inspiration of original designs—truly American trade.

"Art and industry at first mention do not seem to have analogous meanings, mainly because in this country we have until now failed to actually associate the two as commercial factors. Although we pride ourselves on being strictly adaptable to new requirements, we still think of art as pictures, sculptures, architecture, or music. Yet gradually, under the guise of advertising, window displays, etc., we have been admitting art into our realms of commerce. But the so-called higher arts and the application of art to industry have interested me only casually, because I am not in any sense a connoisseur of either, as some of my experience along this line has proven. But recently the importance of applied art has been brought forcefully to my attention in a purely business way. For example, the subdivision of our members' conferences composed of tailors recently stated that they were faced with a serious shortage of designing tailors, because the supply coming up through the ranks was not sufficient for their needs. They stated that the tailoring business was almost wholly dependent upon the influx of immigrants for their supply of cutters and designers, and that the bulk of these men came from Russia, and consequently none have been available since 1914.

"A little investigation showed me that since the World War started approximately 5,000,000 foreigners have been cut off from immigrating into the United States. The majority of these were, of course, of the common labor variety, whose absence is not in this article under consideration; but numbered among them were the designers, tailors, the superskilled originators of industrial patterns, upon whom America has been, unfortunately, largely dependent for its manufacturing designs.

"Now, the tailoring business is but a very small portion of our commercial life which is being confronted with the same situation. To Americans manufacturing has truly meant 'big business'; in other words, achieving a large selling figure.

"We have gone pellmell after bulk production, producing our output largely after the design of foreign makers or after patterns furnished us in this country by foreign-trained applied artists.

"So many people believe that art in industry means fancy work or overelaboration. It has no such meaning. No filigree or gimcrack work, unless that so happens to harmonize with the entire lines of the article of manufacture.

"I understand that there are more than a hundred trades demanding designers—artists in industry.

"We make, for example, about 10 per cent of the furniture of the country, and artistry of design plays an important rôle in this industry. St. Louis's printing industry is about 12 per cent of the Nation's production, and graphic art, a closely allied trade, is one of the most emphasized among foreign applied-art schools. The same improvement of our leadership through arts and crafts training could be applied to all of our industries—shoes, hardware, tile, woodenware, jewelry, metal stamping, etc.

"To be sure, skilled craftsmen of this sort could not be produced overnight. In Europe it takes a six years' course, starting at 16 or 17 years of age, four years' general and two years' special training in applied art; but education along these lines seems our only remedy.

"An industrial-arts exhibit is to be held in St. Louis this year. This will go far toward demonstrating the necessity of combining beauty with utility in our St. Louis plants, all of whom, our own plants included, have paid but little heed to art's relation to commerce.

"An impression such as an exhibit of this sort is bound to make should foster a general demand for a great school of industrial art in St. Louis, an institution in which fundamental instruction in the art trades will augment in the Central West the number of high-class designers and original craftsmen, which will in turn increase our industrial domination and world trade.

"There are few such schools in America. With the Rankin Trade School, distinctively a St. Louis institution, and our two big universities to form the nucleus for such an American seat of applied-art learning, St. Louis could early establish an American leadership in this respect."

BUSINESS MANAGERS, ART, AND EFFICIENCY.

[By Sam Hellman, editor the Republic.]

"Among other natural causes of industrial unrest is the leveling of workers to the sordid task of reproducing ugly things. A sense of depression, a hopelessness, goes with the helpless reiteration of what is ugly and uninspiring. The laissez faire system that holds too much of manhood down toward mere machinery is a bad side of our vaunted industrial era. We have abandoned or neglected ideality in the arts because that quality was not inherent in the machines upon which we have come to completely depend—somewhat as a slave-owning people take an impress from the ostensibly subservient race that thus becomes an exaggerated Frankenstein. Absorbed in replacing sinews by stronger, quicker, cheaper, mechanical levers and bands for profit, we have somewhat overlooked the creative association of sinews with brains in the higher and more human industrial arts.

"Next to one who imagines and creates a beautiful thing is the one who enjoys it and helps to reproduce its beauty for the enjoyment of others. With every effort that has the ideal of beauty before it, is there not an exultation? Surely the joy of the worker in the production of a more beautiful thing, through higher workmanship and finer use of machinery, should be a vital factor in that contentment which captains of industry now desire.

"'The Lord looked upon what he had done and saw that it was good.' That was his recompense. Who can doubt that, could he look upon the work of his hand and recognize beauty, the industrial worker of America would consider it in some sort a recompense? He must indeed feel depressed and trodden down often enough in the thought that all his labor is for what has but the spirit of blind moneygrubbing—all for a short-sighted utilitarianism in whose eyes art is a ghost unbelieved in.

"It may not be so easy for business managers to see this. No doubt it is easier for them to understand the worker's stomach, which they know will not now be too content with the old tin pail, or his skin, which it is now understood responds glowingly to a cool shower bath, or even his end-of-the-day cousinship to 'the tired business man,' which calls for motion pictures and picnics; but has he not, too, his spirit, his soul?

"For some workers the need of individual expression, of spiritual expansion, is absolute. Shut in and bound about with conditions that may not prove onerous to their less imaginative coworkers, it is precisely these men and women of finer possibilities who are directly antagonized by a system ignoring the quality they would so gladly contribute. They are, indeed, an asset wasted and denied, the talent thrown away by the nation. Art in industry would open the door for this individual expression, this creative power, and in doing so would open the doors of the ports all over the world to the model products of the United States.

"In this latter fact, because the world loves beauty, is the far-reaching commercial appeal of the movement for better American design. The direct appeal to the 'practical minded,' both among business men and wage workers, is, of course, in this fact, that beautiful things are worth more money, and that those who make them can 'make more money.' Much is being said about the world's trade, looked upon now as in a state of flux and more than usually susceptible to influence, and the most obvious thing about the St. Louis Exposition of Industrial Arts and Crafts is that in educating the American manufacturer, the American workman, the American merchant, to an understanding of just how art can be utilized in commerce it will be a large factor in drawing trade, and better trade, to St. Louis.

"An adequate exposition of art in St. Louis will open the eyes of our people not only to the value of art in expanding commerce, but also to its subtler value, as it renders more worth the living the life that our industries and commerce buy. We should learn now what true art, public art, municipal art, community art, can do to make more beautiful the city, its common places, its homes, and its hours of work and play. In such an enterprise there is hardly an organization or group of St. Louisans without a place. The opportunities open before us. Let all the city join to bring them into the foreground of reality."

THE BASIS OF INDUSTRIAL ART.

[By John G. Lonsdale, president of the National Bank of Commerce in St. Louis.]

"'Art for the dollar's sake' may sound rather offensive to some aesthetic ears, but it is the one appeal which will develop the designers and craftsmen which industrial America needs in such large numbers. The artists' calling must be made more attractive from a material viewpoint. We must arrive at the point where the young man with his dream of money and fame will ask himself: 'What shall I be—lawyer, banker, artist, or merchant?' Under existing conditions how many ambitious young men will include, or can afford to include, the calling of artist in the list of vocations open to them? Yet industrial art, under proper conditions of remuneration, should attract an able and idealistic element of our young manhood, for the highest faculty of the mind is that of creation, and creation is the very basis of industrial art. Those who regard 'Art for art's sake' as the only proper conception of the subject need not be concerned over the movement to commercialize artistic efforts. There will be many graduates into the field of fine arts, just as reportorial work on newspapers is so often the beginning of literary careers.

"It is hard for the average person to conceive of anyone who bears the title of 'artist' as being necessary to the personnel of a manufacturing establishment. Art is popularly thought of as an avocation rather than a vocation. And yet the creative powers of the artist have had some part in the production of 99 per cent of the manufactured articles and implements which minister to the wants and desires of civilized man in this age.

"The human race has departed very far from the stage when clothing merely served to cover the body or when furniture was constructed solely for the purpose of answering simple household needs. It is not sufficient that a thing possess utilitarian value; it must also possess that kind of beauty which harmonizes with the use to which the thing is to be put. A steam engine is artistically constructed when its appearance reflects power; a racing automobile when it reflects speed; a summer garment when it looks cool and light; and a winter garment when it appears snug and warm. Every phase of business is based on selling, while every kind of selling is an appeal to human nature. And what, pray, is more inherent in human nature than love of the beautiful?

"Industrial America has been accustomed to borrow either artists or artistry from other countries. But we must cease to borrow. Europe has no man power of any kind to spare us; her supply is too badly depleted. And, too, we have plans for the invasion of foreign markets which make it essential that there be originality of design in our manufactured goods. We can not continue to rely on quantity production to hold our place in the export fields. In satisfying Latin-American industrial tastes, especially will there be need of industrial artists who can cater to broad racial preferences as to the designing and packing of goods.

"On the whole, the situation confronting us is very peculiar. The American public, though its artistic sense is not as highly developed as in some other countries, is yet influenced more than it knows in its day-to-day purchases by the work of the industrial artist. Nor are the leaders of industry themselves fully aware of the importance of originality of design and craftsmanship in the products of their factories. Hence we have the anomalous situation of needing an army of industrial artists and yet not being conscious of the need. Under such circumstances only one thing will answer: It is education.

"The interest of the public in art and beauty must be more thoroughly awakened. Leaders of business should be aroused to the essentiality of art in industry. Then will arise a demand for industrial artists at attractive salaries, which demand in turn will provide students for the art schools to be established.

"The Exposition of Industrial Arts and Crafts in St. Louis is but the beginning of the movement. This exposition will put St. Louis to the fore in a necessary and laudable line of national endeavor. It will attract wide attention and possess great advertising and educational value. It should be liberally supported."

INDUSTRIAL ARTS AND CRAFTS.

[By Edward J. Troy, secretary Manufacturers' Association of St. Louis.]

"The imminent expansion of the trade and commerce of the Middle West, not only in the domestic but also in the foreign field, has created an acute demand for an exposition of certain products of this section, which appears to those in touch with the situation to be as necessary as are well-considered plans for actual trade expansion.

"We may talk and preach until we grow hoarse and tired concerning our resources and extensive manufactured products, but if we do not see them and feel them in the concrete all our vocalized effort resolves itself into visions of indefiniteness and glittering generalities. Every living inhabitant of this section has an interest, directly or indirectly, in selling its products to the world, and he can not keep selling the idea if he has not seen that in which he is to have a part in exploiting.

"The Louisiana Purchase Exposition was the greatest school ever attended by our people of the Middle West, and prior to it was the highly prized Annual St. Louis Exposition. Their lessons require an up-to-date review, and the session of the Missouri Legislature recently adjourned proposed to authorize a creditable exposition in St. Louis which would commemorate the admission of Missouri into the Union of States. Financial necessities only prevented the passage of the proposed legislation.

"Accordingly the plan of the St. Louis Art League for an industrial arts and crafts exposition can well be regarded as being not only opportune but in principle regarded as most desirable by our State legislators.

"During the period of war activity all efforts in the direction of exhibits and expositions were of necessity repressed, but the time has arrived when not only commercial necessity but the popular demand justifies the inauguration of enterprises of this character.

"It goes without saying that any creditable and complete presentation of the varied industrial art products of the manufacturing industries of this section will not only astonish and surprise visitors from our foreign-trade territory, but will also surprise and awaken our own citizens by the vast growth in quantity and variety of the output of the St. Louis industrial district."

THE ARTS AND THE RETAILERS.

[By Melville L. Wilkinson, president of the Scruggs-Vandervoort-Barney Dry Goods Co., president of the Mermod-Jaccard-King Jewelry Co., president of the Associated Retailers of St. Louis.]

"The modern department store at its best represents the choicest wares and manufactured products that are to be obtained at home or abroad. We search the markets of the world, and always in our thought and scrutiny and study is that quality of attractiveness, beauty in form or design—things that will give pleasure and gratification not only for their usefulness but for their pleasing qualities to the eye and to the soul.

"In comparatively recent years the great windows of the modern stores set forth daily for the education and attraction of the passers by, in beautiful colors and in unique settings, the choice productions of the loom and of the factory. The art of window dressing has become a highly specialized function, and the great merchandise emporiums have corps of people, competent designers and craftsmen, under highly paid specialists, who create daily visions of beauty and art that make picture galleries and interiors of home and beautifully gowned figurines with a touch of flowers or autumn leaves added to the setting—or what you will—giving the 'one touch of nature.'

"It would seem that we have everything in America to make a happy, contented, and prosperous people. But now we must go a step further and add something to the national life for which we have relied upon European countries in the past, either in the form of designs or in the bringing here of foreign designers. Here we have a great country, but it must be great not only in bulk—which does not truly constitute greatness—but our country must be great in the finer things of life, the intangible things, what Marshal Foch called 'the imponderables,' the things of beauty and spirit.

"The modern store is a great educational influence when properly set forth and is a place of exhibition itself; but we need from time to time expositions which point out particular needs and phases of industrial life, getting from them the inspiration for higher ideals in the different forms of expression which make for advancement along lines of practical endeavor.

"One of the paramount needs of the moment in this country is for American designs and designers in the arts and crafts, and for that reason we need the St. Louis Exposition of Industrial Arts and Crafts at the Southern Hotel Building this fall under the management of the St. Louis Art League. This exposition will certainly open our eyes in more ways than one, for we will doubtless find that there are many things in which we are lacking as to purely American design. But there will be presented for our edification, entertainment, and instruction many forms of American art industry and the exemplification of the arts and crafts that we did not know were in our midst.

"It is for the manufacturers to awaken to the needs of our country and provide the means of filling these needs, and it is for the retailers to aid and abet them in every way possible. So let us have a splendid industrial arts exposition this year and a national exposition of like character the year following at St. Louis."

THE WORLD APPRECIATION OF BEAUTY.

[By Frank W. Taylor, jr., managing editor of the St. Louis Star.]

"The decision of friends of art here to hold an exposition of industrial arts and crafts, showing the value of design in industries, is to be wholly commended and earnestly furthered by friends of St. Louis. Since the first caravan that bore the rich weaves of the East across to Europe, trade has followed the appeal to appreciation of the beautiful. When Venice could make this appeal the Italian mart succeeded Bagdad in drawing tribute from the trading world; when France drew out the wonderful spirit of her people and put it into myriad forms of useful things, the world yielded yet greater tribute; when practical Germany realized what France and England had done to beautify objects of household and personal use, and what was the influence of this process upon their relations with the world, the greatest human machine in history was set to the task of a similar development, and gradually the Koniglicher and Kaiserlichen institutions for the development of design in industry had their effect, and the slogan 'Made in Germany' rang round the world to keep the ministries of rival powers awake o' nights. This stage has again been brushed away, as the industrious spider's web might be, and the field is open now for American enterprise.

"It is to be a larger field than history has known, for the world is awakening to new desires, new appreciations, new idealties. Europe, now accepting American leadership in many things, will turn favorable eyes upon American industrial products if they combine attractiveness with economy. To the south is another great continent, which should look forward to the Delta of the Mississippi and to this great central city upon the river shores for many things. But the world contends for the trade of South America, and unless genuine American design replaces our ineffectual and indifferent following of French and German and other European art patterns in our manufactures all the propinquity which the Mississippi Valley possesses as compared with the Rhine will not prevail to turn into customers those down the river friends.

"We, too, must have schools of design. We also must have art-in-industry expositions. Our people, our workmen, our manufacturers, our salesmen, must learn discrimination between the fit and the ugly. Above all, perhaps, Americans must become familiar with the best that America produces and must come to a consciousness, whether reasoned or instinctive, of those consistencies in Americanism, those consistencies of spirit, which as they develop are destined to create an American art and command the admiration of the world.

"St. Louis in the Louisiana Purchase Exposition set an example of the expansion of the concept of art and, admitting artistic workmanship into the fine-arts department in an unexampled degree, brought nearer the day when the most appreciated art will be that which most serves the people through beautifying their environment, their utensils, their daily occupations.

"St. Louis now is to constitute better industrial design and workmanship a central idea in great art expositions, and out of this creative enterprise is to come a new American industrial era."

BEAUTY AND UTILITY IN THE HOME.

[By Mrs. B. F. Bush, formerly State chairman for Missouri of the Woman's Committee of the Council of National Defense.]

"So much depends upon the home and the environment of the growing generation that too much thought can not be given to the means for making attractive our housing for home dwellers, not only inside the dwelling but also the immediate surrounding.

"The Europeans, especially the French people, are great lovers of the home, and this intensifies the love for the land of their birth and makes for an intense patriotism. There are so many furnishings used abroad to which the distinguishing touch of art has lent its attractiveness to the necessary articles of everyday life that on returning to this country we are apt to miss something of this innate refinement in taste which so much adds to the joy of life.

"During the war England found it desirable to stop right in the middle of war operations and provide suitable housing conditions for its groups of war workers, calling them 'garden cities,' wherein were provided many attractive features both as to beauty and recreation. Several hundred million dollars were spent in this way and proved a good investment, as the added efficiency of the workers amid proper home surroundings made them more capable in their avocations, thereby making more than good any labor and time expended in this direction during the tremendously stressful period of the World War.

"We have relied upon foreign designers and craftsmen hitherto for our artistic inspirations, which were carried out in the finished product. But now we are at a standstill with this channel of supply cut off. We are left to our own resources, and it is necessary that we rise promptly to the emergency, as we always have when confronted by obstacles, difficulties, and dangers. In no better way, in my estimation, can the resources and the lack of resources in the industrial arts and crafts be better shown than in the exposition of the St. Louis Art League, to be held in the Southern Hotel Building in October.

"When confronted with the problem of such magnitude as presents itself in the field of design in this country at this time, the first thing to be done, from the standpoint of efficiency, is to make a survey of the arts and crafts as related to industry in this, our own regional district, thereby establishing a scale of display that can be properly and successfully utilized in furthering a national exposition of this character in St. Louis another year.

"The love of beauty is implanted in the human breast by the Creator of all things and can not be eradicated. It may be obscured or choked off or trampled upon by greed and shortsightedness, but it will rise, like truth, triumphant from the welter of base things and assume its true position in the universal plan for the enjoyment of mankind the world over.

"We must make of St. Louis a more beautiful city. We must make the homes of St. Louis and the immediate surroundings of the homes beautiful, for that is the only way to make of St. Louis the great city which natural location and advantages have destined it to be."

BEAUTY IN INDUSTRIAL PRODUCTS.

[By Casper S. Yost.]

"St. Louis is asked to step forward again as the leader in American art spirit. We are to encore our great performance of a world's fair that set a pace for the nations. An organization of St. Louisans has engaged an ample building, one intimately wrought with the fine old traditions that lie behind the "New St. Louis," and here we are to set forth in pictured and material array, with many attractive features to appeal to public interest, the invasion of art into a field which many Americans perhaps have fondly thought exempt or immune.

"We are to picture for ourselves and show the country what art means to industry and how it can expand the commerce of the United States. We have arrived where we should no longer be content merely to turn things out bigger and faster than anybody else, but must also make things better—must even make them beautiful. The world wants better things. Because of this the world has paid tribute to all the countries that have excelled in the arts, not in painting particularly, not in sculpture, but in weaving, in printing, in metal work, in pottery and ceramics—indeed, in a hundred, perhaps a thousand, directions of endeavor where attractiveness of design can be added to usefulness.

"It is truly time for American industrial captains to do more than consider the desirability of American leadership in this field, which the world regards as the finer and nobler side of manufactures and industries.

"We have not yet the strength to deny that the American business man has shrugged his shoulders somewhat at 'art'; it must be left to later writers, sustained by a background of achievement, to repel with indignation the charge that American business men could be so naive. But truly this shrugging of the shoulders has not been a criticism or denial of art, only a feeling that American industry had not yet attained the stage at which art should enter in. Of course, there could be no 'art' in a 'horseless carriage.' Art comes with the formation of character. It is indeed the business of art to interpret character in terms of beauty.

"But are we any longer in that 'horseless-carriage' stage of industrial advancement? Are we not, on the contrary, at the stage of the stream-line automobile, in which art and science find common voice and fulfill the spirit of the age in a harmonious expression of human aspirations and attainment?

"The arts of design will play a wonderful part in the America of immediately coming decades; and the American spirit, 'finding itself' in this illimitable vehicle of expression, modern art, will be felt as never before in every mart of the world. The St. Louis business men who are contributors to this symposium of St. Louis initiative and forethought put forth by the Art League will be proud of their foresightedness and of the leadership they have claimed for St. Louis. The St. Louis Exposition of Industrial Arts and Crafts should be made not only a national epoch marker but also a generative force for American supremacy in the world's new era."

ARTS AND CRAFTS AND THE WOMAN.

[By Mrs. George Gellhorn, president of the Missouri Woman's Suffrage Association.]

"'Woman's sphere is the home and its surroundings,' is a truism in which women glory. The longing to establish and beautify her individual home, and the home group, the city, state, and nation, is as natural to her as any other instinct. It is only when war, or other circumstances that are too strong for her, deny her the fulfillment of this craving that we see the home destroyed and the social group to which it belongs become a potential menace.

"To fight and protect the home is an instinct common to man and woman alike. In the World War, men and women of every nation fought, in the final analysis, for their homes; to protect these homes, if possible, and to prevent their future destruction by war. This ideal inspired heretofore unimagined sacrifices. The war is ended. Women may go back to their normal pursuit of home-making.

"Now comes the question, What are we going to do with our homes, with our country, with our national life? The answer is, that the great problems coming to us as an aftermath of the war must be confronted with the same zeal, energy, foresight, and whole-heartedness, that characterized this country during the period of storm and stress through which we have passed. We are hungry, after the cruelty of the last four years, for a better and brighter future, and beauty in every form.

"Where are we to look for help to beautify our American homes and cities and the lives lived in them? We have counted too long on help from outside. Owing to the 'shut-off' in the supply of European designs and designers we now realize the need for American designers and craftsmen. We want to furnish suitable goods of artistic merit for our home markets, and also to make our goods stand second to none in the marts of the world, which are open and eager to receive our manufactured products, provided that in addition to other excellencies they have the artistic finish and style essential to satisfy critical tastes.

"For the purpose of surveying our needs in this direction for this district, the St. Louis Art League has inaugurated the St. Louis Exposition of Industrial Arts and Crafts, to be held in the Southern Hotel Building in October.

"The women of St. Louis will welcome this opportunity to study the arts in their application to home-making—some women will play an intimate part in the exposition as designers and exhibitors; all women will cooperate in working for the success of the undertaking. St. Louis is to be congratulated upon having such a vitally far-reaching movement."

THE VALUE OF EXPOSITIONS.

[By John J. Burns, superintendent of the commercial department of the Laclede Gas Light Co.]

"A complete enumeration of the multifarious values of expositions that come to the mind of one after 12 years of personal experience with such enterprises would fill volumes. At best, therefore, the subject here can be discussed only in a general and rather summary manner.

"The benefits to be derived from an exposition usually can be classified in three distinct groups:

"First, its educational value to the community;

"Second, its commercial value to the exhibitors;

"Third, its financial value to the management.

"As a rule the success of any exposition is judged directly in the ratio of the benefits that accrue to each of these three interests. An exposition must first of all have a true educational value for the community, or at least for a large portion of it, before it brings anything of value to the exhibitors. The latter, in turn, must reap a tangible return for their investment in the shape of genuine publicity, business-meaning inquiries, or actual orders, before the undertaking may be considered a financial success by the managers.

"My experiences in the management of the first food show, in February of 1918, the second food show, in December, 1918, both conducted under the auspices of the Federal Food Administration, and the National Exposition and Household Show in May, 1919, conducted under the auspices of the St. Louis Community Kitchens Association, have convinced me that irrespective of the financial return to the management an exposition can not be considered a success unless it has engendered sufficient good will among both the public and the exhibitors to create a feeling of expectancy for a second performance. The St. Louis Exposition of Industrial Arts and Crafts leads up naturally to a national exposition a year later.

"The truly successful exposition does not merely afford entertainment for the curiosity seeking and an opportunity for souvenir or sample distribution for the exhibitor. That exposition is a genuine success which brings to its displays the worker, the business man, and the housewife seeking knowledge, not gifts, efficiency, not distraction. It is the latter exposition that has lasting and far-reaching effects. An educational feature of great value in the Industrial Arts Exposition will be the working 'processes' shown.

"It is my experience that the working exhibit is the most forceful kind. The wide-awake man and woman of to-day want to 'see how it is done.' The working exhibit leaves a correct and lasting impression. The still exhibit, on the other hand, is not to be derided; although leaving the method of operation at the mercy of the imagination of the visitors, it paves the way for understanding and appreciation.

"As to the St. Louis Exposition of Arts and Crafts, it occurs to me that its very location presages its success. There is a certain sentiment attached to the old Southern Hotel building that puts most St. Louisans in a receptive frame of mind. The mere sight or mention of the old building brings interesting recollections to many of us and this should be reflected in the quality and quantity of the attendance of an exposition here."

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, June 17, 1919.]

"INDUSTRIAL ART IN ST. LOUIS.

"The Exposition of Industrial Arts and Crafts which the St. Louis Art League has planned for October 15, in the Southern Hotel building, directs public attention to a subject of vital importance to American business. It ought to be of great value to St. Louis industry and trade.

"In extending its activities to the promotion of design and craftsmanship in industry, the Art League has placed St. Louis in the forefront of a nation-wide movement to this end. American leaders in finance, industry, commerce, and art have awakened to the necessity of providing original design and skilled craftsmanship to American industry. The purposes of the movement are several fold.

"One is cultural development of art standards and taste in articles of common use.

"Another is to meet competition in the home market and the world market.

"Design is a fundamental necessity of practically all industrial production. Good design—the combination of beauty with utility—is necessary to successful competition in trade. Other things being equal, the beauty of the model, the attractiveness of the design, is the winning point of salesmanship in all lines of trade, from clocks to chairs and from automobiles to stoves. It is one of the chief points of advertising. Hundreds of articles might be mentioned—architectural necessaries, house furniture, furnishings, and decorations, clothing, carpets, rugs, and other textiles; laces, brass, glass, and pottery—in which good design is essential to successful marketing. In a great variety of articles design takes precedence of quality.

"American business is preparing to enter competition in the world market on a large scale. We are organizing banks of exchange and credit systems and industrial plants and commercial agencies for the purpose. Of what avail will all these organizations and investments be if we can not deliver the goods that will sell?

"Hitherto American industry has copied designs from Europe for our domestic market or has used imported designers and craftsmen or American designers and craftsmen trained in European schools and by European teachers.

"Conditions have changed since the war. Europe has need of all her designers and is preparing to train many more. Great Britain has 40 schools of design and France at least 30 under Government encouragement. Germany before the war was a leader in schools of design and in exhibitions of industrial arts and crafts intended specifically to exchange ideas and stimulate originality of design and best combinations of beauty with utility in manufactures.

"In order to compete with Europe we must provide our own designers and craftsmen, and we ought to do it under any circumstances. American industry should stand upon its own feet and fight for business with its own standards of industrial arts and crafts. We must win supremacy in industrial art as we have won it in industrial organization and efficiency.

"The St. Louis exposition will give our manufacturers an opportunity to show what they have. If it also shows what they need and arouses them to a full realization of what our industry requires it will be invaluable. Out of it will come an effort to provide a sufficient supply of designers and craftsmen through adequate schools of design.

"It is understood that the exposition of next autumn is only preliminary to a greater exposition of national or international scope. Its success is dependent upon not only the interest but the active support and cooperation of business men. Surely they will realize how desirable it is that this first effort in this line of progress in St. Louis shall be an unqualified success."

[From the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, July 11, 1919.]

"INDUSTRIAL ARTS AND CRAFTS EXPOSITION.

"The St. Louis Art League is receiving cordial responses from the multitude of organizations it has invited to cooperate in making the four weeks' exposition of industrial arts and crafts, to begin at the old Southern Hotel building October 15, such a success as will attract attention to St. Louis from every direction. This is a matter that really concerns everybody interested in the material welfare of St. Louis. Even such as shudder at the word 'art'—because it brings to mind long-haired youths of eccentric dress, more eccentric ideas and irregular habits and their weird products, taken for picture puzzles until 'interpreted'—can appreciate industrial arts and crafts. This form of art does not mean gewgaws and gaudiness. There are designs for some articles that are often riotous, without offense to the most esthetic taste. Wall paper, for example, contains flowers that would make a botanist fear he had delirium tremens. No mathematician could classify all the figures on rugs. But how monotonous rooms would become without this nature faking? There is practically no part of a building or its contents whose appeal to the eye is not due to artistic cunning. This is especially true of the things of simple, unostentatious beauty.

"But art is concerned with almost all finished products, although many may be as amazed at the fact as Moliere's character was at learning he had been speaking prose without knowing it. There is scarcely an article of commerce, except raw materials, that does not owe much of its attractiveness to the designer and the skill of manual or mechanical execution. This applies not only to all cloths, jewelry, and gimcracks, but to all fabrics of wood and metal. It applies also to containers of all kinds. There must be quality, of course, to make an article a permanent success, but it would be difficult to overestimate the selling power of 'looks.' Hence, designing becomes a thing of vast commercial importance and art becomes intensely practical.

"A great manufacturing center like St. Louis can not longer depend on imported talent for this purpose. Neither can America rely on Europe, if it is to take its proper place in world commerce. We must have our own distinctive designs and they must not fall behind those of Europe. The St. Louis exposition will be a revelation and an inspiration and it should receive universal support."

"INDUSTRIAL ART.

"The Republic has been glad to support the big commercial and educational idea resulting in the St. Louis Exposition of Industrial Arts and Crafts, which is to be held in this city, opening October 15, for four weeks.

"The distinction comes naturally to St. Louis, of stepping into the country's leadership in this vital matter, and our city should the more whole-heartedly carry out a national service. St. Louis had a true public museum, an educational art institution, accessible to the people and open, free, every Sunday, in days when the Metropolitan Museum in New York (open except Sunday from 10 until 4) was 'public' but in name. In those early days, too, our St. Louis Museum had other unique, popular educational features, including free lectures to workmen and students on the application of art to industries. Later, the same spirit went out of St. Louis and its pioneer museum into the World's Columbian Exposition, when St. Louis lent its art director, Halsey C. Ives, to be chief of that exposition's art department, and the art department classification was broadened out, so as to include upon an equal basis of democratic spirit and fair appraisal all forms of application of the art principle in human works, without regard to media, but with all regard for excellence and originality.

There has been a vehement charge that democracy destroys art, and, therefore, is inimical to the high development of the race. Overleaping the fact that freedom ever has been the mother of true art, the charge rests upon certain obvious shortcomings of our own half-baked 'industrial era.' Democracy is viewed as a sort of leveling process, introducing a continuous social 'turnover' that unfortunately prevents the maintenance of a pet caste in contact with the beautiful and, therefore, capable of its appreciation. And democracy's answer is to spread beauty broadcast and make the beautiful accessible and appreciable by all, part of the environment of all.

"The first effect of modern machine production, of course, was to emphasize the argument against democracy by multiplying vastly the production of the commonplace. Yet ideality also can be served by the designer of machines, and some of the wonderful achievements in mechanical engineering have been in this field. The Jacquard loom, which may weave patterns at will in literally infinite variety, is but one example of a great development by which machinery can raise the standards of modern democracy above those of history, and in a double way freeing the worker from drudgery and anti-idealism, while bringing democracy and art together in the workshop and the home.

"The lands which are to claim the higher civilization, and whose works are to pervade and dominate the earth, are those whose machines are made to serve the ideals of the people, and not set up limitations upon ideality.

"More and more are machine products given purposeful form, and more and more does this purposefulness accommodate itself to—nay, insist upon—attractiveness and beauty.

"How far is our country to become a leader in this world movement? That issue is now being put to trial in St. Louis. Let us trust that, like the Chicago and St. Louis world's fairs, and perfecting what they and the old St. Louis Museum of Fine Arts began, the coming St. Louis Exposition shall mark an epoch of Americanization in art."

[From the St. Louis Times, July 14.]

"ART IN INDUSTRY.

"The enterprise of St. Louis in staging at this time a great educational exposition of art in industry, we may say, is characteristic of the truest Americanism. St. Louis is solidly constructive. We build. We have shown the country, in past operations, how the spirit of democracy and culture, with the interests of commerce, should go hand in hand to make this the unblemished land of human aspiration. We of St. Louis gave the world the greatest of fairs, and in its building we made art the keystone of the arch, setting precedents which long established 'art centers' are fain to recognize.

"Our action then widened the domain of art in the appreciation of the people, so as to include its application in unexampled degree. Now we are laying before the country the St. Louis Exposition of Industrial Arts and Crafts, as a pioneer educational step toward the great renaissance of art which surely must come as the crowning of our industrial era. Modern manufactures as they approach perfection must aim for and attain beauty. Anything less means a slur upon our civilization. And anything less so far as the United States are concerned—let us speak practically, in light of facts—means that our industrial products shall suffer in open competition and shall be driven from the marts of the world, or enjoy but precarious foothold.

"The practical immediate purpose of the Industrial Design Exposition, inaugurated by the St. Louis Art League and fostered by the Chamber of Commerce, Washington University, and other industrial, educational, and civic bodies, and to be held in the Southern Hotel Building, opening October 15 for four weeks, is to present a survey of our present state in this field, bringing out for appreciation and encouragement all that is best, and leading to an adequately organized national movement, with appropriate expositions, museums, and schools of design, and the varied means that have been found effective by other countries seeking to make their industries supreme in the eyes of the world."

[From the St. Louis Star, July 17.]

"AMERICAN ARTS AND CRAFTS.

"During recent years there has been growing thought along the line of developing an American school of design for the practical application of art in industry. For no apparent reason other than backwardness, America has left the creation of industrial design largely to European competitors. Europe continued a steady advance in the practical application of art in industry and America merely adopted the suggestions without any effort at American originality. More recently, however, American ideas have been emboldened to invade the field of industrial design. Now it is becoming the consensus of opinion that nothing except the necessary effort would be required to establish American preeminence in that field of endeavor.

"It is in the development of this movement that the St. Louis Art League is arranging for the St. Louis Exposition of Industrial Arts and Crafts to be held this fall. The exposition will be a pioneer affair. The plan is to follow it next year with a national exposition, after which, it is hoped, American schools of design will be established and industrial designing will become distinctively an American enterprise.

"It will be a pleasing distinction for St. Louis to be the pioneer in bringing about world-wide recognition of American types in art as embodied in industrial production. Once the American design in industrial art becomes firmly established, the American manufacturer will stand on an equal footing with manufacturers everywhere, in lines in which America heretofore has negligently taken second place to foreign competitors. The world is entering into a new industrial era, and it is particularly fitting that American industrial arts and crafts should have the benefit of every possible impetus. The exposition to be held in St. Louis will be an impetus of the needed kind."

[From the Reedy's Mirror, July 24.]

"FOR ART IN INDUSTRY.

"[By F. E. A. Curley.]

"Busy preparations are making for the pioneer St. Louis Exposition of Industrial Arts and Crafts, to be opened October 15, for four weeks' display at the Southern Hotel Building, under the initiative of the St. Louis Art League, with cooperation by the Chamber of Commerce, Washington University, and the other civic, educational, and business interests of the city.

"Indeed, two expositions are now in the making, the first a more distinctively local show in which the art that is in St. Louis will play a leading rôle, with exemplary exhibits from other parts of the country; the second, a more generally American and national show, for which this year's collection is to be the experimental forerunner and rehearsal. As the better American industries movement already is growing to be a first concern of reconstruction times, there may be vigorous competition yet for next year's event. At the moment, however, St. Louis leads, having been awake and waiting at the switch for the moment when its electricity could be turned on.

"In many a European city a beauty-in-every-day-things display beyond what St. Louis may get together would have been quickly assembled, and taken rather as a matter of course and routine—before the war. But in St. Louis, in America, we have had no expositions of design and workmanship. Most of us little realize 'what they are for.'

"A recent letter to Reedy's Mirror by Richard F. Bach, industrial arts associate at the Metropolitan Museum, New York, calling for united action to meet the urgent American business need for 50,000 designers, threw light upon this question. If the country must provide this number of industrial artists, St. Louis, for instance, should produce several thousand—but hardly is prepared to produce any. Yet a much larger number will be called for, as this vast country's business men wrestle seriously with the practical task before it, of competing 'on its own' with a deadly earnest world.

"Our museums will have to take a new progressive trend and a new lease on life to answer the requirements of a country that at last is finding the practical use for them. They must be modernized. The museum of to-morrow is to be as different from the museum of yesterday as the public library of to-day is different—radically, almost unrecognizably different—from the half-hearted, semi-hemi-demi-public institutions of several years ago, which was hedged about by restrictions and impracticalities separating it from popular utility. The American art school, too, must emerge from the stage in which it has sleepily imitated parent institutions that themselves represented only a narrow segment of art education abroad.

"A thorough stock taking of St. Louis as to art and all industrial refinement is to be one of the wholesome services of the more local exposition this year. A similar service for the country at large will, in itself, justify the more general national exposition next year.

"These pictures will not be wholly in somber colors. Admittedly far behind as to that practical appreciation of the beautiful which finds expression in attractive, self-advertising manufactures, Americans little realize how much fine art nevertheless has gone into American industrial productions, how many thousands of designers even now are utilized by our manufacturers and business men in the multifarious fields where beauty is a selling power, and how revealing an exposition we are destined to see this fall.

"It will be disclosed that, without waiting for the European war, the beginnings of an American renaissance in art already had come into view in the period following the World's Columbian and St. Louis World's Fairs. The war simply made the new movement a business necessity. Industries of creditable artistic merit have sprung up. The silk industries in New Jersey, the looms and furniture works of New York and New England, the furniture center at Grand Rapids, the Rookwood Pottery, the Newcomb Pottery, and various ceramic and glass works about the country, are examples. Miss Mary Powell, in a recent article in Reedy's Mirror, described a collection of silks and damasks from the Cheney Mills, of South Manchester, Conn., exhibited in her public library art department, as an incident of this development. These mills have worked up excellent designs by reproducing, adapting, and deriving from the work of other countries and times. How the museums may lend themselves to such industrial development is well instanced, for the New York, Boston, and Chicago museums contributed their stores of information to the Cheney designers.

"St. Louis has sporadically inaugurated better than she has continued in this field, again illustrating the need of organized support, such as is now undertaken. Thus there was, for a time, in St. Louis, before the war, the Ozark Pottery, in which Robert Porter Bringhurst did good work. Grand fire porcelains also were turned out here by Taxile Doat, a master of glaze and color mechanism, and by Mrs. Adelaide Alsop Robineau, who added a fine intuitive quality to excellent craft knowledge. Some of the work in copper, bronze, brass, and silver by Charles Percy Davis is worthy of noble art collections. Ceramic decoration by Mrs. Katherine E. Cherry has been acclaimed in other parts of the country. Pottery made by Henrietta Ord Jones, of the School of Fine Arts, also has found its best recognition in the eastern exhibitions. Bookbinding by Miss Baker and Miss Bulkley is well executed. There have been good carvers here. Plastic relief work done in St. Louis compares well with the architectural ornament produced in New York. Some of the costumes designed for the unique dramatic enterprises for which St. Louis has achieved some fame have been remarkably effective. Stage settings extemporized here have shown that St. Louis designers are familiar with the later phases of that art. Jewelry design is carried on individually by a number of clever young women of School of Fine Arts training, as well as upon a larger industrial scale by firms whose products vie in quality with those of other cities. This may be said also of leather work, bookbinding, toys, and other industries where art has entered. The list might be extended indefinitely, but here is enough to justify exhibitions which would familiarize people with some of the possibilities of the handicrafts and the factories.

"St. Louis is active in its aesthetic thinking, and already has gotten around to several notable undertakings in art. Its public schools have led in preparing the ground for a widespread elementary cultural education. 'Art instruction better adapted to the needs of industry is what we want,' writes Dr. John William Withers in a contribution to Reedy's Mirror, and further: 'The national taste must be elevated and refined. I am inclined to think that nobody knows this better than the successful business men who have been showing an increasing appreciation of art values of this sort in the character of their advertising. To take a concrete example, compare the window advertising of the down-town stores of to-day with what this was 10 or 15 years ago.'

"That there are many colonial handicraft and industry products possessing distinguished art qualities one hardly need be reminded, and the same has been true in some degree of every period since, the trouble lying in the rarity of the good work, and, to be frank, in the absence of the superlatively beautiful either as to design or execution. One comes occasionally on American examples that are inspiring, but not comparable with the wondrous things of other countries into which proficient craftsmen have woven their lives. We have had, perhaps, no supreme workmen, and only occasional artists who could put ideality and spirit into creative workmanship. Yet the Art Industrial Exposition, with American examples as well as educational loan collections of foreign achievement, will show us how dependent upon design even now are our modern American industries.

"What is the answer? Education! We have deemed ourselves the land of popular education, but we must begin at the beginning in this field. Discrimination can come only of acquaintanceship. The people must be familiarized with works of quality. This is the task for expositions, museums, and continual minor exhibitions, the press and the schools; the work also of factory, store, and advertiser—of all agencies by which the public mind may be appealed to. As the public learns to appreciate, the manufacturer must be taught to supply. Here, no doubt, the public itself must be the great teacher, and competition the rod of instruction. But these must send the business man back to the exposition for comparisons, to the museums for research, and to the school of design for technical ability. The business man has publics other than our own to which he must respond—of the foreign lands where he must compete and of the artistically creative lands whence his competitors send forth the world's last word. The business man to-day is of the world, rather than of a State or city—of a world which has access to his customers as well as a world of customers he wants to reach. And his customers everywhere are becoming accustomed to ask for art."

[From the Mississippi Valley Magazine for July, 1919.]

"SOUTH AMERICANS HAVE TASTES AND PREFERENCES—THEY CARE FOR ART, AND THEIR MARKET WILL PAY FOR ATTRACTIVE WARES—QUALITY, AS WELL AS QUANTITY, MUST BE A FACTOR IN OUR FOREIGN-TRADE DEVELOPMENT—THE ST. LOUIS EXPOSITION OF INDUSTRIAL ARTS AND CRAFTS.

"With its innumerable natural resources and illimitable opportunities for productive achievements by human labor, developing these resources to meet the needs of people everywhere, the problem of transporting its products to available markets forced itself into a position of first importance in the minds of people seeking the development of the Mississippi Valley, and their answer is the conversion of the valley into a tremendous artery of commerce.

"The outbursting pressure of millions of producers seeking markets became a great creative force, calling into being roads and railways and shipping until the valley States are bound together in a vast interlocking system of mutual support; producers ever asking improved transportation, and commerce requiring fuller and better production as a basis for expansion and service.

"With great achievements gained, we are looking farther south, beyond the valley, down what shall be an extension of this vast artery, and the pathway of future lines of commerce that are to bind together the Americas, industrially, as the States of the valley are bound to-day. What is to materialize these lanes of ships, these streams of cargoes? Simply the pressure of American industrial productions responding to the demands of the peoples, and seeking markets in the southern continent.

"But South Americans have tastes and preferences. They care for art. Their markets will pay for attractive wares, and they will turn from wares that are not attractive. Quality as well as quantity must needs be a great factor in this development.

"Two great industrial movements now dominate in the Mississippi Valley—the one a constant development of transportation to carry the products of the valley to a needy world; the other a constant improvement in productive power keeping the transportation facilities under pressure. Every forward step in either field, of course, affects the whole situation, and is of concern to all workers, in whatever branch of the infinite activities that make the valley States vital to the world.

"For these and many reasons it is peculiarly important that the big art industrial movement, now making itself felt in the country generally, should receive full attention here and have its full share of development along the Mississippi belt. These States so peculiarly linked up with the great continent to the south have a special interest in art as a feeder to industry and commerce, because the Latin peoples of the other Americas lay such stress upon attractiveness in the things they buy. More than our own people, they want and demand and insist upon good design in industrial products in form and color and lines. They insist that good judgment in these matters does not imply any deficiency in utility, but the contrary. Suitable color and finish and some refinement of form are regarded as evidencing the care and judgment necessary to guarantee good workmanship and satisfactory usefulness.

"As a matter of fact, the American public are becoming more and more of this same opinion, and home demand at last is greatly emphasizing the arguments of our prospective customers to the south. It is no secret that American manufacturers had a tendency to leave this side of their problem for future consideration while they concentrated upon quantitative production. It is equally certain that now the attention of the whole country is upon the importance of better quality, better design, and better workmanship in our industrial products.

"At the end of the war we find the United States with such a merchant marine as was undreamed of, and we talk of reaching all parts of the world, especially the southern continent, which peculiarly belongs to the Mississippi Valley, with the slogan 'Made in America.' 'We have the ships, we have the men, we have the money, too,' but not to the extent that we should have them—the commodities that our neighbors' ports are calling for!

"The St. Louis Exposition of Industrial Arts and Crafts, to be held in the Southern Hotel Building, opening October 15 for four weeks, therefore, will have vital bearings for readers of the Mississippi Valley Magazine. This exposition, initiated by the St. Louis Art League to modernize conceptions of art as well as industry, and backed by the chamber of commerce and other industrial interests, and by Washington University and educational and civic institutions of the city, and by numerous leading citizens as individuals, now is reaching out for the participation of the valley. Every industry and section should be represented, so far as possible, in this movement to fix attention upon present achievements as well as opportunities, in a direction upon which much stress is laid by millions of probable customers.

"In the Industrial Arts and Crafts Exposition, it is understood, all available products that have in them the element of design for appearance and beauty as well as the more obvious utility will be eligible for exhibition. As has been pointed out, the fact of representation in this exposition will be a sort of blue ribbon of industrial progress.

"The show to be held this autumn is preparatory to a great all-American display next year, and serves as an advance survey and stock taking for the Mississippi Valley in all fields of industrial refinement, and as a rehearsal for our part in the greater national exposition, which also is to be a Mississippi Valley enterprise.

"With these wide aspects, the St. Louis Exposition of Industrial Arts and Crafts is a timely revival in the art field of the western spirit of large achievement. When people think of what other countries have done in this great movement to perfect the modern industrial age through the practical application of art, it may seem surprising that it was left to the Mississippi Valley, and until now, to show the part that belongs to America.

"Yet it is not so surprising, for the West has shown the Nation in more ways than one how, contrary to outworn and shortsighted teachings, art belongs essentially to democracy and to our own times. Our World's Fair, where the art department was most visited and most popular of all, and where was raised a new and modern world standard for true art by admitting within the sacrosanct portals what formerly had been regarded as the 'humbler arts'; or again the wonderful Mardi Gras with which New Orleans has held the country's and the world's attention and kept alive a spirit of poetry and community art; or the Pageant and Masque of St. Louis, which was an art tribute to the history and the romance of the whole Mississippi Valley—these may stand out as illustrations. In the Sophie Newcomb College at New Orleans, with its beautiful and famous Newcomb pottery; in the pioneer development of the St. Louis School and Museum of Fine Arts under Halsey C. Ives, and in the Cincinnati Academy, the Art Institute of Chicago, and others, the Middle West has provided the country with splendid modern art educational institutions.

"All these past achievements associated with art and industry have been preparatory for the present movement to join together these elementary human objectives. The fact that we are undertaking a big national enterprise is clear when we but consider two things: The one, in how large a degree industrial and commercial leadership always have followed art leadership through the centuries; and the other, how essential it is that the new industrial era, which we hail as the achievement of modern invention and science, must at the very least rise to the standards of cruder ages as to quality. The day indeed has come to recognize that American quality must not be second rate, American products inferior in their story of human aspiring. The day is coming, if we may put the matter in the practical language of dollars and cents, when American commerce must go out into all the ports of the world, to win the respect and the trade of other countries, carrying American products that are not less but more attractive than those of other lands, and when we ourselves may acclaim and enjoy in the manufactures of our own land these finer attributes for which to-day we must yield the palm.

"That day is foreseen and prepared for in the Mississippi Valley's pioneer American art in industry exposition, now being staged for the present year and to be followed by the more general national exposition a year later, and by the establishment of American schools of design, all creating a much-needed impetus for that democratic and universal culture in which shall be embodied the essence of American art spirit."

INTERNATIONAL TELEGRAPHIC CONFERENCE (S. DOC. NO. 88).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In view of the provision contained in the deficiency act approved March 4, 1913, that "hereafter the Executive shall not extend or accept any invitation to participate in any international congress, conference, or like event without first having specific authority of law to do so," I transmit herewith for the consideration of the Congress and for its determination whether it will authorize the extension of the invitation, and the appropriation necessary to defray the expenses incident thereto, a report from the Secretary of State with reference to the proposed international conference to be held in Washington during October next, or at such later date as may be convenient to the powers concerned, to consider all international aspects of communication by land telegraphs, cables, and wireless telegraphy, and to make recommendations to the powers concerned with a view to providing the entire world with adequate facilities of this nature on a fair and equitable basis.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
10 September, 1919.

NATIONAL PROHIBITION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6810) to prohibit intoxicating beverages, and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. STERLING. Waiving what the RECORD shows in regard to the previous action by the Senate, I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. STERLING, Mr. NELSON, and Mr. OVERMAN conferees on the part of the Senate.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 6863. An act to regulate the height, area, and use of buildings in the District of Columbia and to create a zoning commission, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

PEACE TREATY AND LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, if there is no member of the Committee on Foreign Relations who desires to discuss the treaty and the league of nations this morning, and I am informed that there is none, I think it is perhaps no discourtesy to the committee if some one else goes ahead with the discussion in a general way, and as I have taken no time whatever in the discussion of the treaty or the league of nations, feeling it better to wait until the matter was before the Senate, I am going to occupy a little while in its discussion.

Those who have blazed the way in this discussion are entitled to the thanks of the American people as well as the Senate, and little can now be said to add to the views on both sides of this question heretofore presented so ably by Senators of marked ability. It would seem that into this discussion should come no question of politics, pride of opinion, arrogance, pique, or dislike for others. This most momentous question since the Civil War should be decided on broad lines, with an eye single to the welfare of the American Nation, and with thought likewise to the world with which our future must be somewhat intertwined. Let us face the situation as it is in this body. It has been charged that the American people are not having a square deal in the Senate; that there is an attempt to play politics; that there is dislike of the President entering into the question; that there is blind allegiance to him on the part of a large proportion of this body, and that they will not exercise any independent judgment; that there is unnecessary delay in the consideration of the treaty. Of course it is the finest indoor as well as outdoor sport in this country to pound the Senate of the United States. It may be true, unfortunately so, that there is some modicum of truth in these various allegations, but we have a practical situation here now that demands the attention of practical men and a solution by them, putting aside partisanship and every other immaterial question.

When the first covenant was presented, faulty and defective as it was, speeches were made showing the absolute perfection of the same. Blind party followers proclaimed it to be a perfect instrument. Some of our Democratic friends, realizing that the Democratic cupboard of issues was pretty bare, seized it at once as a political issue. Many Democrats upon that side of the Chamber commenced to burn incense to that particular covenant, even before they had read it. Prominent gentlemen who had been connected with various kinds of leagues in this country started out with liberal expense accounts to instruct the people. Meetings were held, resolutions passed demanding that Congress adopt the covenant just as then presented, although I venture to say that at most of these meetings there were not five people who had ever read the covenant of the league of nations, to say nothing of giving it any thought.

We were told that now we had the opportunity to secure something that would keep us out of war—not only during campaigns for President but permanently. Men who questioned that covenant were denounced as traitors. Some ministers suggested that they ought to be boiled in oil. We seemed almost to have returned to the days of the intolerance and hysteria of Salem witchcraftry. Those who always tell you the time of day when the President takes out his watch declared that the covenant as then presented simply must be adopted, because the President said so, and that the Senate had nothing to do with it but to smile its approval; and yet in the face of all this the covenant was taken back to Paris and amended.

The eminent commissioners at Paris—the most eminent of whom had been appointed by himself in the face of the hostile mandate of the American people at the last election—proceeded to try and patch up this covenant and make it presentable. It was then brought to us and placed upon the Vice President's desk with but little information, and the Foreign Relations Committee seem to have been trying to secure information ever since and have fairly well succeeded.

The second coming of the covenant was but little better than the first. However, the Democratic national chairman went around the country assembling the faithful at the State capitals and made enthusiastic speeches for the league, trying to make it a test of real democracy, although the President in his western speeches now says it is no party question. Democrats immediately commenced to charge in the Senate and elsewhere that opposition to the league was merely playing politics. The wisest ones of that party have refused to make it a test of party fealty to their everlasting credit. The American people want no politics in the adjustment of this question. It is a greater question than partisanship; not, however, greater than the Government as the President is reported to have said in a recent speech. The people themselves have had no opportunity to vote on this question as they ought to have, but we have statistics presented every once in a while on the floor as to the straw vote of some institution organized for various and sundry objects, the purpose of which no one is ever able to decipher and whose existence consists largely of letterheads. I think in the State of Kentucky there was a vote on the question which swept a Republican into Congress in a strong Democratic district on the issue of a league of nations. I have not heard those figures given on the floor by any supporter of the league of nations in its present form.

But, passing from such considerations, what are we to do with this treaty and this league of nations? Must we accept the league covenant in its present form or have no treaty at all? The Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] yesterday referred to the fact that the President had raised that issue in his State—and he likewise raised it in mine—that the treaty must either be taken with the league of nations in its present form or be rejected. I join with the Senator from Missouri in his statement that that is an unfair and false issue. The American people can not be befogged by the intrusion of any such issue. It affords a certain advantage to the proponents of the treaty in this discussion, because the world is heart weary of war. It wants no more of it. It is attempting to solve almost unsolvable problems. It is burdened with debt, staggering under the load of taxation, and it can not start on the return road to stable conditions until we have peace. Men in the Senate who believe we must reach some conclusion speedily and help the world back on its feet, and yet do not believe that the league of nations in its present proposed form will make for peace, but rather for war, have a troublesome proposition to solve. They want peace just as much as anyone but they insist that the league covenant must be Americanized.

I am not influenced by the cry that we must ratify the peace treaty immediately in order to resume trade relations with Germany. I am not particularly concerned about trade relations with Germany. Articles made in Germany will find no place in my home if I am able to have anything to say about it. We can get along without goods made by the cruel Huns who have exceeded in cruelty any horrors of all time. They can take their goods to a much warmer country than this, so far as I am concerned. It is hard to awaken in our hearts any sympathy for Germany. We have given too many of the boys of America; we have seen too much of the heartless cruelty, not only of German warriors, but of the people of Germany, and no appeals to sympathy or to establish trade relations will move the American people to any deep shedding of tears. No treaty could be too severe for Germany.

We are presented also with the troublesome question as to Shantung. It is as infamous and unholy as anything in history. What a farce and what a sham; what a betrayal of liberty, of self-determination; what an exhibition of hypocrisy is the whole Shantung matter; and yet we know if Shantung is voted out of the treaty, it will perhaps make any treaty impossible for a long period of time. So men hesitate to keep the world in an unsettled condition until that problem can be worked out. They are rather persuaded to believe that Japan may keep its promise, and are not desirous of affronting Japan and possibly driving this Nation into a war. I would not be willing to see American boys killed for the whole of the Shantung peninsula; for everything involved in the proposition, infamous as it is. If the league of nations had not been intertwined in the peace treaty, the Shantung proposition and the overpreponderance of the voting power of Britain would have been practically the only thing to have seriously delayed the ratifying of the treaty. The treaty could have been ratified ere this, and the responsibility for the delay is not on the Senate.

Now, we are hearing from the President's speeches in the West that the high cost of living is due to the delay of the Senate in ratifying the treaty; also that Bolshevism is beginning to raise its head as a result of Senate delay. Yesterday at St. Paul he added something as to the opposition being pro-German. I suppose if there is a drought in Texas, it will be due to this delay, and an early frost on the corn certainly could be attributable to it if it should fit the particular locality in which the President happens to be speaking. What a wonderful thing the league of nations is going to be. If the cost of living is too high, the league of nations will lower it; if it is too low, the league of nations will raise it; if the country is threatened with Bolshevism, take a dose of the league of nations; if pro-Germans are raising their heads, reach for the league of nations bottle; it will cure anything from rust in the oats to hookworm in the South. How did we ever get along without it so long as we have? The great delay has been in the peace conference, and the Senate is not responsible for that. Nonsense, even if uttered by a President, is still nonsense.

When the President, the sole representative, pulling strings that moved the four automatons at Paris who were labeled as commissioners but were nothing but stool pigeons sharing in extensive expense accounts, did as he said in his New York speech he would, intertwine the league of nations with this treaty, so that it could not be disconnected; so that it would all have to be ratified or rejected, he issued a threat which he came very nearly, if not entirely, putting into execution, but which threat reflects no credit upon him. He is the agent, it is true, to make treaties, but the Constitution has placed in the Senate the power to advise and consent, which is fully as great a power as to act as agent.

If I have an agent to make a contract, and it is subject to my advice and consent, to me is the chief power in the transaction. If that agent deliberately makes a contract and so intertwines things with it with which I may not desire to comply, but in the meantime having held himself out as my agent, people have relied upon him and rights have grown up, as a conscientious man I am put in the position of trying to carry it out if possible in order that injury may not result to others through the breach of my agent's agreement. But what could be said of the agent who did this? Out of a thing of this character can anyone secure a permanent place in the confidence of the American people? Was it a square deal? Could anyone imagine Lincoln, McKinley, or Theodore Roosevelt deliberately doing a thing of this kind?

However, by this unfair action we now find ourselves in a position where the league of nations can not be divorced from the treaty, and the world and our United States are in a mess and a muddle because of the action of the peace conference in intertwining these things; and now, having gotten the country into this mess, we are told by Democratic leaders upon the floor and by other self-constituted guardians of the Nation throughout the country, many of whom having been mentioned for President gather upon their face a presidential look and walk with a presidential strut, that the Senate must accept the treaty exactly as it is written. That is the issue now made in the West. Since when, I wonder, did any one man get the power in this country or in the Senate to tell the American people what they must do? That is the language of autocracy and not democracy. Since when has it become a wrong to question any action of the President? Since when has the right been taken from the Senate to consider a treaty at all merely because the President says it is a perfect document? Since when has the doctrine of his speeches been established of gibbeting men who do not agree with him? There will need to be a very large number of gibbets erected in the Nation. Have we really reached the one-man power in this country? Are the people really to be awed by such presence of greatness? Possibly some of them, but not many. To deliberately put the situation in the condition it now is and then tell the Senate what they must do, and go out to the country, with private trains at public expense, to start a back fire upon Senators does not sound like good Americanism. Nor do the speeches now being made by the President in the West indicate that calm deliberation that should characterize one in such exalted position. They indicate rather that wrath has taken the place of sound judgment on the throne of his mind.

The Senate is not going to be bulldozed. It has its duty to do and it proposes to do it. Its conscience will be its master, and it will endeavor to work out a plan to safeguard the interests of the Nation, for the Senate still believes in the Government of the United States of America, still has faith in the flag of the United States of America, still has confidence in the power and destiny of the United States of America, and, regardless of popular impression, the Senate of the United States is not composed of cowards, but of men fully as patriotic as the President, though perhaps less arrogant and more willing to concede the right of other people to do some thinking for themselves.

When this treaty first came up I think 80 per cent of the people of my State were for the league of nations. Some of the most powerful papers of the Republican Party were strongly advocating it, and are now. I set forth largely the same objections to it in March when out home that I raise now. It drew upon my head considerable of a flood of denunciation, especially from those who had not read the constitution of the league. It has always seemed to me wise to wait for the sound, sober, second judgment of the people, and that second judgment is generally right. And while it may be to-day that a majority of the people of my State are in favor of this covenant of the league of nations exactly as it is, I know there are not as many in favor of it as there were two or three months ago. A great majority of them favor some league to carry out the terms of the Paris conference. However, I say deliberately and measuring my words that if every man, woman, and child in the State of Iowa was for this covenant as now proposed, without any reservations, that I would not support it. Possibly it would be my duty to resign, and if I felt that my State was practically unanimously for it I would not hesitate to resign. But I say very frankly here and now that no amount of threatening, no talk about votes or elections, no attempted coercion will sway my judgment in the matter.

I have waited long and thought long and meditated much and my mind has reached a fixed conclusion that I would be a traitor to my convictions and that I would be doing an injury to the people of my State and my Nation to support this treaty with the proposed covenant of the league of nations as it now is. If my representation in this matter is not satisfactory to the people of my State, I will retire without any reluctance. There would be much more pleasure, anyway, in having a brick pile of your own than in being a target. I propose to live with myself and conscience for the balance of my life and to keep faith with it, and in doing so I shall vote for what seems to me best for the people of the whole United States and for the generations that are to come, regardless of what the sentiment in my State may be at this time; and if that is State treason, make the most of it. I have confidence to believe that in the years to come the people of my State will realize that a vote for the league in its present form, with no reservations safeguarding our country, would have been close to treason to my country.

Let us reason together about this matter. Nearly all the Republicans and some Democrats are pretty thoroughly united on the proposition that there must be reservations. A large proportion of the Republicans, I believe, are not willing to have the treaty slaughtered by every kind of an amendment being put upon it, but they are willing and most of them anxious for strong reservations that must be embodied in the ratification resolution; reservations that must be clear and mean something and not some innocuous resolution that amounts to nothing if passed, merely suggesting that we do not like the dose we are taking, but that we are going to take it. Mild reservations are cowardly reservations.

Now, why can we not unite as to these reservations that a great majority of the Senate believe in and quickly ratify? The Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] on yesterday uttered, I think, the sentiment of a great many men on this side of the Chamber, and I have never seen the matter better expressed than in a letter written by the Senator from Utah a few weeks ago to one of his constituents, which I had the privilege of reading. I wish that letter might be printed in the RECORD. It is not only one of the best statements of the situation but it is one of the most manly and courageous letters I have ever seen. I commend his courage when he wrote his constituent that he would do his duty in this matter as he saw it, even if he did not receive a vote in his State at the next election. If there were more of such spirit in the Senate, there would be more respect for it in the country. What do votes amount to, anyway, compared with conscientious performance of duty?

What reason is there that the Senate should not amend the treaty or adopt ratifications? Is the Senate not part of the treaty-making branch, or is it a mere automaton? Why have foreign nations any right to complain? They are held in international law to know the powers of the American Senate in treaty making. When they deal with this country in treaties they do so with full knowledge of that fact. They can not find fault with action upon the part of the Senate. Their hearts need not break if we exercise our constitutional rights. This doctrine was well expressed by Mr. Buchanan, Secretary of State, in instructions to Mr. McLane, minister to Great Britain, under date of February 26, 1846, when he said:

> The Federal Constitution has made the Senate, to a certain extent, a coordinate branch of the treaty-making power. Without their advice and consent no treaty can be concluded. This power could not be intrusted to wiser or better hands. Besides, in their legislative character, they constitute a portion of the war-making, as in their executive capacity they compose a part of the treaty-making power. A rejection of the British ultimatum might probably lead to war, and as a branch of the legislative power it would be incumbent upon them to authorize the necessary preparations to render this war successful. Under these considerations the President, in deference to the Senate and to the true theory of the constitutional responsibilities of the different branches of the Government, will forego his own opinions so far as to submit to that body any proposition which may be made by the British Government not in his judgment wholly inconsistent with the rights and honor of the country. Neither is the fact to be disguised that from the speeches and proceedings in the Senate it is probable that a proposition to adjust the Oregon question on the parallel of 49° would receive their favorable consideration.

I ask to insert in the RECORD without reading portions of a letter from Mr. Hamilton Fish, in 1869, to Mr. Motley.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> It is wholly unnecessary to say to statesmen of the intelligence which always marks those of the British Empire that the rejection of a treaty by the Senate of the United States implies no act of discourtesy to the Government with which the treaty may have been negotiated. The United States can enter into no treaty without the advice and consent of the Senate; and that advice and consent to be intelligent must be discriminating; and their refusal can be no subject of complainant and can give no occasion for dissatisfaction or criticism.

Mr. KENYON. We have amended and had reservations in other treaties. The Jay treaty was amended, or rather the ratification was advised and consented to on condition that an article be added to the treaty whereby it should be agreed to suspend the operation of so much of the twelfth article as related to the trade between the United States and the West Indies. This was agreed to by the British Government and ratifications exchanged. The treaty was not again submitted to the Senate. It is entirely probable here that all of the reservations insisted on could be agreed to by the other nations within a short space of time. If the larger nations agree to them, there is no question but that the smaller ones will immediately follow suit.

In the treaty with Tunis, signed in 1797, the Senate attached a condition that article 14 should be suspended, and advised the President to enter into further negotiations on the subject of the article. These changes were made. It is true that President Adams resubmitted these articles to the Senate.

In the ratification of the convention with France of September 30, 1800, the Senate struck out article 2, and other instances might be cited.

Suffice it to say that the Senate has the power to freely exercise its coordinate jurisdiction in treaty making by reservation or amendment, and has done so as late as 1900. It has the right to consent to ratification only if certain amendments be adopted, and if the consent of the other parties is obtained resubmission is not necessary. Of course, the act of ratification itself is for the President. The Senate merely advises and consents. If the amendment is such as to be not acceptable to the other party, then, of course, it is the end of the treaty. The President is under no compulsion to support the reservations and may pigeonhole the whole treaty if he desires.

I desire to discuss reservations in general and, to some extent, those of the committee.

The first essential reservation should be to make clear just how the United States can get out of the league whenever we desire upon proper notice. That is the most important of all the reservations. No one need fear that the United States would do an unjust act, and if fairly treated and it was doing a real work in the league, there need be no danger of or apprehension as to its policy in leaving. If this reservation were adopted, and also one limiting article 10—which I shall later discuss, and the one with reference to domestic questions—I would be willing to support the league, because I feel that these reservations are the real essence of the whole matter. If reservations of this kind are not adopted, I shall vote against the treaty, regardless of consequences. There seems to be misapprehension as to whether the language is clear on the point of leaving the league. The Senator from Virginia charged that we could leave whenever we pleased. The President, I think, takes the position that while there is no legal obligation to remain there might be some moral one, though I am not advised exactly as to his position.

The American people have had no opportunity to vote upon the subject of entering this league. We have no right to bind them to something where they can not get out without the consent of other nations. Making the matter clear gives them an opportunity to express themselves at the ballot box when this shall become an issue. And as sure as the sun rises and sets and the tide ebbs and flows this question will become a question for the American people to determine. Do you think you can deprive them of that right? "We, the people of the United States," formed this Government, and they will have something to say about changes in the structure of the Government. In my judgment, it is bound to be an issue in the next campaign, and it is our clear duty, in so much as we can not now secure a vote of the people upon this subject, to give them a chance to say they will go out of it without the aid or consent of any nation on earth and an opportunity to make that an issue in a campaign.

I do not mean that we must not have some alliance or entente to carry out the terms of the Paris treaty. We are involved in it now. We are in entangling alliances. It is nonsense to talk about keeping out of entangling alliances. We can not leave the situation at once and say we will have nothing to do with it, and we will not shirk our duty, but there is no reason why we should be bound up from now until eternity, compelled to take part in every squabble that Europe engages in and carry the world upon our back, for our shoulders are already somewhat heavy with war burdens. Our supreme duty, as I view it, is not to bind this United States so as to prevent the exercise of its free will. That is the all-important thing. The adoption of this reservation I have mentioned, and which is presented by the committee, would enable the American people to settle this question, and it is the only way they can have that privilege and at the same time have this treaty ratified within a reasonable period.

I do not raise the question that we must not give up some sovereignty. That is essential in every treaty, but I do insist that we shall not give up the exercise of free will to determine the affairs of our Nation. There is naturally much inquiry as to why we have to enter any agreement to go to the help of civilization. Have we ever entered such a thing in the past? Can we not be trusted? America by its policy has put itself in position where it could help save civilization. If it had been bound up by every kind of an entangling alliance, it might not have been able to have saved the world. For, while we may not say that the United States won the war, we can well say that without the United States the war would probably have been lost. But could we have done any better by France if we had had a treaty? Did France ever dream that 2,000,000 American boys would be fighting on their soil and helping to save their nation? Did we enter into any contract to go to the relief of distressed Cuba? Would it have been any stronger situation if we had? If civilization is perishing, must America enter a contract to do her part to save it?

France when at one time asked to enter a contract to help the Poles declined, thinking that she could best befriend them by reserving to herself her own freedom of will.

Lamartine in an address to the Poles on this subject in 1848, he being minister of foreign affairs, said:

> France owes you not only good wishes and tears, but moral and eventual assistance in return for the Polish blood with which you have bedewed every battle field in Europe during our great wars. France will pay her debt; rely on that; trust to the hearts of 36,000,000 Frenchmen. Only leave to France that which exclusively belongs to her—the season, the moment, and the form, of which Providence shall determine the choice and suitability to restore you without aggression or bloodshed to that place which is your due in the catalogue of nations.
> The provisional government will not suffer its policy to be changed by a foreign nation, however great the sympathy that may be inspired. Poland is dear to us, Italy is dear to us, all oppressed peoples are dear to us, but France to us is dearer than all, and the responsibilities of her destinies and possibly those of Europe rest with us.
> We as Frenchmen have not to consider the interests of Poland alone; we have to consider the universality of that European policy which corresponds to all the horizons of France.
> On the day when it shall seem to us that the moment has arrived for the resurrection of a nation unjustly effaced from the map we shall hasten to its assistance. But we have reserved to ourselves that which pertains to France alone—the choice of time, justice, and the reasons which would make it our duty to interfere.

Why should we not reserve to ourselves the time, justice, and reason which would make it our duty to interfere in the affairs of the world? Would we be in better shape to help? That thought can not be brushed aside by a wave of the hand. It will be ever recurring in this debate. In the Cuban affair and in the present war there was no one else to determine the course of the United States but the United States itself. Did it make a mistake? Is there any power on earth better able to determine what is necessary for humanity than the people of the United States? Do we need a council and an assembly to tell us when it is necessary to do our part of the world's work and advise us how to do it? When did we become so supine and powerless that we could not act on our own initiative? When has the world ever appealed for help in a righteous cause and America refused? It never will, but America must determine that question. No nation can do it as well, and league of nations or no league of nations, America will always determine it for herself. The greatest value that can come to any nation from the proposed league is that it would provide a method to talk things over before going to war. That is certainly helpful and desirous, and if it would result in delaying or avoiding war it would be worthy the object sought to be attained. We can not well pass up the opportunity for mutual discussion of wrongs and difficulties between nations.

Two other reservations are strongly advised—one to make the preservation of the Monroe doctrine certain and the other as to domestic matters.

The Monroe doctrine is a good deal of a fetish with the American people which they rather cherish. I have not been particularly alarmed about it with reference to this treaty because there is reference to it, and while it is called a regional understanding, yet there would be basis for the American people to claim that it is excluded. It seemed clear to me in the first covenant as presented that we absolutely surrendered the Monroe doctrine. It is not clear in this covenant, and true, like nearly everything else in the treaty, it is somewhat muddled, yet there is reference to it. I do not feel much alarm about that question.

Domestic questions should, of course, be protected and, I assume, will be. Nearly everyone agrees to that who is not an insane worshiper of forms.

The tariff, immigration, and other matters that might be suggested are purely within the domain of nations themselves, and I think there will be little difficulty in arranging that by satisfactory reservations.

ARTICLE 10.

I shall favor strong reservations to article 10. Its sponsors hardly seem to know what it means. Probably there is more controversy and feeling over it than any other provision of the treaty, except the Shantung infamy. If it is uncertain as to our obligations under article 10, why not make the language certain? Would it not be better to have some delay in the ratification of the treaty than to have misunderstandings provocative of future trouble? We hear from the proponents of this article that it is the keystone of the whole arch; that it gives confidence to smaller nations and prevents great nations from infringing on the rights of smaller ones. If that were all there was to article 10, there might be merit in it, but is that all? Does article 10 not preserve to the great powers, the monarchies of the world, everything that they have acquired? Does it not stifle the voice of oppressed people everywhere, and does it not blind their eyes in their struggle toward the light? Is it not more provocative of war than of peace?

Different constructions have been given to it by the various claimed authors. The highest authority, as I understand, on the subject suggests that it means a moral obligation and not a legal obligation. What is the use of pussyfooting around about article 10? What is the use of talking about moral obligations as distinguished from legal obligations with reference to international law? Of course, there is no way to force compliance with an international agreement by law. It is a moral obligation, enforceable only with battleships if the nations refuse to comply with it, but it is a high question of honor, and under article 10 we agree with other members of the league to undertake to respect and preserve as against territorial aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league.

The President, in his Indianapolis speech a few days ago and others that he has made, refers to this article 10 as going to the heart of this whole bad business; that the council of the league will advise what shall be done to enforce respect for that covenant; and that there is no compulsion upon us to take that advice, except the compulsion of good conscience and judgment; and that there can be no advice of the council on such subject without a unanimous vote. It seems to me this is not playing fair with the American people. We have had enough of the violation of agreements in the history of Germany of considering treaties mere scraps of paper. If the President's contention is correct, then under article 10 we simply do as we please, which is, of course, true in any event should we desire to utterly disregard the obligations of solemn, binding agreements.

Article 10 means just what it says. The very fact that there is so much attempt to explain it and brush aside its force shows that its proponents can not candidly face the issue. And if the time ever comes under article 10 that there is external aggression against a member of the league it would be our duty to assist in meeting that aggression, even to the point of arms. What is the use of trying to deny it? Face it squarely. Are we willing to do this? If we enter into that solemn binding obligation we must carry it out at whatever cost or else sacrifice national honor. If we do not propose to carry out this obligation let us say so now, and the Senate Foreign Relations Committee has said so in the reservation that they have proposed.

The President said in his Columbus address a few days ago that he had done the job over there in the way he promised the American people, and paid great tribute to himself for the way he had done it. And he said, "when this treaty is accepted men in khaki will not have to cross the seas again." In another speech on this trip our peripatetic Executive said, "will not have to cross the seas very soon." Again, if the newspaper reports are correct, quoting, "this league is the only arrangement which will prevent our sending our men abroad again very soon." What about this language? Is this a threat to the American people that if the league is not adopted there will be a sending of "our men" abroad again? And from whence does the authority come to the President to make such statement? Will "our men" have anything to say about it? Whose men are these that he talks about sending abroad to fight other people's battles? We have managed to get along for over 100 years without sending men abroad and there has been no league of nations. It would seem that even without a league of nations there was little necessity of sending men abroad. How easy it is to talk sacrifice for others. How easy it is to talk about sending other people's boys across the seas to fight in affairs with which we have no concern. The expense accounts now filed with us of the Paris commissioners do not indicate any great sacrifice. What sacrifice in the expense account of one technical adviser of $150,000? How hard it must have been to get along on that for six months. It is a sham to talk about sacrifice for others and not for ourselves.

Men stand here and argue that this treaty means perpetual peace, which everyone desires. And then when confronted with article 10, say, "Oh it is a mere moral obligation." Most men are stronger for carrying out moral obligations than legal obligations. As I view it, if the time ever comes when China tries to take back Shantung, assuming that Japan will not keep her word—which we all hope she will—we will find China and Japan arrayed against each other in war. China not only attempts to take back Shantung, but in the war invades Japan. Is there any question as to our obligation under article 10? Is there any doubt that it would be the duty of this country to assist Japan in fighting China? Of course, it may be answered that the matter must be submitted to arbitration or inquiry by the council. Suppose it does go to the council and the council is unanimous that Japan shall keep the rights she acquires in Shantung by this treaty. China refuses to comply with the report, and under article 12 she can go to war at the end of three months after the council makes its report. This seems to be the end of the road. China could, of course, be dropped from the league if she refused to obey the decree of the council, but is there anything left but war? Is there any question that it becomes external aggression against Japan? And there is only one way to preserve nations against external aggression, and that is by force of arms. And so under article 10 the situation may arise where the great Republic, dedicated to liberty, justice, and in these recent times to the doctrine of self-determination, finds itself in the position of trying to assist Japan in holding its stolen property. Where are the volunteers who will be pleased to go and fight in such a cause? We will need more alluring advertisements than those now posted for soldiers for Siberia. Will it be the men who sit in comfortable chairs, and especially those who have no boys to send? Will the boys in khaki go across the western sea this time? Will there be conscription to try and compel the boys of America to cross the sea and fight in the aid of other nations? Let us face it squarely and not dodge the question.

The President may ride through the country in his palatial de luxe train at the expense of the public and tell the people that section 10 does not mean attempting to send the boys of this country to fight for some boundary line in the Balkans or to repel an invasion of the kingdom of Hejaz, but the people are perfectly able to read section 10 and able to understand what territorial integrity and existing political independence and external aggression mean. They can not be permanently deceived. They believe in keeping a covenant once made. Talk to the mothers and fathers of America and see if they are willing that their boys shall be given for the cause of foreign nations? I had a letter a few days ago from a father in my State who had two boys in the war—one who had been blown to atoms in a shell hole. There was not enough left of him to pick up for burial, and the father stated in his letter he did not propose under article 10 to have his other boy sent to Turkey to police that country or to go anywhere else except he be sent in defense of the United States of America. He had a right to speak. He was not a member of any league where poll votes are taken once in a while and used on the floor of the Senate to show us that the people are in favor of the league of nations.

What concern is it of ours that Italy tries to secure Fiume? If gentlemen want to go and fight and help Italy secure Fiume that is their privilege, but they have no right to try and compel others who may not be so excited about the proposition to go and give up their lives if external aggression is exerted with relation to Fiume. In my judgment we have no power to conscript men and send them across the sea to fight for any nation but the United States. When they went across in this war they were fighting for the United States. The right of conscription would not have existed to send them across to fight for the 14 points.

Section 10 is said to be the keystone of the arch of this covenant. It is a rotten keystone and if the arch must depend upon this keystone it will go down. Red-blooded Americans, much as they desire peace, know that they have been deceived in being told that section 10 would make for peace. They know is has the seeds of war in it; that it is a war breeder. The soldiers who are returning from abroad know it and they are now protesting against it. They have seen enough of the jealousies of races. They are not willing to give their lives except for the United States of America, and when a foreign war becomes a war which involves our country as this one did, they are willing to go and they are willing to die, but they are not willing to die for other nations, and no man in Congress or elsewhere has a right to send them and compel them to give up their lives in the interest of some other nation and to fight other people's battles. "Our men," as the President calls them, are not merely waiting around to be told to go hither and thither wherever some foreign ruler may think it desirable and can influence the league of nations to that extent, and if this treaty is defeated our men will not be sent over the sea except in America's battles, and the President can not induce thoughtful Americans to believe otherwise. And mark it, presidential word or no presidential word, secret agreement or no secret agreement, these men who have something to say about their own life will not be coerced into fighting other nations' battles, and there is no power in heaven or earth that can make them do it. If they want to do it voluntarily, that is their own business, but no President is going to send them to do it, and the arrogance of such assertion becomes more a despot than the ruler of a free and enlightened people. The President is carried away by handclapping; by the desire of the people to pay respect to the great office; he has been carried to the point of abusing those who venture any opinions contrary to his.

We are told that article 10 does not prevent nations struggling to the light through revolution because it only applies to external aggression. When did any people throw off oppression and tyranny without the help of outsiders? Would we have been a Nation to-day without the help of France? Could Washington have succeeded at Yorktown without Rochambeau? Would he have had the spirit to go on and on without the gallantry of Lafayette? Was there not impetus to our cause in the French fleet appearing in New York Harbor?

If there had been a league of nations like the proposed one in those days, France could not have helped us. It would have been an external aggression upon English territory. When Cuba was struggling toward the light and the most barbarous practices were in vogue, her revolution could not have been successful without external aggression, and if we had had a league of nations then Cuba never would have been free.

When I went through Porto Rico a short time ago—she had been in the same situation as Cuba—and saw the American schools and the little children hungry for knowledge and development and progress and the getting of something for which the human heart yearned but knew not what it was, I thanked God that there had been no article 10 in any league of nations to have prevented the great American Republic from doing for mankind what it is doing for Cuba and Porto Rico. Tell me a revolution in all history that has not had external aid to make it successful.

These three reservations that I have suggested, namely, a way out without the aid or consent of any nation on earth, a limitation of section 10, and a clear statement as to domestic problems, will make the document worthy of trial. I shall also vote for an amendment to equalize the voting power of Britain and the United States. It would have been better, in my judgment, to have reduced the voting power of the British Empire rather than to have increased the voting power of the United States by amendment. That in itself is enough to arouse suspicion as to this whole proposition, and certainly a short-sighted policy on the part of Britain, for it will raise an antagonism in this country that will make certain, in my opinion, the defeat of the whole plan of the league of nations as soon as the people get a chance to vote on the question of getting out of it when that becomes an issue in this country. You can not go before the American people and successfully argue to them, no matter how large an expense account the orator may have in his pocket or how de luxe a special train may be, that it is right or fair for this Nation of 110,000,000 people to have one vote in the assembly and for Britain to have six. What will you say to your constituents on this question? What can any man say in trying to defend the giving of Britain six votes in the league of nations and the United States one? Has anybody defended it? I should enjoy sitting in an audience with hard-headed farmers of my State and listening to the defense. I have looked in vain for some defense of it by the President on this trip. It can not be defended unless we assume that Britain is a six times greater nation than ours. To what pusillanimous cowardice and sycophantism have we come? Mr. President, tell the people why you consented to this.

I do not share in the attempts in this country to create a feeling against Britain. These English-speaking nations must stand together for the peace of the world and for the preservation of civilization. We have had our troubles with Britain. We have felt that at all times she has not treated us fairly, and that is true. Probably she has had the same feeling about us, and had reason therefor; but it is time to cease the creation of friction between these nations. The enemies of civilization could well rejoice if these great nations, devoted to the highest ideals, should engage in a contest of extermination with each other.

How can anyone seek to belittle the British Empire and to raise animosity against it when he reflects upon what Britain did in this war? Had it not been for the British Navy the war would have been brought to our coast. Anyone who ever had the opportunity during that war to see the British Grand Fleet and those hundreds of fighting vessels knew that there was the first line of defense and there was the salvation of our country as well as the world. The spirit of Britain was manifest in that terrific drive in March—when the world waited and trembled, and where the gallant Scotchman, Haig, sent a thrill and note of determination to the world when he said, "Our backs are against the wall; Britain, stand and die." And Britain was ready to stand and would have given the life of every man, woman, and child, if necessary.

I was told of a great mound behind the lines in France, a thousand unknown British soldiers buried there, and a tablet above the mound on which was inscribed, "Tell Britain, ye who pass, that we who rest here died content." That was the spirit of Britain. She is not a perfect nation. She is looking out for herself; she is nationally selfish, but down beneath it all is a firm bedrock foundation of justice and righteousness.

If during the war that little island of England had sunk into the sea and fathoms above it had come the German hosts to our shores, if there were any peaks left you would find them covered with British Tommies fighting for the salvation of civilization. England has done us wrongs in the past. She is looking after herself now. We forgive her for her wrongs as long as she shows the right spirit, and we admire Britain for looking after herself. Would to God that the United States of America had some of the wisdom of Great Britain to look after its own affairs as well as the affairs of the world. Britain can not object to our demands for equal representation in the league. She must recognize the justice of our demand. It is nothing but the doctrine of the square deal.

Every now and then we are chided because we talk about isolation and about progress through isolation. Of course, isolation was our policy for practically 100 years. God gave this country geographical isolation. There is always an isolation of eminence, of success, of achievement. That was ours as a nation. When we took the Philippines that policy was changed, but surely there is a course between complete isolation on the one hand and complete entanglement in all the troubles and wars of Europe on the other. Should we not take a middle way? We are traveling necessarily along new and strange pathways. Let us make sure of our footing and not be carried away by the light of flattery, but follow the clearer light from the lamp of experience. Are we willing that all the world's guides who have followed the trail shall be cast aside for the new ones? Have we any faith left in the wisdom and patriotism of Washington, Jefferson, Lincoln, McKinley, and Roosevelt? Are we willing to give them all up, together with the traditions of the Republic, for some new, untried, romantic ideals that no one can explain, because no one, not even the authors, seems able to understand? We must go forward, of course. Our heads may be in the clouds, but we had better keep our feet on the earth. We must accept certain world burdens and responsibilities. It is a new age. We must have agreements between nations.

The question is not whether we shall go in the league at all, but whether we shall change this league and protect American rights. In other words, how far shall we go? Because men insist there must be changes in the proposed covenant, that America must be protected, does not argue that men in favor of changes are against every kind of a league or alliance. The doctrine is pure demagogism that it must be this particularly worded covenant or nothing. The words "put up or shut up" as used in a recent speech of the President can hardly be termed the coining of a new phrase. It is not equal to the term "too proud to fight," nor to another one, reported to have been used a few days ago, "that whereas in the past we had attended to our own business, now we are going to attend to everybody's business." Mind your own business has been a pretty good American doctrine, and we should do enough only in the business of foreigners to make certain that our own business is properly cared for. Would it not be well to be careful in considering the question of a league that we include America as a part of the world; that in the great world view we are asked to take of this matter we forget not the United States of America? Would it not be well to be careful that the great giant of America is not so covered with burdens and weighed down with matters not of its concern that it can not carry the necessary burden of keeping its own country the greatest of the world? It can not pursue its policy of progress if it is blind to the claims of the world, nor can it if it is chained to the dead institutions and teachings of the past, as exemplified in the monarchies of the world. They have not been willing to walk our way. Hence we were compelled to walk alone. In insisting upon the reservations presented by the Foreign Relations Committee we are presenting a league of nations that the majority of this Senate, I believe, is willing to accept. The league is to some extent Americanized by the reservations. The President in one of his speeches in the West said that opponents should present something; "either put up or shut up," I believe, was the presidential language. Well, the Senate has now "put up" to it the kind of a league of nations that men believe will not be harmful and that may result in some good. Let the President answer as to these reservations. What fault does he find in them?

Some little time ago Lord Robert Cecil, in pleading with the American people to ratify the league of nations, said:

> I see it suggested in some places that the United States should not accept membership in the league of nations because it might involve some sacrifices of national sovereignty. It would be foolish to deny that if nations are to make any organization for peace each of them must be content to modify in some degree, however slight, is liberty of action. That is the inevitable result of cooperation, and I do not wish to underrate the sacrifice involved.
> The United States, as some people are never tired of reminding us, came into the war at a comparatively late period, and, though she threw her whole heart into the struggle and spared no effort to victory, it necessarily followed that her actual sacrifices, both in men and material, were less than fell to the lot of some of her associates. On the other hand she declared at her entry that she sought no profit, either territorially or otherwise, and that declaration she has fulfilled. I doubt if there is any example in history of a nation which has taken part in a struggle of comparable magnitude which has at the end asked for no direct national reward. Yet America may feel that she has done this. That her national interests in the widest sense have been neglected is not true, for the greatest national interest of every civilized State is peace. America has striven for peace, but it has been peace without material reward. She has sought no territorial aggrandizement and no financial advantage.
> That is the glorious record, of which, if envy between our countries were possible, I should be envious. It would indeed be deplorable if, at the end of the conference, something happened to mar this record.

Of course, Sir Robert was interfering with our affairs a little before the proper time. He should at least have waited for the ratification of the league before trying to dictate the affairs of the United States. After such ratification, having six votes to our one, he might very properly have told us what to do and how to do it. Passing that, however, his closing words are worthy of consideration. "It would indeed be deplorable if, at the end of the conference, something happened to mar this record." Unworthy words! Is Britain now so shortsighted as not to see that while we have been her friend and will continue so, we do not desire to be her unequal partner? Does she not know that good friends might not so remain if compelled to be reluctant partners, especially unequal ones? Can we not remain friends without entering into partnership? Is it necessary to become partners with everyone in the world? The President seems to take the view that we must either be partners or antagonists. Well, if we must be partners, certainly we ought to be equal ones; but partnership is a relation to be entered into with care and with great consideration as to who the partners are to be. This treaty is fraught with trouble for the future relationship of Britain and the United States, because if adopted with this unequal vote in the assembly it is done by an unwilling Senate merely to preserve the status of the world during these troublesome times, and with a deep feeling of resentment that the United States has been bunkoed in the transaction. "Mar our record"! When the call came for help; when France was near the end; when Britain's back was to the wall, who responded? The Republic of America. When it seemed to France that she could not hold another day; when at Cantigny and Chateau-Thierry the most tremendous issue of the world was involved, what was it brought new cheer and hope. The voice of America. When the troops pressed on through the Argonne Forest a new flag led—it was the Flag of the Republic of Freedom. When the assaults started all down the line; when new armies with new vigor pressed forward to the last undoing of Germany, what put new force and vigor into the offense? It was the power of America. When the peace treaty came and other nations were scrambling for spoils, what was it that attempted to infuse into the assembly the new thought of no indemnity, no spoils, nothing but justice? It was the soul and spirit of America. The record is made. It can not be marred. The boys who are sleeping in the cemeteries of France, the legless, armless, sightless heroes of America, have made the record to stand for all time and eternity, never to be marred unless by the base, pusillanimous, cowardly surrender of the ideals for which these men fought and died, and the giving up of Americanism and the will of America to the dominion of foreign powers.

I trust our friends on the other side of the Chamber may come out of the valley of stubbornness. There are the necessary votes here to ratify this treaty with substantial reservations. They are not here to ratify it without. The votes are here to defeat the whole treaty regardless of consequences if reservations are not adopted. Make no mistake about that. Why try to deceive yourselves about it any longer? Why do your leaders keep talking about enough votes to ratify without reservations, that it is a fight to the finish, and so forth? If that is your doctrine, the finish is here. It can not be ratified and will not be unless reservations are adopted substantially like those presented by the Foreign Relations Committee. Abuse and villification, even from the highest sources of the land, will not change the minds of men who have given long, conscientious, deep thought to this subject and believe that ratification in the present form of the league of nations is a betrayal of this country. In standing for reservations they are not standing against any plan to carry out the terms of the Paris conference, they are not "contemptible quitters," nor are they mere time servers. They are trying to Americanize this league. They may reply to presidential billingsgate, to the charge of "contemptible quitters," that the most contemptible quitters in the history of the world were those who assembled with high ideals at the Paris conference and permitted Japan to take over Shantung in violation of some of the 14 points and in violation of the doctrine of self-determination and in violation of God's eternal justice. Come out of your stubbornness and join the men on this side of the Chamber who will vote for reservations, and then vote to ratify the treaty.

Suppose you could by any possibility adopt the treaty in its present form. Can you imagine what the situation would be in this Republic? The forces of America would turn and rend you when they realized that the Senate had ratified a league of nations where it was doubtful if we could get out of it without the consent of other nations. When the great bills for expense roll in—and we have had a sample in the scandalous outlay of the people's money in the Paris conference—when the host of deserving politicians secure soft jobs and sinecures; when the large part of the burden of carrying it is placed on the backs of our people; when the attempt is made to send American sons into Siberia and into the Balkans and into the uttermost parts of the earth, to police quarreling nations with whose affairs we have no concern, then woe to the body and woe to the men who are responsible for involving the American people in this thing. If you should adopt this covenant as it now is, you would hear from the American people in no unmistakable terms; adopt it as it is, and they will speak at the ballot box next year in a way that will make the Republican defeat in 1912 look like a triumphant victory to those who are running on a platform indorsing the league of nations exactly as it is. The result would be the inauguration of an administration at Washington that, while not blinded to world affairs, would, at least, be safe for the United States of America. [Applause in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The occupants of the galleries are constantly violating the rule of the Senate against applause. They seem to pay not the slightest attention to the rules of the Senate or to the Presiding Officer. Applause is not only in violation of the rules of the Senate, but it is distinctly distasteful to the Chair. The Chair makes speeches where there are no rules against applause, yet nobody ever applauds him, and the Chair is not going to sit here and hear other men applauded where there is a rule against it. [Laughter and applause in the galleries.]

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, in the course of the very admirable address which has just been delivered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] he referred to the statement recently made by the President in Indianapolis, or if not there in one of the speeches delivered on his present tour, to the effect that under the league of nations no American troops would be sent abroad.

I am well aware of the fact that the league of nations has not yet been adopted, but, Mr. President, while that is true it is at the same time true that we are at present cooperating with our recent allies upon the theory and along the lines on which the league of nations is to be conducted; and it is a further fact that at the moment the President made that statement the Fifth Infantry had been ordered to Camp Meade to be recruited for service abroad and is now there awaiting being brought up to the point of full military strength previous to being sent to Europe. It still needs 1,500 men. The Fiftieth Infantry also has been ordered to Camp Meade in order that it may be recruited up to full military strength, it requiring 1,000 men to bring it up to that point. As soon as those two regiments are brought to that state of military perfection they are to be sent abroad, according to the official statement of the War Department.

MR. FORD AND THE PRESIDENTIAL TOUR.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to occupy the time of the Senate for about 10 minutes on a phase of the question relating to the address of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON].

Mr. President, I greatly regret that I must descend from the sublime level occupied by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] in his very instructive address to the ridiculous of everyday procedure. In my State almost every newspaper outside of the metropolitan centers, meaning the down-State papers outside of Chicago, have received a notice or request which I desire to read. For instance, taking two samples of such newspapers, what is known as the Republican Leader of Marion, Ill., in the soft-coal belt in the southern part of the State, and the Evening Record, of Beardstown, Ill., in the Illinois River Valley, have received the same notice. It runs as follows:

TO THE EDITOR: The Mount Clemens (Mich.) News Bureau has arranged to send a correspondent with President Wilson on his special train when the speaking tour is made in behalf of the league of nations.

Daily reports of the reception accorded the President and his speeches will be furnished by the bureau in plate form of one or two columns free of charge, transportation paid, to such papers as desire them. A poll of the newspapers and a study of their interest in the President's efforts causes the belief that those papers which are advocating ratification of the covenant, but which do not receive wire reports, will find such a service of timely value to themselves and their readers.

There will be no connection with the work which the Mount Clemens News Bureau is doing on the Ford-Tribune libel case. The service will be confined exclusively to reporting the adoption by the country of the developments in the campaign for principles of a league of nations.

If you wish this service without cost to you, sign and mail the inclosed stamped order card at once so that you will be sure your name is on the list when the service starts.

Your, very truly,

WESTERN NEWSPAPER UNION.

This was on the 1st of August. Along about the 23d of August another notice was sent out, in substance the same, making a renewal of the request and explaining some delay that had occurred in the President's speaking tour as originally contemplated. The second notice I desire to have printed in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The notice referred to is as follows:

Because of the delay in the President starting his speaking tour on the league of nations, the Mount Clemens News Bureau has requested us to again offer you their service.

As stated in a previous letter, this bureau has arranged to send a correspondent on the train with the President.

Daily and weekly reports of the reception accorded the President and his speeches will be furnished by the bureau to such papers as desire the service in plate form of one or two columns free of charge, transportation paid.

The Mount Clemens News Bureau requests us to say that "there will be no connection with the work which the bureau has been doing on the Ford-Tribune libel case. The service now offered will be confined exclusively to reporting the developments in the campaign for the adoption by the country of the principles of the league of nations—that and nothing else."

If you wish this service without cost to you, sign and mail the inclosed stamped order card at once, as this will be the final order.

Yours, very truly,

WESTERN NEWSPAPER UNION.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. LODGE. I received one of those cards from the Mount Clemens News Service. I understand that is Mr. Ford's news service; that he owns the Mount Clemens Service, whatever it is. Is not that the case?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; I understand that that is correct.

Mr. LODGE. He is proposing to furnish the President's speeches in plate form free of charge to all the smaller newspapers of the country.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; and I think every newspaper outside of Chicago in my own State has received a similar signed, stamped postal card making the request that they use the matter.

Mr. LODGE. So that the President's publicity is being paid for in part by Mr. Ford.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; and I wish to say, commenting very briefly on this—I shall not occupy more than 5 or 10 minutes—that I have desired to place in the RECORD an article entitled "The President's Angel."

The Western Newspaper Union is offering "boiler-plate" matter concerning the President's second hegira from the seat of government at reduced rates. The first hegira was in December. Like a faithful Mohammedan, we begin to estimate time from the first or second hegira of the prophet and the flight of the faithful with him at that time. A casual reading of the offer, in fact, discloses that the only cost to the receiver is to sign and mail a stamped order card sent out by the news agency. The daily papers, outside of the metropolitan centers, are all besieged with offers to donate this gratuitous information. Almost anybody now can have the latest on what the President thinks on the peace treaty and the league of nations. This is no small boon, because what the President thinks to-day is no indication of what he will think to-morrow. The advantage of having daily bulletins on his mental processes and conclusions on or before sunrise is worth to the publisher of any country newspaper the trouble of signing the stamped card and depositing it in the United States mail.

An examination of the Western Newspaper Union, which I have taken the trouble to make, satisfies us that it is not an eleemosynary institution. Like other active news-gathering instrumentalities, it desires an income. While it recognizes that money is the root of all evil, it must pay rent and meet the customary demands of its employees. How it can do so by donating its news arouses curiosity. An investigation I have made. "We are pleased to announce," as the theatrical advertiser is wont to say, that Henry Ford is the financial angel that makes it possible for every household in the land to know what the Executive impresario is doing every day. Mr. Ford is commonly reputed to enjoy an annual income of $35,000,000. None of the performers in these acts need fear, therefore, any danger of being obliged to pawn their baggage or walk home. Henry's income is so ample that even the humblest member of the political chorus need have no fear. Mr. Ford is determined that the President shall have publicity. Stars often have difficulty in obtaining space in the newspapers. The very best of them at times have been compelled to resort to divers strategems to put something over on the wary advertising manager. They have been compelled to be robbed of their jewels, fall off the boat, wear bizarre raiment, and pose in sensational attitudes for the public press. None of these would be becoming to the Chief Magistrate of a free people, nor, I am pleased to say, will it be necessary, even, as long as Henry's income keeps up, for be it known that Mr. Ford and the President are two souls with but a single thought, two minds that blink as one. [Laughter.] The President is fortunate in such a promoter. Henry is intensely practical, possesses the aforesaid income, and cares not a whit for history, phrase making, or book learning of any kind. Indeed, he has frequently expressed his contempt for them. It has been intimated that Mr. Ford is short in supplies of this character. But no matter; the President is long on every kind of intellectual forage. Henry has the money, and our beloved President has the ideas. When the two combine, the public education can not suffer.

Henry himself had a most illuminating course of free advertising not long ago. The Chicago Tribune called him an anarchist and an ignoramus. There were some ornamental frills in addition to the foregoing undesirable epithets, but the backbone of the Tribune's misbehavior was the two named. Mr. Ford, on mature reflection, thought he could not stand the gaff. He had been very liberal in denouncing everybody else in paid advertisements, especially if they believed in preparing the country to defend itself; but, like most liberal distributors of invectives, he squeals louder than anybody else when he is given a stalwart dose of his own medicine. The more the Detroit jitney builder meditated the higher the damage to his character mounted. While nobody cared anything about whether he was an ignoramus, an anarchist, or just a plain pale-blue ass, yet when Henry sued the Tribune for a million dollars damages the public prepared to attend the exercises. No libel suit ever gave both plaintiff and defendant more publicity. Mr. Ford ought to be satisfied. I have no doubt the Tribune is. It could well afford to be generous in the matter of damages. What it proved about Henry ought to be enough to satisfy almost anybody. The jury reduced the damages considerably, discounting for cash, as it was admitted on the trial that the Tribune was solvent and would pay whatever was finally adjudged against it. The verdict of 6 cents allowed by a jury of the Tribune's peers—it would be difficult to find 12 men in the United States Ford's peers—will not go far on furnishing plate matter of the President's tour against the "contemptible quitters" on whom he lavishes his ornate vocabulary; but Henry's income from outside sources makes the venture reasonably safe. Any newspaper may confidently promise its readers a full set of the boiler plate of the President's latest trip, referred to in the insertions in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS AND TREATY OF PEACE.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I wish to take advantage of the courtesy of the Senate to give notice that to-morrow, at the close of the morning hour, when I may be suitably recognized, I shall make some remarks on the question of the league of nations and the pending treaty.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I wish to give notice that on Tuesday of next week, if I can at that time obtain the floor, I shall submit some remarks on the league of nations and the peace treaty.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, everybody understands with what difficulty the United States Senate and the people of the United States have obtained information relative to the league of nations. We had hoped that what the President had not seen fit to divulge to the Senate he would, as he stated in his first speech on this present tour, give to the people. I have felt, in reading the newspaper reports, that we have received very little information from the President's speeches on the treaty. He stated frankly that he owed no duty of explanation except to the people. He wanted his hearers to understand that he owed no duty to the Senate. I this day received a copy of the Grand Rapids Herald, which contains an editorial written by a man who is in favor of the league, who has been very earnestly active in promoting a league as far as he could consonant with the safety and welfare of our country. I ask unanimous consent to insert this editorial in the RECORD in order that my colleagues at least may understand how wise, patriotic men look upon the disclosures which are being made by the President.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"AT ST. LOUIS."

[By A. H. Vandenberg, the editor, the Herald.]

(The Herald is undertaking, from day to day, to analyze President Wilson's speeches from the standpoint of that American majority which believes the treaty of peace should be ratified but only with effective American reservations which shall make "the league of nations" safe for the United States.—No. 3.)

"Bundling all who do not wholly agree with him into one condemned sect, President Wilson celebrated his third day out from Washington by branding this sect as 'contemptible quitters' if they do not unquestionably follow him into unlimited acceptance of his new world vision and his sled-length 'league of nations' experiment.

"The Herald is disinclined to compete with Mr. Wilson in a campaign of anathema. Mud is not argument. Indeed, resort to the former is frequently confession to lack of the latter. Furthermore, 'contemptible quitters' is a dangerous phrase to come from an Executive who is responsible for an American foreign policy toward Mexico (involving a problem infinitely nearer to us at present than this 'league') which invites the application of this humiliating phrase to the whole people of the whole United States.

"Be that as it may, let us see just what it is that the President's 'contemptible quitters' are 'quitting.' What is the new standard to which the President would hold us? In this essence it is bound up in the following sentences from his St. Louis speech:

"'The greatest nationalist is the man who wants his nation to be the greatest nation; and the greatest nation is the nation which penetrates to the heart of its duty and mission among the nations of the world. I want to point out to you that only those who are ignorant of the world can believe that any nation, even so great a Nation as the United States, can stand alone and play a single part in the history of mankind.'

"In other words, we are 'contemptible quitters' who will not put America's duty to the world ahead of America's duty to America.

"Only a comparatively few short months ago this same earnest advocate—this same flaming crusader who scorns those whose eyes persist in lingering upon home concerns—this same President Wilson spoke as follows:

"'America ought to devote itself only to the things that America believes in, and, believing that America stands apart in its ideals, it ought not to allow itself to be drawn, so far as its heart is concerned, into anybody's quarrel.'

"A distinguished United States Senator, recently arguing for the 'league,' appealed 'from Philip drunk to Philip sober.' May we not borrow his metaphor? May we not appeal from Wilson to-day to Wilson yesterday? Any American citizen who seeks to follow Mr. Wilson's expedient philosophies must be a 'quitter'—'contemptible' or otherwise—at some point in his quiescent journey. If he accepts Mr. Wilson's foreign philosophy to-day (molded to fit the needs of an argument defending sled-length acceptance of unlimited 'league' obligations) he must 'quit' Mr. Wilson's foreign philosophy of yesterday (molded to fit the traditions of the Republic and the then posture of our notable Executive). One should scarcely be deemed entitled to epithet because he still believes as Mr. Wilson preached—and preached after this last great war was under way; and because he has not been agile enough to keep pace with swift-changing presidential front.

"We agree with Mr. Wilson that the old-fashioned western isolation is to be henceforth impossible for the United States, as a general proposition. We agree with Mr. Wilson that the United States must share in New World responsibilities, as a general proposition. We agree with Mr. Wilson that we owe it to humanity to participate in any adventure—like this 'league' adventure—which holds the slightest promise of lessening world wars. So far, so good. But we also agree with Mr. Wilson—with Mr. Wilson, mind you—that 'America stands apart in its ideals' and therefore that 'America ought not to allow itself to be drawn (automatically) into anybody's (and everybody's) quarrel.' Therefore we believe in ratifying this treaty without textual amendment and in joining this 'league'; and we also believe in the proclamation of American reservations which will not invalidate the treaty or hamper the 'league,' yet which will guarantee protection for those separate 'American ideals' (which were once close to Mr. Wilson's heart) and which will guarantee that America shall not become an automatic partner in all the quarrels of all the earth. If that means that we are among the 'contemptible quitters,' make the most of it. If in that attitude we are 'quitters,' then the President himself should be a 'quitter,' too, if he has the slightest interest in being consistent in his own program.

"So far as those Americans who believe with the Herald in effective American reservations are concerned, what is it that they would 'contemptibly quit'?

"These 'contemptible quitters' insist that 'the Monroe doctrine was proclaimed by the United States on her own authority' and that 'it always has been and always will be maintained upon her own responsibility.' (These quoted phrases, strange as it may seem, were uttered by Mr. Wilson on January 6, 1916.) Therefore these 'quitters' insist upon an American reservation which will officially say exactly that very thing. They refuse silent consent to language in the 'league' covenant which invites an alien-controlled 'league' Parliament to 'settle disputes which arise regarding the Monroe doctrine.' (This being England's announced interpretation.) Whatever else they are 'contemptibly quitting,' they are not 'quitting' the rock and the foundation of America's foreign policy for 100 years.

"Again, these 'contemptible quitters' insist that the 'league' covenant shall never be construed (as it otherwise might be) as giving an alien-controlled Parliament any jurisdiction over America's immigration and tariff laws. This goes to the heart not 'of the world' but of Columbia; and these 'quitters' insist that the United States owes no greater debt to Europe and Asia than it owes to its own posterity. So they 'quit' at the point where Europe and Asia might claim even a shadow of jurisdiction over our acceptance of Europeans and Asiatics into American citizenship.

"Again, these 'contemptible quitters' insist that the United States can not recognize a legal obligation (thanks to our Constitution) to enter foreign wars except as the American Congress, by free and untrammeled contemporary decision, shall declare war; and, therefore, that the United States must not, by silence, consent to 'an absolutely compelling moral obligation' (the President's own words) to join in the world's wars, willy-nilly, at the behest of any 'league' or any other authority which is not exclusively responsive to the will and the wish of the people of the United States. These 'contemptible quitters' refuse assent to an implied obligation which links our sons of to-morrow to military service, regardless of whether American concerns are involved or not, in behalf of Great Britain, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, China, Cuba, Ecuador, France, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Hejaz, Honduras, Italy, Japan, Liberia, Nicaragua, Panama, Peru, Poland, Portugal, Roumania, Serb-Croate-Slovakia, Siam, Czechoslovakia (all preliminary 'league' signatories), Argentina, Chile, Colombia, Denmark, Netherlands, Norway, Paraguay, Persia, Salvador, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, and Venezuela (all invited to become signatories). These reservationists 'quit' at the point of an automatic moral obligation to contribute American manhood to police the whole, round earth.

"Finally, these 'contemptible quitters'—remembering in our own history that a Civil War was precipitated over the question of whether a member of a union of States had a right to withdraw from that union—insist that the 'league' covenant is not explicit in its authority to a nation to withdraw on two years' notice because that authority is diluted by a conditioning phrase as follows: 'Provided, That all its international obligations and all its obligations under this covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of its withdrawal.' The President says our right of withdrawal will be absolute and unhampered. That—and that alone—is what reservationists would officially proclaim in a reservation. If our right of withdrawal is absolute, what does that qualifying 'provided' mean? Why is it there—unless as a deliberate but subtle veto lodged in the 'league'? When the President was asked that very question when he entertained the Senate Foreign Relations Committee at the White House, he said the 'proviso' was only 'an argument to the conscience of the nations.' Honestly, is that a fair answer? Is the 'conscience of the nations' suddenly become so perfectly reliable that it is permanently dependable? Of course not, else there would be none of this tremendous, pressing need (which the President magnificently emphasizes) for all of this 'league' machinery to harness the nations when their 'consciences' go wrong. Yet the President says at St. Louis that 'there isn't a phrase of doubtful meaning in the whole document'! Speaking of 'quitting,' in Heaven's name let us not 'quit' the verities in our debates!

"Mr. Wilson has yet to utter a single effective argument against a program of effective American reservations to make the 'league' safe for the United States. He complains that critics persist in attacking a 'few' weak spots in the covenant, ignoring the strong and appealing points. Countercomplaint is justified in saying that he persists in lauding the strong points (over which there is little real controversy) and ignoring the weak and the dangerous ones. Is it not logical that the debate should center upon questions in controversy?

"The Herald believes that a majority of the American people are ready for this adventure. From it we could not escape if we would. The Herald believes that a majority of the American people object—as they should—to the Senate committee's futile attempt to amend the text of the treaty. But the Herald also believes that a majority of the American people favor effective American reservations. They are vitally essential to that candid international understanding which must precede any hopeful peace experiment. More, they are vitally essential to complete protection of American self-determination while the experiment proceeds. More, their virtue can not be successfully denied by the President or any of his sled-length followers. More, their acceptance by the President would end this whole debate in 20 minutes, because the little minority which would defeat the whole undertaking could not stand for one second against the mobilized public opinion which would then command American ratification. More, there can never be ratification without reservations, as an unprejudiced analyst of the Senate must consent. Under all these circumstances is not the course of wisdom plain?"

CONTROL OF FOOD PRODUCTS.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, has the unfinished business, the food-control bill, been brought up yet?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It comes down at 2 o'clock.

Mr. GRONNA. As there are only a few minutes remaining until the hour of 2 o'clock arrives, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may now be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8624) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	McNary	Spencer
Ball	Harding	New	Sterling
Beckham	Harris	Newberry	Thomas
Brandegee	Harrison	Norris	Townsend
Capper	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nugent	Trammell
Chamberlain	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Underwood
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Page	Walsh, Mass.
Dial	Kellogg	Phelan	Walsh, Mont.
Elkins	Kirby	Sheppard	Watson
France	La Follette	Smith, Md.	Wolcott
Gronna	Lodge	Smoot

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATSON in the chair). But 43 Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the names of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. MCCUMBER and Mr. WADSWORTH answered to their names when called.

Mr. HENDERSON, Mr. CUMMINS, Mr. NELSON, Mr. SWANSON, Mr. LENROOT, Mr. POMERENE, Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. HITCHCOCK, and Mr. KENYON entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. KIRBY. The junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY] is detained on business of the Senate. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] are detained from the Senate on public business. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is detained from the Senate on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-six Senators have answered to their names, and a quorum is present.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the bill now before the Senate comes in response, as I take it, to the message of the President of the United States delivered to the two Houses on the 8th day of August, in which the President spoke of the high cost of living and asked that some amendments be made to the food-control act, and particularly an amendment fixing penalties.

Mr. President, I think the President of the United States was misinformed in several respects as to what the food-control act contained. This seems almost remarkable, because, as everyone knows, the food-control act was passed in accordance with the demands of the Executive and in the way that the Executive wanted it passed, containing what he wanted in the law.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will not the Senator state further that it was prepared by the attorneys of the Department of Justice?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes; it was agreed upon long before it was even introduced in either branch of Congress. But in this message that the President delivered to us on the high cost of living on the 8th of August he said, on page 9:

> Let me urge, in the first place, that the present food-control act should be extended both as to the period of time during which it shall remain in operation and as to the commodities to which it shall apply. Its provisions against hoarding should be made to apply not only to food, but also to feed stuffs, to fuel, to clothing, and to many other commodities which are indisputably necessaries of life.

You can draw no other conclusion from the President's message than that the President was laboring under the impression that the food-control act applies only to food. He says:

> Its provisions against hoarding should be made to apply not only to food but to feed stuffs, to fuel, to clothing.

And so forth.

As a matter of fact, the food-control act applied to every article that the President mentioned in the message, with the exception of clothing.

The food-control act was approved August 10, 1917, so that it has been in force practically during the entire time that we have been engaged in war. In the first section of that act it is provided—

> That by reason of the existence of a state of war, it is essential to the national security and defense, for the successful prosecution of the war, and for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy, to assure an adequate supply and equitable distribution and to facilitate the movement of foods; feeds; fuel, including fuel oil and natural gas; and fertilizer and fertilizer ingredients; tools; utensils; implements; machinery; and equipment required for the actual production of foods, feeds, and fuel, hereafter in this act called necessaries.

So when we read from this act—and I expect to quote from it—and find the word "necessaries," we must remember that under the very definition in section 1 of the act itself all the articles that I have enumerated are included in the term "necessaries." The President evidently thought there was nothing in it except "food." Later on in the same message, and on the same page of the message, the President uses this language:

> May I not call attention to the fact also that, although the present act—

That is, the food-control act—

> Prohibits profiteering, the prohibition is accompanied by no penalty. It is clearly in the public interest that a penalty should be provided which will be persuasive.

Of course, if there is not a penalty in the act, the President and his immediate advisers who drew the act are certainly responsible for the omission. But again the President shows in the official message that he is not familiar with what is contained in the act, because it contains, as I shall show, various penalties for all kinds of imaginable profiteering and hoarding.

While I have no particular objection to this bill, there are some amendments to it, proposed by the Committee on Agriculture, which I shall oppose. In my judgment there never was any necessity for it. The President has had since the enactment of the food-control act on August 10, 1917, all the necessary statutory definitions and punishments provided by law for the proper punishment of profiteering and hoarding, the thing that he now wants done in order to reduce the high cost of living.

I want to say just a word before I go further into that act about the high cost of living. I think it will be conceded, Mr. President, that the cost of living would be and is necessarily high for reasons that are beyond the control either of Congress or any other legislative or executive authority. There is no doubt, and I think everybody admits it, that we will have to be burdened as we are burdened, to some extent at least, with the high cost of living.

We must endure these burdens, and I think we are willing to endure them if they are not enhanced by any unnatural thing that takes place. We ought to relieve the situation just as much as we can, and one of the ways in which the situation can be relieved, that will help to reduce the high cost of living, is that as individuals and as representatives of the people and officials of the Government, in all capacities, both public and private, we should economize in every way. There ought to be an example of economy shown by the President himself. As the head of the Nation he ought to practice before the people of the country and before the people of the world all the economy that is possible, both as an individual and as a public official, and thus do his part toward the reduction of the high cost of living.

I think recent events have shown that the President has "spent money like a drunken sailor"; that he has absolutely disregarded every economy in the expenditure of money. He went over to the peace conference in a way and in a manner never before equalled, as far as expenditure and extravagance are concerned, in the history of the world. He cavorted around with the representatives of monarchies and used more money in his travels about the world than had ever before been expended by anybody in any country, by any prince, potentate, or monarch, since the beginning of civilization.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. As I noticed not a great while ago, it amounted to more than all the expenses put together of all the representatives of this Government at similar conferences since we became a Nation.

Mr. NORRIS. I am glad to have that contribution from the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I simply state it as a newspaper item that I saw.

Mr. NORRIS. I had not seen the expenses compiled. I have seen some of it that has been officially reported, of which one item of $150,000 to Barney Baruch, who was one of the experts that went over with the President, is subject at least to momentary consideration.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has criticized expenditures of this character as extravagant. Will the Senator point out wherein he would have had the President act differently and where he could have saved?

Mr. NORRIS. I would not have given Barney Baruch $150,000. I would not have built a glass roof on the George Washington when I went to Europe. I would not have gone to New York and taken the musicians out of the great Biltmore Hotel to play while I was eating on my way or the chefs to prepare the food. I would not have had an extra ship go in advance with automobiles so that they could be there to receive me when I landed, and so on.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I would not have taken 1,500 or 1,600 people with me to advise me unless I expected to consider their advice when it was given. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator. Many of his comments and criticisms may be very applicable. I do not know whether the President followed the advice of his retinue or not. I imagine, however, that he did, and I know that he did in the case of Mr. Baruch. My purpose——

Mr. NORRIS. That is perhaps the reason why he paid him so much money, because he followed his advice.

Mr. THOMAS. My purpose in interrupting the Senator was to speak of that item of expense which, in my judgment, is remarkably reasonable, and if the Senator will permit me, I will tell him why.

The inference which one would naturally draw from the Senator's statement would be that this sum was paid to Mr. Baruch personally as compensation for his services. I know that Mr. Baruch has never received one dollar, directly or indirectly, for any services that he has rendered or tried to render the Government since the outbreak of the war. Mr. Baruch was requested to go to Paris to represent this Government upon the so-called reparations commission, a commission charged with the duty of ascertaining the extent to which injury had been inflicted upon Belgium and the devastated regions of France by the destruction of property, its transportation to Germany, the expense of its reconstruction, the extent to which the mines in the northeastern part of France had been injured, and also the financial resources and material capacity of Germany to make reparation. That, of course, involved the necessity of employing quite a large number of very competent people to inquire into and to determine those questions. Mr. Baruch did his work and did it well, he did it effectually, as he does all work to which he turns his hand.

While I sympathize, until I am better informed, with many of the criticisms which are aimed at different parts of this expense account, I am sure when the Senator makes inquiry he will discover that as to this item it is a very small amount, relatively speaking, and was money well expended.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. It is a very easy matter to criticize, and particularly where we are not familiar with the facts. I am going to give only one illustration.

Mr. Barney Baruch was one of the able, patriotic citizens who came to Washington and was known as a dollar-a-year man. When the armistice was signed and his bureau was dissolved, because of the delays of Congress there was not enough money to pay off the girls who had been employed in his bureau. Hundreds of them did not have money enough to pay their way home. Barney Baruch wrote his own check and paid the traveling expenses out of his own pocket for those girls.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator from Colorado wish to say something further?

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to add, since I have interrupted upon the subject, that when Mr. Baruch consented to act as the chairman of the War Industries Board, he divested himself of every possible interest which would conflict with his proper discharge of the duties of that very responsible position. He discovered, however, some time afterwards that an interest which he had in a large tungsten property had been overlooked, and was notified of a very generous dividend awaiting his disposition. It was somewhat embarrassing, but he divided that sum among the Red Cross, the Young Men's Christian Association, the Young Women's Christian Association, and one of the other associations which were formed to and which did minister to the comfort of soldiers. In addition to that, he paid to the Government of the United States the income tax out of that portion of his income separate and apart from the sum of which I speak.

I think a man who has given that illustration of his patriotism and disinterested service should, in any question of doubt as to his handling of public money, at least, have that doubt resolved in his favor. I have known Mr. Baruch for a great many years, and I have always found him, and particularly for a man in his business, one of the most capable, upright, and public-spirited men I have ever met.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, both the Senators who have interrupted me have set up a straw man. They are defending the patriotism of Mr. Baruch, which has not yet been attacked. They are showing his philanthropy, which has not yet been questioned. They are probably anticipating. I had no intention to question Mr. Baruch's patriotism or his philanthropy. The only thing that makes me suspicious of it is that Senators are coming to his defense in those lines before there has been any attack made.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield further to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator mentioned the receipt by Mr. Baruch of $150,000, and mentioned it in connection with other expenses, justifying the implication, to me at least, that the Senator believed or suspected that this money had been received by Mr. Baruch as compensation for services rendered to the Government. Of course if that was not the implication, I apologize to the Senator for having interrupted him.

Mr. NORRIS. I have an idea that if the Senator had permitted me to proceed——

Mr. THOMAS. I will not interrupt the Senator again.

Mr. NORRIS. He would have found it unnecessary to interrupt me. I did not want to refuse to be interrupted and I shall not decline interruptions, but I have a conviction that if Senators would not on the spur of the moment come to the defense of their favorites until some definite charge is made we would probably get along faster and I would get through more quickly.

As I said before, I had no intention of making any charge against Barney Baruch. I did not make any. I am willing to admit that all that is said about him is true. I do not know those things about him. I accept the Senator's word. I remember Barney Baruch more particularly as the most successful man in the country in collecting Democratic campaign funds during the last presidential campaign, a Wall Street man who was able to bring the money into the committee that helped to elect Woodrow Wilson President of the United States. It is probably natural that the President should feel kindly toward him. I remember him also as the man who, on Wall Street, made, I think, $470,000, as disclosed in the leak investigation——

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. So he can afford to be good to the girls in his office and work for a dollar a year and pay an income tax, without any danger of going to the poorhouse. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator's charge touching Barney Baruch making $470,000 on the leak as a Wall Street speculator is, I imagine, about like his charges of extravagance made against the President. Does not the Senator know that during the last Congress, I think, in the House a Republican Member of Congress made a similar charge against Mr. Baruch and the Committee on Rules made an investigation.

The resolution was passed; the Speaker of the House appointed a special committee to go into all those facts; they spent weeks on the investigation; and they came out and made a unanimous report exonerating Mr. Baruch from those charges in toto. One of the Senator's colleagues, now on this floor, was a member of that committee; I happened to have been a member of that committee, and I know those to be the facts. There was no leak about it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am speaking from the testimony given by Mr. Barney Baruch himself before that committee. I read his testimony where he said he made, I think it was, four hundred and seventy-some thousand dollars. He most emphatically denied that he got any information from any one connected with the administration as to what was going to be done, and there was no proof that he had obtained such information; but that he made the money there was not any doubt. He himself admitted it on the stand.

Mr. HARRISON. But the Senator from Nebraska said——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. But the Senator said that Mr. Baruch made $485,000 on a leak, and evidently——

Mr. NORRIS. This investigation is designated and ordinarily understood as the leak investigation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest that Senators address the Chair.

Mr. NORRIS. There was a leak. Mr. Baruch, as he stated, guessed and guessed right and made the money. The committee did not find that he did anything dishonorable in doing so. He was a speculator on Wall Street, he bought and sold on his judgment; he made money on the transaction; and he himself told about it.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Nebraska made the charge that Barney Baruch made $485,000 on that leak.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator evidently did not read the report of the special committee which was signed by the Republican members as well as by the Democratic members. It was never denied by Mr. Baruch that he had made money on Wall Street, but the facts show that on that particular leak he had lost money, proving that he knew nothing at all about the leak.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I read Mr. Baruch's testimony and I made the statement on my recollection of his testimony taken before that committee that he made, I think it was $476,000—anyway, four hundred and some thousand dollars. He admitted it. I have not said that he stole it. I said I remembered Barney Baruch in two ways. I did not know him as did other Senators, but I remembered him as a very successful collector of campaign contributions for the Democratic national committee and also as figuring in the leak investigation, where he testified that he had made money on Wall Street. That is where I remember him more than anywhere else. I was identifying Barney Baruch in my recollection.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. If the Senator will yield, I think the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] is slightly inaccurate in saying that Mr. Baruch lost money on the leak. The fact is that during the period covered by the investigation Mr. Baruch stated that he had made, I think, $475,000. There was no evidence whatever before the committee that Mr. Baruch had any kind of information of the leak; but he also testified, as the Senator from Mississippi will remember, that while he had made $475,000 during that period, if he had had advance knowledge of the leak, he would have made a great deal more than he did.

Mr. HARRISON. And, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me just one minute——

Mr. NORRIS. Well, I do not believe that I will take up a side issue, for I do not think it is very material. Senators protest too quickly, it seems to me. I have not made any charge of dishonorable conduct against Mr. Barney Baruch.

Mr. LENROOT. I asked the Senator from Nebraska to yield because the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] made what I think was an inaccurate statement, that Mr. Baruch had lost money in a leak, while the fact was that during that period he had made $475,000.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the way I read his testimony.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Nebraska yield one moment?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Mississippi understood the Senator from Nebraska to charge that Mr. Barney Baruch made $485,000 on the leak.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I stated it in that way, and I think that is a fair charge. I think that might be ordinarily understood from his own testimony as it was disclosed before the leak investigation committee.

Mr. President, if I may pass on without any further defense and without making any accusation against Mr. Barney Baruch, when I was first interrupted by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] I gave as one of the items of extravagance the payment of $150,000 to Barney Baruch. The Senator from Colorado stated that it was very cheap for the work he was to do; that he was on the reparation committee and was trying to ascertain how much Germany ought to pay. Senators will remember I said that some of these things might be excused if when the President had appointed advisers he had shown any disposition to follow their advice. Nobody now knows how much Germany is going to pay or to be required to pay; it is an unknown quantity. To-day Barney Baruch does not know, or if he does he has not disclosed that fact. So the great investigation that he has made, costing $150,000 at least, has not brought any results, for the treaty does not fix the amount that Germany shall pay.

Mr. President, some of the supernumeraries the President took over there were probably necessary; he ought to have taken experts and other wise men to assist him and to advise him. If he had shown some disposition to advise with his advisers, to heed their words of wisdom, and to give some consideration to their investigations, there would have been some excuse for the expenditure of this money; but I know, Mr. President, and you know, the Senate knows, the country knows, the world knows, and God knows, that he did not pay any attention to any of them. So what was the use of the expenditure of all this money?

That is one place where we might reduce the cost of living. If the head of our great country would give an example of economy it would probably be followed by millions with a great deal of gratitude and satisfaction.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I did not hear the Senator commence his discussion. I take it he is now discussing the item of $150,000 for the expenses of technical advisers.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I mention that incidentally.

Mr. KENYON. How was that $150,000 used?

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Colorado says it was used, as I judged from what he said, to investigate and find out what Germany ought to pay, which nobody as yet has determined.

Now let me go back where I would have been long ago if Senators would not be so jealous of this collector of Democratic campaign revenue—to the food-control act. The President says there is no penalty. Let us see. Section 5 of that act provides—

That from time to time, whenever the President shall find it essential to license the importation, manufacture, storage, mining, or distribution of any necessaries—

And remember I read a while ago what necessaries were. The President did not know what they were, but I read what the law said they were—in order to carry into effect any of the purposes of this act, and shall publicly so announce, no person shall, after a date fixed in the announcement, engage in or carry on any such business specified in the announcement of importation, manufacture, storage, mining, or distribution of any necessaries as set forth in such announcement unless he shall secure and hold a license issued pursuant to this section. The President is authorized to issue such licenses and to prescribe regulations for the issuance of licenses and requirements for systems of accounts and auditing of accounts to be kept by licensees, submission of reports by them, with or without oath or affirmation, and the entry and inspection by the President's duly authorized agents of the places of business of licensees. Whenever the President shall find that any storage charge, commission, profit, or practice of any licensee is unjust, or unreasonable, or discriminatory and unfair, or wasteful, and shall order such licensee, within a reasonable time fixed in the order, to discontinue the same, unless such order, which shall recite the facts found, is revoked or suspended, such licensee shall, within the time prescribed in the order, discontinue such unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory and unfair storage charge, commission, profit, or practice. The President may, in lieu of any such unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory, and unfair storage charge, commission, profit, or practice, find what is a just, reasonable, nondiscriminatory and fair storage charge, commission, profit, or practice, and in any proceeding brought in any court such order of the President shall be prima facie evidence. Any person who, without a license issued pursuant to this section, or whose license shall have been revoked, knowingly engages in or carries on any business for which a license is required under this section, or willfully fails or refuses to discontinue any unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory, and unfair storage charge, commission, profit, or practice, in accordance with the requirement of an order issued under this section, or any regulation prescribed under this section, shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

That looks like a penalty.

Mr. President, it would be interesting to know how many prosecutions have been commenced under this section, how many men have been arrested, and how often has the President tried to enforce this section, which gives to him greater power than was ever before given to any living man over the particular things covered by it.

Here is another provision in the same act:

SEC. 6. That any person who willfully hoards any necessaries—

And that includes food, fuel, and all the other things I have named—shall upon conviction thereof be fined not exceeding $5,000 or be imprisoned for not more than two years, or both.

Then the act describes what hoarding means. I do not care to read it all in the RECORD, but I think probably I had better read some of the provisions defining the meaning of hoarding according to the act:

Necessaries shall be deemed to be hoarded within the meaning of this act when either (a) held, contracted for, or arranged for by any person in a quantity in excess of his reasonable requirements for use or consumption by himself and dependents for a reasonable time.

That is pretty broad. Has he prosecuted anybody under that law, which has been in force almost since the time we went into the war? And there is a penalty, a $5,000 fine, or two years' imprisonment, or both.

Let us see what the next definition of hoarding is:

(b) Held, contracted for, or arranged for by any manufacturer, wholesaler, retailer, or other dealer in a quantity in excess of the reasonable requirements of his business for use or sale by him for a reasonable time, or reasonably required to furnish necessaries produced in surplus quantities seasonally throughout the period of scant or no production; or (c) withheld, whether by possession or under any contract or arrangement, from the market by any person for the purpose of unreasonably increasing or diminishing the price.

There is a $5,000 fine and two years' imprisonment, or both. Has there been any prosecution under it? Do we need a penalty? Was the President properly informed as to what the law was when he gave that official message? Why, great heavens, Mr. President, Congress is not to blame because the administrative officers of the Government are not enforcing the law. We can not legislate wisdom into the appointees of the President and we can not make the appointments.

There are a great many others. I am not going to read all of them; but in section 8 it is provided:

That any person who willfully destroys any necessaries for the purpose of enhancing the price or restricting the supply thereof shall, upon conviction thereof be fined not exceeding $5,000 or imprisoned for not more than two years, or both.

Another penalty. That has been on the statute books since 1917. Evidently the President did not know it was there when he delivered this message. He did not know of the penalty?

Let me read section 9 of the same act:

That any person who conspires, combines, agrees, or arranges with any other person (a) to limit the facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing, or dealing in any necessaries; (b) to restrict the supply of any necessaries; (c) to restrict the distribution of any necessaries; (d) to prevent, limit, or lessen the manufacture or production of any necessaries in order to enhance the price thereof shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not exceeding $10,000 or be imprisoned for not more than two years, or both.

That is quite a penalty for profiteering. The President, I suppose, did not know it existed.

Section 13 of the same act gives the President a great deal of power, and it winds up in this way:

Any person who willfully violates any regulation made pursuant to this section, or who knowingly engages in any operation, practice, or transaction prohibited pursuant to this section, or who willfully aids or abets any such violation or any such prohibited operation, practice, or transaction, shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than four years, or both.

In order to protect the officers and the agents whom the President appoints to carry out this act, section 17 says:

That every person who willfully assaults, resists, impedes, or interferes with any officer, employee, or agent of the United States in the execution of any duty authorized to be performed by or pursuant to this act shall upon conviction thereof be fined not exceeding $1,000 or be imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

And so on, through the entire act, it is bristling with penalties for all imaginary possibilities of hoarding and profiteering. Has there been any prosecution under it? Have they tried the law, and has it failed in any way?

Let me read one more section—a sort of a basket clause. For fear something had been left out, this was put in:

SEC. 26. That any person carrying on or employed in commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, or with or in the Territories or other possessions of the United States in any article suitable for human food, fuel, or other necessaries of life, who, either in his individual capacity or as an officer, agent, or employee of a corporation or member of a partnership carrying on or employed in such trade, shall store, acquire, or hold, or who shall destroy or make away with any such article for the purpose of limiting the supply thereof to the public or affecting the market price thereof in such commerce, whether temporarily or otherwise, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

Another penalty, and rather broad. I can not imagine, Mr. President, if this law were enforced, of a possibility of hoarding or profiteering taking place within the limits of the United States or any of its possessions.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NORRIS. I do.

Mr. KENYON. I dislike to interrupt the Senator, because it interferes with the continuity of his remarks; but when the Attorney General was before the committee section 4 was taken up more especially. I think there are six acts prohibited under section 4. As I have analyzed the section, three of them carry penalties and three do not. For instance, take the proposition of charging an unreasonable price. There is no penalty as to that in section 4.

Mr. NORRIS. Not as it is defined in section 4; but I have read a penalty for unreasonably enhancing the price several times here which would cover that.

Mr. KENYON. Does not that come under the license system?

Mr. NORRIS. Some of it does; these last sections that I have read. I have read only one section that requires any license. For instance, the last one that I have read, I think, would cover that.

Any person * * * who * * * shall store, acquire, or hold, or who shall destroy or make away with any such article——

Mr. KENYON. That is section 8?

Mr. NORRIS. Section 26—for the purpose of limiting the supply thereof to the public or affecting the market price thereof in such commerce, whether temporarily or otherwise—

Shall be guilty of this crime.

Mr. KENYON. But that section, the Senator will note, applies only to articles in commerce.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; in commerce among the several States.

Mr. KENYON. While section 4, whether we have the constitutional power to do it or not, covers articles that are not in commerce.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that covers local articles.

Mr. KENYON. Local articles; so that the main thing is, under section 4, the fixing of an unreasonable price. While it is prohibited, there is no penalty attached to it; and the inquiry naturally arises, I think, to any lawyer, whether we can fix a penalty for an unreasonable price for something that is in no way connected with interstate commerce.

Mr. NORRIS. That may be a constitutional objection, that I do not care to go into now—whether we had authority to pass the law or not—but I do not think the Senator has heard me read all of the sections I have read that have a penalty attached. I can not conceive of an act of profiteering or of hoarding that is not covered, or, in one of the sections that I read, of making an undue profit. The President even had the right to fix the profit that any man could make in the selling of any necessaries, and that included food, fuel, fuel oil, natural gas, and all of the instruments that are used in the manufacture of such things; fertilizer, fertilizer ingredients, and so forth.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska further yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield; yes.

Mr. KENYON. Is not that because he could do it under the licensing system? Now, as I understand, the force by which the licensing system was enforced is dissolved, and there is no way of getting it together again.

Mr. NORRIS. Why was it dissolved? Did the Senator ask the Attorney General?

Mr. KENYON. No; I did not.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me ask the Senator a question. Did the Attorney General give to the Senator's committee any information as to how many prosecutions they had had? Had they tried to enforce any of these criminal statutes that I have read?

Mr. KENYON. I can not say as to that. I do not think he gave us any information in regard to that. I do not remember about that. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] can answer that question better than I can.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator. I will state that I asked the Senator from Iowa whether the Attorney General, when he appeared before the committee, told the committee whether the Department of Justice had commenced any prosecutions under these various sections, and, if so, how many, and under what section.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the Attorney General said at that time that under the food-control act there had been no suits instituted, but that they desired to proceed immediately; and I was advised two or three days ago that they had instituted quite a number of suits, and that they were pending, and that some convictions had been obtained under the hoarding features of the food-control act.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in my humble judgment the Government of the United States, as now administered, is responsible more than any other one agency at least for not making an honest attempt to reduce the high cost of living. The armistice was declared on the 11th day of November last. At that time we had several millions of men under arms, and I understand that we had in France enough food to last 5,000,000 of men six months. Immediately after that day we commenced to demobilize and send those boys home, until within a few months there were comparatively few left on foreign soil; and those in the cantonments here, amounting to nearly 2,000,000, were rapidly sent home. We had that food on hand, enough to last 5,000,000 men for six months, consisting of all kinds of food. A great portion of it was in France. It would have been wise administration, it seems to me, especially when the people of the country were paying enormous costs for the very necessaries of life, to sell that food at reasonable prices to the consumers of the country.

I wish every citizen of the United States would read the testimony that was taken by a subcommittee of one of the House committees investigating this question, a committee of which Congressman REAVIS, of Nebraska, was chairman. I am going to read some of the testimony.

Although, Mr. President, it is conceded and admitted that the War Department had complete authority to dispose of this food, they made no effort to do it until the House of Representatives had passed a resolution demanding, in substance, that it be done, and until bills pending here in the Senate had been given some consideration. They not only did not take any steps to dispose of this food to the people of America, who had paid for it by their own money and by their own sacrifices, but I think the testimony before that subcommittee discloses the fact that the officials of our Government had made an agreement with the persons from whom they had purchased the goods that they would not put it on the market and bring it in competition with the products of the same persons and packers who had sold the food originally to the Government.

But when the House passed that resolution, and this investigation had been going on, and the evidence was disclosed, then the President came before Congress and said, "We are going to sell this food right away." They could not even claim that they needed legislative authority to do it, because the witnesses before that subcommittee admitted under oath that no legislation was necessary.

But it seems, Mr. President, that the War Department, during all those months, with the soldiers going home, with no possible use for the food, were hoarding this food, when the American people were starving for it, food that the American people had once paid for, and which belonged of right to them.

It developed in this hearing, and probably some other hearing also, that Italy had purchased a large amount of food in the United States and had not taken it out of the United States at the time the armistice was declared. Of course Italy was demobilizing her army, and would have no use for it, and would have sold it on the open market in the United States. About that time the President wired from Europe his command to the Congress to appropriate $100,000,000 to send over there to buy food for the starving people of Europe. Some of that money, several millions of it—enough to take up the slack, at least—was used to buy of the Italian Government the food which they had purchased and which they had here, the effect of which was to keep it off the market of the United States and to send it to Europe.

During that time a good deal of the food perished or spoiled. Let me read a little from the testimony:

Mr. REAVIS. This meat is deteriorating?
Mr. HARE. I call it all perishable, and it should be sold within three months.
Mr. REAVIS. That does not answer my question. It is deteriorating?
Mr. HARE. Yes, sir.
Mr. REAVIS. In some localities to a marked degree.
Mr. HARE. It depends on the storage.
Mr. REAVIS. But in some localities it is deteriorating to a marked degree?
Mr. HARE. Yes, sir.
Mr. REAVIS. You have had some experience with deteriorated meats?
Mr. HARE. Yes, sir; I have taken meat into the woods on fishing trips and had it spoil.
Mr. REAVIS. I mean in your present capacity?
Mr. HARE. Yes, sir.
Mr. REAVIS. Haven't you had meat on your hands that spoiled?
Mr. HARE. Yes, sir.
Mr. REAVIS. Where?
Mr. HARE. In Baltimore; bacon.
Mr. REAVIS. Wasn't there some more than that in Baltimore?
Mr. HARE. I heard of ham also; and also I know of my own knowledge that subject to the temperature in wooden buildings the hams "smell" and "sweat" and deteriorate. That is the reason we can not give any guaranty back of the goods.
Mr. REAVIS. Isn't that true of the hams as well as the bacon?
Mr. HARE. Yes, sir.
Mr. REAVIS. Haven't you been compelled to sell ham, more than 2,000,000 pounds?
Mr. HARE. I do know there was a large amount of ham that was moldy and was sold at a sacrifice.
Mr. REAVIS. A large amount at Atlanta, Ga.?
Mr. HARE. At Norfolk.
Mr. REAVIS. And a large amount at Atlanta, Ga.?
Mr. HARE. Yes; but whether that has been sold or not I do not know.

At another place in the testimony the following occurred:

Mr. REAVIS. Therefore we will not have an opportunity to go into the matter as fully now as eventually we will have to go into it. I wish you would state in a general way who has charge of determining what will be the surplus of food products, who in the War Department?
Mr. HARE. The Chief of Staff. That does not come under my control in any way. Mr. Crowell and I have often tried to have the surplus determined more promptly and accurately. But first the Army was fixed at 1,000,000 men, and then brought down to 500,000 men, and Congress has said it should be 325,000 men. On these bases various surpluses have been declared. This meat surplus, I believe, was declared the 1st of May, but I think it was there and the Army——
Mr. REAVIS (interposing). Was there no meat surplus declared at all until the 1st of May?

You must remember, Mr. President, that the armistice had been declared November 11, and this vast supply had been held without declaring a surplus, and under the law, and the rules of the War Department, it was necessary that a surplus be declared before the Director of Sales could make a sale. I will repeat that question:

Was there no meat surplus declared at all until the 1st of May?
Mr. HALE. None; and I have no power over that. The director of sales only begins to function when a surplus is declared by the Army and its sale is directed, and then it is put into the hands of our department to make sales.
Mr. REAVIS. That is, the War Department, notwithstanding the armistice was signed in November, waited until the 1st of May before it declared that there was any meat surplus at all?
Mr. HARE. Yes, sir; I think that is correct. They started out making a surplus in March, and withdrew it because they thought they were inaccurate.
Mr. REAVIS. Notwithstanding the rapid demobilization of troops, the fact that the Army was being demobilized, no activity on the part of the War Department was manifest with reference to declaring a surplus of meats from November until the 1st of March?
Mr. HARE. None to my knowledge.
Mr. REAVIS. And then the surplus that was declared in March was subsequently withdrawn?
Mr. HARE. As being inaccurate, and the whole list gone over again——
Mr. REAVIS (interposing). So in fact there was no surplus declared for the purpose of sale until May?
Mr. HARE. Exactly so.

Mr. President, I want to read just a little evidence to throw some light upon the fact as to why there was not a surplus declared, why this product that the American people bought had not been put on the market and sold.

On page 21, of volume 1, you will find the minutes of a meeting called to decide on what should be done, to which I am now going to refer.

Before any of these sales, however, can take place an important question must be decided as to what price we are to market this vast store of foodstuffs for. It is obvious that if the price is made low enough and the articles sacrificed that all of it can be disposed of in this country. It must not be forgotten, however, that a very much better price can be secured through export.

I will give a little later the names of the advisory committee who were taking part in this meeting, and that will throw an important light upon it. Continuing:

It seems advisable, therefore, that we continue our present efforts to market as much of this surplus as possible in this country at the best prices obtainable and sell the remainder for export. It must be borne in mind, however, that if a low price is established here for domestic sales it will make it more difficult to secure a higher price for the same class of canned meats from exporters.

In view of these various statements and, further in view of the fact that it had come to the attention of the director of sales that Mr. Hoover had very recently purchased in this country for shipment overseas bacon held by the Italian and French Governments in this country it was decided advisable it get in touch with Mr. Hoover and ascertain whether he would not purchase a certain amount of the canned surplus meats held by the Army.

Immediately after this meeting a cable was sent to Mr. Hoover, through the United States Liquidation Commission, asking him whether or not he was in the market to purchase a proportion of the canned meats held by the Government.

And, as I understand it, he afterwards did purchase some of them. So they kept it off the American market until just recently, some of it was taken off permanently and shipped to Europe. When they were shipping this product to Europe, they had in France millions of tons of the same product that they could not use, and had no men there to eat, it seems to me it reduces itself to the proposition that they were determined that the American people, who were paying the enormously high prices for things, were not to be allowed to get any reduction in any way.

It will be interesting to know who composed the committee the minutes of which I have been reading. I know the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] will be interested in this, because it has some bearing upon the bill that bears his honored name, which is now pending before the Committee on Agriculture.

Besides the representatives of the War Department, there were several dollar-a-year men at that meeting, and I want to say to you, Mr. President, that every one of the five great firms of packers were represented by at least one man, and some of them by several. Let me read their names:

Mr. J. A. Hawkinson, represented Wilson & Co.
Mr. M. C. Plainer, represented Wilson & Co.
Mr. D. B. Russell, represented Morris & Co.
Mr. J. J. Deady, represented Armour & Co.
Mr. A. F. Peiffer, represented Armour & Co.
Mr. W. F. Wardwell, represented Armour & Co.
Mr. F. E. Wilbur, represented Cudahy & Co.
Mr. E. D. Baldwin, represented Libby, McNeill & Libby.

I do not need to tell the Senator from Iowa that Libby, McNeill & Libby are a subsidiary corporation to Swift & Co.

Mr. Burroughs represented Swift & Co., packers, of Chicago.

It seems to me, therefore, Mr. President, that it comes with poor grace, almost, with this law upon the statute book all these years, for the Government of the United States itself to hold off from the market the food products that the people, by their sacrifices, had paid for, especially at a time when they are almost all overburdened with the enormously high cost of living.

But, Mr. President, that is not all. I said a great deal of it spoiled. I have no doubt but what a good deal of it spoiled anyway. We will have to suffer those losses, and I do not know to what extent the particular incident that I am going to relate might not be explained in that way. But it is certainly an interesting proposition, and I wish to read what the Baltimore Sun reported about it. This is the article in the Baltimore Sun:

PILES OF FOOD BURNED—VAST STORES OF ARMY SUPPLIES MUST BE DESTROYED—SPOILED BY HASTY PACKING—SMOKE FROM GREAT DUMP NEAR RIVER VIEW BEARS TESTIMONY TO WASTAGE OF WAR.

Thousands of dollars' worth of foodstuffs of every kind are being burned as refuse at the Colgate warehouses of the United States Quartermaster Corps near River View, and the pity of it is, say the Government officials, that they are powerless to prevent the waste.

A visit to the warehouses yesterday disclosed the truth of persistent rumors that wholesale destruction of canned goods has been in progress for months. Just outside the wire palisade about the reservation, in plain view from the River View car line, the smoke from the refuse was ascending. The ground to the extent of about an acre was strewn with empty tin cans, burst open, and their contents poured out in many places more than knee deep.

Three negro dump keepers were on the job, and the wheelbarrows in which the cans were trundled from the four big warehouses were close by.

SWAMP FILLED WITH THE CANS.

"That pile is nothing," one of them said in answer to a question. "All this ground we are standing on is filled with layers of tin cans several feet thick. You see, after we burn the stuff for a while and the pile gets big we cover it over with a layer of dirt and start a new pile. That swamp over there is several feet deep, and it is filled with cans, too."

The negro explained that he is one of the 16 men whose task it is to sweep up around the warehouses and wheel the condemned cans to the fire.

"Each warehouse has several inspectors, who go around every day and inspect tomatoes, peas, milk, and other goods, and as soon as they find bad ones they mark them, and we wheel them away," he said.

As to how long the destruction has been going on the negro was dubious.

"You see, I have only been here since February," he said. "I don't know how long it was going on before that, but I know that some of us have wheeled cans to the dump almost every day since I came here to work."

There was a great deal of evidence taken before that committee about canned goods; and, by the way, the packers are interested in canned fruit and vegetables as well as in canned beef. Here is an extract from the letter of the general who had charge of it, written to one of the canners:

No canned vegetables will be put on the domestic market during this season.

Listen to this testimony. Col. Davis was on the stand, and he said:

Col. DAVIS. As I stated before, Gen. Rogers, on his return from France, knowing that there was a large surplus of canned vegetables on hand, shortly after his arrival took up that question with a view to disposing of this surplus. This information at once reached the canners of the country, and Mr. Gerber, president of the National Canners' Association, together with several canners and the secretary of the association, whose office is here in Washington, called on Gen. Rogers and showed him a letter received from Gen. R. E. Wood—

That is the letter I quoted from just a moment ago—

Acting Quartermaster General, agreeing not to place on the market——

Mr. REAVIS (interposing). When was that?

Col. DAVIS. This was in the latter part of February or early in March that this meeting occurred.

Mr. REAVIS. You may continue your statement.

Col. DAVIS. Agreeing not to place on the market this large surplus until after the 1919 pack was made.

Mr. DONOVAN. And when would that be?

Col. DAVIS. That would be completed along in September or along about September.

Mr. DONOVAN. Of this year?

Col. DAVIS. Of this year; yes, sir.

Here is some more questioning along the same line:

Mr. REAVIS. I tried to get that from Mr. Hare yesterday and he passed the buck to you, and now you pass it to somebody else, and we will get him and get to the bottom of it.

Now, you say here, quoting your letter, "This will entirely dispose of our stock and eliminate surplus." Now, if that had been true, Colonel, you would have deprived the Government of the money that it would make from the sale of these canned vegetables?

Col. DAVIS. Mr. REAVIS, this was written this way, largely with a view of quieting the mind of the canner and the farmer as to the likelihood of this surplus being dumped on the market here, and they knew, and Mr. Gerber knew, that it did not in any way prevent or intend to prevent the sale which we expected to make of a portion of our canned goods on the other side of the water.

In other words, they were not going to sell them here, but they would sell them abroad.

Mr. REAVIS. Well, how would that permit you to make a sale of a portion of your goods when you say in your letter that this will consume all the surplus?

Col. DAVIS. That is what I say; that was done for the purpose of quieting the minds of the canner and of the farmer——

Mr. REAVIS (interposing). You did not mean it?

Col. DAVIS (continuing). As to the fact of any surplus being dumped in this country; it did not mean that we were not going to continue our efforts to sell some of our goods abroad. It would take us—with the strength of the Army that we had at that time it would take a long while to use the entire amount, and it was intended to show these people that there would be no surplus so far as they were concerned to harass the conditions in the United States.

Mr. REAVIS. That is, you mean that the American people would have no opportunity of buying this surplus?

Col. DAVIS. That is the point exactly.

Mr. REAVIS. And notwithstanding the distress occasioned by the high cost of living here the only people to get the benefit was the people abroad and not our own?

Col. DAVIS. That is it exactly.

Mr. REAVIS. And that was done to protect the canners and the farmers?

Col. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Here is a little evidence to show that when Gen. Wood wrote that letter he was acting on authority higher up, and that the Secretary of War, in fact, was the man who was responsible for this policy:

Mr. REAVIS. Was there any definite conclusion arrived at at the first conference with reference to the disposition of canned vegetables?

Gen. ROGERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. REAVIS. What was the conclusion?

Gen. ROGERS. The conclusion was—after Mr. Thorne came into the office, I asked him if he knew anything about this letter of Gen. Wood, and he said that he did, and that the letter was not only written by Gen. Wood but had the approval of the War Department.

Mr. REAVIS. The approval of the War Department?

Gen. ROGERS. I think he made the statement "At the approval of the Secretary of War." I would like to change my statement and say, instead of the War Department, that it had the approval of the Secretary of War.

Mr. President, I might go on at any length with this evidence. I only wanted to call attention to the proposition that the solicitude that seemed to come all at once when Congress was officially asked to fix a penalty in the food-control act was more of a camouflage than anything else, that the administration has held back from the American people millions and millions of pounds of food, canned vegetables, and canned meats, when the people were suffering for them and anxious to get them. Food and meat that they had to pay for and were entitled to have were kept back from them simply because it was the policy of the War Department not to interfere with trade, and therefore they preferred that the people should continue to suffer from the high cost of living rather than that the market should be broken.

I think, Mr. President, if we made an investigation we would find the truth of some of the cruel rumors that seem to be well founded; that these agreements in regard to food were true in regard to everything else that we have bought; and we would find that there was an agreement by which our Government would not put automobiles upon sale because it would interfere with the millionaire manufacturers who had once made a profit on the automobiles which they sold to the Government. We had hundreds of thousands of them for which we had no use, and have now, spoiling and decaying and going to ruin. I think it would apply to practically everything, that to protect the packers we would not sell products upon the market in case the war ended, but would keep them out of the market; and everything that is done has indicated that that was the course pursued until the House of Representatives passed the resolution and brought about some action on the part of the War Department and this message on the part of the President.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I observe that this bill, H. R. 8624, proposing to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food, forage, and fuel," approved August 10, 1917, has no provision in it for extending the provisions of the act, but that the act will, under the terms of the original act, cease to exist on the proclamation of peace. Section 24 provides that—

The provisions of this act shall cease to be in effect when the existing state of war between the United States and Germany shall have terminated, and the fact and date of such termination shall be ascertained and proclaimed by the President.

So this remedy which is being offered is proposed to be destroyed by its own terms certainly within 20 or 30 days. I am amazed that such an act should be brought into the Senate without extending it so as to make it effective for the purposes for which it purports to be offered. It evidently was overlooked, because surely the Attorney General of the United States would not recommend this as a means of protecting the people against an abuse and then have it expire by its own terms when the treaty is ratified and peace declared.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. DIAL. I should like to suggest the absence of a quorum, if the Senator will yield for that purpose.

Mr. OWEN. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Jones, Wash.	Myers	Smoot
Beckham	Kellogg	Nelson	Spencer
Capper	Kendrick	Norris	Sterling
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Nugent	Swanson
Curtis	Kirby	Overman	Thomas
Dial	La Follette	Owen	Trammell
Gerry	Lenroot	Page	Underwood
Harris	Lodge	Sheppard	Watson
Harrison	McCumber	Simmons
Johnson, S. Dak.	McNary	Smith, Ariz.

Mr. SPENCER. I desire to announce that the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] are engaged on a committee hearing in the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KIRBY. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] on official business.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] on official business.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON], the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] are absent from the Senate on public business. I wish also to announce that the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY] is detained on business of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. CULBERSON, Mr. FLETCHER, and Mr. POMERENE answered to their names when called.

Mr. ROBINSON entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. THOMAS. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will carry out the order of the Senate.

Mr. FRANCE, Mr. MCLEAN, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. PHELAN, Mr. GRONNA, Mr. WADSWORTH, and Mr. NEW entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I wish to propose an amendment to this bill, to the effect that on page 4, after line 22, there shall be inserted:

That this section, with the interpretation of the term "necessaries," as set forth in the act approved August 10, 1917, shall not cease to be in effect upon the cessation of the existing state of war between the United States and Germany.

The principle which is set forth in that section 4, section 2 of the present proposed act, is this:

That it is hereby made unlawful for any person wilfully to destroy any necessaries for the purpose of enhancing the price or restricting the supply thereof.

I call the attention of Senators to the fact that this ought not to be repealed. It ought to remain the law of the land. It forbids men—knowingly to commit waste, or wilfully to permit preventable deterioration of any necessaries in or in connection with their production, manufacture, or distribution.

That ought to remain the law of the land. It makes it unlawful—to hoard, as defined in section 6 of this act, any necessaries; to monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, either locally or generally, any necessaries.

That ought to remain the law of the land. It ought not to be repealed, and it is repealed by the original act in these words in section 24:

That the provisions of this act shall cease to be in effect when the existing state of war between the United States and Germany shall have terminated, and the fact and date of such termination shall be ascertained and proclaimed by the President.

Mr. President, the people of this country are seriously distressed by the high cost of living, and here is a declaration of principle that will help to abate the high cost of living. I ask Senators if they are willing to be responsible for repealing these principles, or having them repealed, when they have in their hands the power to prevent their being repealed?

The responsibility is on you. I propose the amendment.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Oklahoma a question?

Mr. OWEN. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator's amendment extend this act indefinitely?

Mr. OWEN. It extends only the principles of section 2, which are set forth on page 3 of the pending bill and make unlawful the destroying of necessaries of life for the purpose of enhancing the price or restricting the supply. That ought to remain unlawful.

Mr. KENYON. Of course this measure is enacted, as the Senator remembers, as a war measure.

Mr. OWEN. Oh, I remember that very well, but these fundamental principles are so just and so sound that they ought not to be set aside, and since it is very easy to make them effective with the amendment I have proposed I think it ought to go in the bill.

Mr. KENYON. I am afraid the Senator's amendment will possibly interfere with the passage of the bill.

Mr. OWEN. That may be.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, it is a very easy matter to criticize, to find fault, especially at this time. Everything now is in a state of unrest, and criticism of the Government but adds to that unrest. It breeds discontent; aye, Bolshevism. I have listened with much interest to the speech of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], a speech in which he criticized not only what we are about to do in this legislation, but he criticized the food-control bill, the President's trip to Paris, the management of the Quartermaster Department, and numerous things.

I shall not attempt to answer all of those charges, many of which misrepresented the facts; but the Senator stated, in speaking of Barney Baruch, that Baruch had made $485,000 on a certain "leak" on the New York Stock Exchange.

I hold in my hand the report made by the Committee on Rules in the Sixty-fourth Congress, acting under a resolution passed by the House of Representatives directing it to investigate certain charges made by a very—must I say—distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Thomas W. Lawson. What he stated in the newspapers was taken as correct by a certain member of the opposing party in the House of Representatives, and on those charges this investigation was made.

Among other charges that Representative WOOD at that time made, based upon the charges made by Mr. Thomas W. Lawson, was:

That a member of the Cabinet,' a United States Senator, and a banker were together interested in a speculative stock-market account, the profits of which they divided equally, the success of their speculation being promoted by advance information that a note either had been or was to be sent to belligerent nations of a character likely to promote the prospects of peace in Europe.

Meaning that that particular speculator was Barney Baruch. Here is what the committee in their report say touching that, and it was unanimously adopted. Every Republican as well as every Democrat signed this report. It was unanimously agreed to by the House of Representatives, so there can be no question as to the findings of that committee. It says:

The committee has examined under oath and by aid of counsel every person named or suggested by Mr. Lawson. Not one of them supported or corroborated these charges. On the contrary, every one of them contradicted him. Furthermore, as a result of a careful examination of the customers' accounts of New York brokers, no such account as was described by the witness was disclosed or even indicated.

Further on in the report appears the third charge made by Representative WOOD upon the suggestion of Thomas W. Lawson:

Third. That Bernard M. Baruch, a member of the New York Stock Exchange, and speculator, with offices in New York, had information regarding the President's note as early as Saturday, December 9, and on two or three different occasions had been seen in consultation with Joseph P. Tumulty, the President's private secretary, at the Biltmore Hotel in New York City—the obvious inference of the charge being that such advance information had been received by Mr. Baruch from Mr. Tumulty on some one or all of those occasions.

The committee unanimously reports:

As to the third proposition—

That is, the proposition touching Mr. Baruch—

Mr. WOOD laid before the committee a letter signed "A. Curtis," which contained the statement above referred to regarding Mr. Baruch and Mr. Tumulty.

The committee, however, were unable to find the author of the letter. The signature was evidently fictitious and the statements which it contained were unfounded. Both Mr. Baruch and Mr. Tumulty denied that they had ever met at the Biltmore Hotel or that they had been in conference regarding the President's note on any occasion before its publication. A careful inquiry by the committee failed to produce the slightest evidence to substantiate the charge.

While it appeared in evidence that Mr. Baruch was speculating during the week of December 18, he denied that he either had or was influenced by information in relation to the President's note, and no evidence was adduced or could be found indicating that he had any such information.

And the facts disclosed that on the day of the leak Mr. Baruch was selling stocks instead of buying them, and on that particular day lost money instead of making money. So much for the unwarranted charge against Mr. Baruch.

Now, as to the proposition advanced by the Senator from Nebraska, that the Army made a great mistake in retaining the surplus supplies of canned goods. I thought some time ago that the Army should have disposed of those goods before they did, but when I read the evidence before the committees of the Senate and of the House; when Mr. Hare, who was placed at the head of the sales department, stated that they had circularized this country by sending out 20,000 circulars trying to obtain purchasers for those goods; that they had consulted with the Red Cross representatives, the Young Men's Christian Association representatives, and the representatives of other organizations on the best method to dispose of them and tried to obtain for the Government a just and reasonable price, I was convinced that those men were doing about all they could in this matter.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, of course the Senator remembers from Mr. Hare's testimony and the circulars that those offers were only in very, very large lots, where the average man would have no opportunity whatever.

Mr. HARRISON. I think that is quite true, but I do not think that criticism should be hurled at the administration, especially the President. The advisory members of the Industrial Board, with but one exception, I am advised, were Republicans. That at least should be taken into consideration when these criticisms are hurled at the President by Members of the Senate as well as of the other body.

The Senator from Nebraska says that the President did not know what the food-control act contained when he delivered his message to Congress; that he recommended certain things in his message that were already in the law; and that the Department of Justice under the law as it was then on the statute books could have proceeded against the profiteers.

Here is what the President said in his message:

> Fortunately under the terms of the food-control act the hoarding of foodstuffs can be checked and prevented, and they will be with the greatest energy.

And yet one listening to the speech of the Senator from Nebraska would believe that the President would have the Congress believe that there was no penalty attached in the food-control act for hoarding, and that therefore the Department of Justice could not proceed against them. On the contrary, the President expressly stated in his message that they could proceed against hoarders under the food-control act, but that they could not proceed against individual profiteers in this country; and what he suggested was a penalty by which we might get at the individual profiteer, and that is what we have done in this legislation.

Under the food-control act there are several penalties provided for certain offenses if the parties are caught. There is a penalty against hoarding. That is embodied in section 6. There is a penalty in section 8 against any person who willfully destroys any necessaries, and so forth. There is a penalty against anyone who permits preventable deterioration of any necessaries, and so forth. But there is no penalty in the food-control act for an individual who goes out and charges unreasonable and exorbitant prices for necessaries, and there is no penalty in the present food-control act against those who would make unreasonable and exorbitant profits on wearing apparel. In other words, while under the food-control act you can get at a combination, you can prosecute a set of men who agree among themselves to charge an exorbitant and unreasonable profit, you can not under the present law get at an individual who makes an exorbitant or unreasonable profit.

All of us know the condition in this country respecting shoes. The prices have soared from $8.50 a pair to $10 and $12 a pair; they have soared from $6 a pair to $16 and $17 a pair; and these pirates who have been robbing the people throughout the country by exacting exorbitant and unreasonable profits should be brought to the bar of justice and punished. And if the Congress of the United States fails to assume the responsibilities in passing appropriate legislation that will ferret out these profiteers and give the Department of Justice the weapons whereby they can be punished, then we must make an accounting and must answer to the American people. These unconscionable gougers have already too long fleeced the people. They have grown fat at the expense of the many.

The Department of Justice, acting under its head to-day, is doing everything in its power, using every weapon at its command, in order to punish those fellows who are violating the law. In the various cities throughout the country men who are hoarding necessaries are being indicted and are being punished. Hundreds of cases have already been placed upon the dockets awaiting trial. Many of these men have already been tried and punished. But they were tried and they were punished under those provisions of the food-control act that made it unlawful to hoard necessaries in this country. The other House have already done their duty in the matter, although of course I can not say that they would have done it had it not been for the President, whom the Senator from Nebraska seems to criticize, because that body was on the eve of adjourning—it had passed its resolution on the 5th day of July to adjourn, the leaders in this body had agreed to it, and were going to allow them to go home, when the President, desirous that these profiteers should be brought to the bar and punished, respectfully suggested to them to remain in session that appropriate legislation might be passed. They did remain in session; they did pass this legislation. That has been some four of five weeks ago. And here we are just now about to pass the legislation that the President weeks ago requested us to pass immediately, the legislation that the Attorney General advocated before the Committee on Agriculture some three weeks ago and urged us to give immediate favorable consideration to. Although we have been slow in doing it, we have embodied in this legislation everything requested by the Department of Justice.

Mr. DIAL. What is the life of this bill?

Mr. HARRISON. The bill will die when peace is proclaimed; when the treaties are ratified.

Mr. DIAL. The only theory on which you ask for this legislation is on the ground that it is a war measure?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. DIAL. And the war is practically over.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know about that. We have not asked for it to be extended. The Department of Justice did not ask for it to be extended, but the Attorney General came to us and said, "Gentlemen, I can not get at the profiteers unless you write into this law 'wearing apparel,' and at the same time fix a penalty, so that I can get at the profiteer in this country." He requested simple amendments, and we—or, I might say, some of us—gladly gave them to him. I am not in favor of extending this bill beyond the proclamation of peace. I think we are getting on dangerous ground when we do it. I do not know that we have the constitutional authority to do it. I do not think we have the constitutional authority to do it, because this does not deal wholly with interstate commerce. This deals with the individual in a State who is doing business intrastate, as well as interstate, and so I am opposed to that particular amendment—the amendment suggested by the Senator from Oklahoma——

Mr. CURTIS. May I ask a question of the Senator?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. To what amendment did the Senator say he is opposed? Is it a committee amendment?

Mr. HARRISON. I said I was opposed to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Oklahoma, that this should be extended beyond war times. It is not a committee amendment. There was another amendment that was embodied in this legislation that was not incorporated in the bill as passed by the House of Representatives, and that is found on page 3 of the bill.

The amendment reads:

> Or to exact unreasonable and excessive prices for a lease or sublease, rent or subrent of any dwelling house, dwelling room, or apartment, either furnished or unfurnished, in the District of Columbia.

No one would doubt the jurisdiction of Congress to pass such legislation as that. No one who has lived in Washington can doubt the necessity for some legislation that will restrain the hand of these piratical landlords in the District of Columbia. Those who have kept up with the hearings before the subcommittee of the Committee on the District of Columbia of the Senate are bound to be convinced that men have been robbing the people in the District of Columbia in too high and too excessive rents.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BECKHAM in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. In this connection I may suggest that not more than a week or 10 days ago a woman who is a renter called at my office and stated, among other things, that she sought to rent an apartment in a building which is under the control of one of the leading landlords of this city, who very graciously promised to show her through the apartments. The conversation was by telephone. But after he had arranged to show her through the aparments he asked the question, "Did you take advantage of the Saulsbury Act?" And she replied, in substance, "Indeed, I did." Then he said he did not care to have her come to the apartment house. Another one said, in substance, "Just wait until the Saulsbury resolution expires by limitation and then the apartment house owners will make money." That is the present situation.

Mr. HARRISON. It is an awful condition, and cases on cases could be enumerated that would show that appropriate legislation should be passed to remedy that situation. I heard of one case where a woman had paid $30 a month for an apartment and had leased it out, or subleased it, for $150.

These people should be prevented from doing that. Whenever we make it possible to reduce the high rents in the District of Columbia we will reduce the high cost of living immeasurably to the people who live here. It is a duty we owe them, and we should grant them immediate relief.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I am cooperating with the Committee on the District of Columbia on the very matter to which the Senator refers. I notice that the bill contains a provision forbidding unreasonable and excessive prices for subleasing, and so forth. That is for the determination of the court as to what is unreasonable?

Mr. HARRISON. It is.

Mr. PHELAN. And the court might possibly be moved by considerations of the law of supply and demand, so it would be no remedy at all.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know by what the court might be moved. Of course in order to convict one under it they would go into court. The jury would finally pass upon that proposition.

Mr. PHELAN. Does the Senator think that in the case of landlords offering their apartments for rent at public auction that would be a wise determination of the public value of the property, and hence determine whether it was reasonable or unreasonable?

Mr. HARRISON. A lot of things might enter into the proposition of whether it was reasonable or unreasonable, but may I ask the distinguished Senator a question? Is he in favor of any legislation affecting rents in the District of Columbia?

Mr. PHELAN. I have been acting with the Committee on the District of Columbia——

Mr. HARRISON. That is why I am anxious to know how the Senator feels.

Mr. PHELAN. For the very purpose of in some way regulating profiteering, more particularly in the matter of subletting, because the owner of the property does not get the advantage of the increased value of the property by reason of the excessive demand, but some middleman does.

Mr. HARRISON. Unquestionably that is true in some cases.

Mr. PHELAN. But what is in my mind is that the person investing his savings, if you please—let me say, to make it more sympathetic, a poor man investing his savings in a house instead of in a farm, for the purpose of having a little income in his old age, finds the arm of the Government restraining him in the collection of the natural revenue from the property, whereas the man who invests in a farm is given unlimited opportunity to profiteer because he is a farmer.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the Senator has greatly exaggerated that situation. I have had a great deal of experience in the courts, not only on the side of the prosecution, because it was my pleasure once to serve for five and one-half years as prosecuting attorney, but on the side of defense also, and while sometimes there is a miscarriage of justice, it is very, very seldom, and the juries do not generally convict an innocent man.

In the first place, the question of the man who is charged with making an unreasonable and exorbitant profit in the leasing of his house is passed on by the grand jury. They pass on it first, and then he is tried before a jury of his peers, and they must agree before conviction on all the facts presented that the charge is unreasonable. It seems to me it is almost impossible for an innocent man to be convicted under the proposition. Does not the Senator from California think so?

Mr. PHELAN. I am thinking of the proposition of relieving the tense situation in the District by encouraging the construction of more buildings. I saw a prospectus the other day of an apartment house to cost a million dollars, and they had to borrow something like $750,000 in order to construct it. They held out the expectation of returns to investors in the stock and in the bonds. Knowing the situation here, I would be very loath to make an investment in the stock or bonds, and if they are not sold the apartment house will not be constructed. I will be loath because Congress is trying to invest apartment houses and even dwellings with the character of a public use, and hence it would be impossible for those projectors of apartment houses to dispose of their securities. If you will leave them alone they will put up apartment houses and naturally their zeal to collect the very high rents which exist now will cause an abatement of the high-rent situation and it will pass away.

Mr. HARRISON. If you let them alone they will continue to bleed the people just as leeches bleed human beings.

Mr. PHELAN. If there are more apartment houses it will have a tendency to lower rents.

Mr. HARRISON. But apartment houses have been going up quite rapidly during the last few years in Washington, much more rapidly than in any other city in the United States, and rents have been going up even much more rapidly.

Mr. PHELAN. It is because people come to Washington more numerously on account of war conditions, and, of course, it was possible during war conditions to take this extraordinary step. But the war is over. We are undertaking to make it possible for investors to construct buildings in Washington, and this is not an adequate and permanent way to cure the cost of living.

Mr. HARRISON. This is not permanent legislation.

Mr. PHELAN. No; it is only war-time legislation.

Mr. HARRISON. It only applies to this bill——

Mr. PHELAN. But the Senator has an amendment before the Senate by which he really endeavors to make it permanent. It seems to me to be wrong economically.

Mr. HARRISON. I am very much in hopes that the Senate and the House will adopt this provision, thereby giving some immediate relief to the people of the District, and that the committee of which the distinguished Senator is a member will bring out some permanent legislation that will not only remedy some unfortunate cases under the Saulsbury law, but will extend this provision and make it permanent law, so that the strong arm of the Department of Justice can punish those who deal unjustly with the people in this city and whose whole ambition is to add unreasonable and exorbitant rent charges on the already heavy-burdened shoulders of thousands of wage earners in Washington.

Mr. PHELAN. I think the most logical method of relief would be found in the Government paying its employees, who necessarily have to live in Washington, a sufficient salary. There are a lot of sightseers and cave dwellers who need not live here. The Government should compensate its employees sufficiently to meet this new demand, and reduce the compensation when the rents fall to meet those conditions. But why should the individual property owner be made to bear the additional burden of tax? He pays on his excess receipts 80 per cent in most cases to the Government as an excess war tax, and why should he be singled out to pay this added burden? Why should not the Government itself, representing all the people, compensate its employees adequately to meet not only the high cost of living but the high cost of sleeping?

Mr. HARRISON. I am seeking to put this burden on him because he has been putting the burden on the people of the District too long.

Mr. PHELAN. You wish to punish him?

Mr. HARRISON. I wish to do justice by him but compel him to do justice toward the public.

Mr. PHELAN. But this is not a penal statute.

Mr. HARRISON. I am quite sure that no jury will convict any man unless he is charging an unreasonable and exorbitant price for his dwelling or apartment or his rooms.

Mr. PHELAN. I want to cure the bill, but I want to do it in a permanent and logical way.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has not suggested a cure, and he will certainly aid the unfortunate people in the District if he will assist to write this much into the law at the present time.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. DIAL. Does not the Senator think his purpose could be accomplished in a separate bill governing the rents in the District of Columbia?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I really think so.

Mr. DIAL. The Committee on the District of Columbia is preparing such a bill, which will be placed before the Senate in a day or two. It is a very comprehensive bill along that line, and it seems to me it would be better to let the matter be covered in a separate bill.

Mr. HARRISON. I think it would be better to have the whole thing embodied in a separate bill, but since I have come to Washington as a Member of the House and as a Member of the Senate, I have heard it suggested time after time to put this off and put that off, defer and procrastinate touching legislation, and finally we get nothing. Let us meet the conditions as they arise—meet them promptly and effectively.

Here is an opportunity to give relief to these people by incorporating it in this bill, and the question that should guide us is whether or not we are in favor of it. If we are in favor of it it will become the law, and we can give immediate relief. If we wait we may give them no relief.

There is one further proposition to which I desire to address myself briefly. There is an amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], or in which, I believe, he is interested. It was not incorporated in the bill as it passed the House. It is known as the Smith amendment, and was placed in the bill by the Senate committee. It was intended to be placed there as a measure or as a standard whereby juries in arriving at their verdict could have something on which to base their verdict. It reads as follows:

And provided further, That to make unjust or unreasonable a rate or charge in handling or dealing in or with any necessaries, except where there has been a conspiracy, combination, or arrangement with reference to prices, such rate or charge must be in excess of the rate or charge fixed by a fair-price committee, and the Department of Justice is authorized to provide for the appointment of fair-price committees.

That is the Senate committee amendment. I expect at the proper time to ask the Senate to disagree to that amendment. I believe it weakens the legislation. I believe it will make it almost impossible to prosecute some of these fellows whom we are trying to get under the provisions of the law.

It is quite true that the Attorney General, when he appeared before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate, stated that these committees in the various sections of the country that have fixed prices under the licensing system had been requested to reorganize, and that they expected to organize these fair-price committees all over the country, having thereon a representative of the consumers, a representative of labor, a representative of the retail dealers, and probably two other additional disinterested persons. In my opinion, whenever you indict a party for profiteering, charging an unreasonable and exorbitant price under this bill, the astute lawyer that will be employed to defend under this amendment would probably in every case interpose the objection that the fair-price committee was not legally appointed, that it had no authority to fix prices, and innumerable propositions would be advanced to becloud the issue before the jury and prevent justice being done.

For my part, rather than leave it to a fair-price committee over the country to fix the price of the necessaries and publish that price list in the paper and have it as a measure for the jury to go by in arriving at its verdict, I would prefer to leave it to the jury to ascertain all the facts and pass on the proposition of whether or not it was an unreasonable and exorbitant charge. In other words, I would rather leave it to the 18 men who form the grand jury and the 12 men who make up the petit jury to say what is an unreasonable and exorbitant profit than the fair-price committees over the country.

So I shall at the proper time make a motion to disagree to that particular amendment. I sincerely hope that the provision or the amendment touching rents in the District of Columbia will prevail, and that the other amendments brought in by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate, with the exception I have stated, will prevail.

Mr. DIAL obtained the floor.

Mr. LENROOT. May I ask the Senator from Mississippi just one question before the Senator proceeds?

Mr. DIAL. Certainly. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] stated, as I understood him, that in the original law there was no penalty whatever for profiteering. The Senator did not mean that?

Mr. HARRISON. No; I did not state that. I said there was no provision in the food-control act for a penalty against the individual who made an unreasonable or exorbitant charge.

Mr. LENROOT. That is just the point.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator from Mississippi certainly recognizes that there is such a provision in the original law. The very section which this bill seeks to amend—and I am not opposing the bill, I will say to the Senator—applies to all dealers in food and fuel, and a penalty is provided for an unreasonable profit if the President exercising the power under the act requires licenses, and there is a penalty of not more than $5,000 nor more than two years imprisonment for violation of the order of the President.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the Senator from Wisconsin is absolutely mistaken about that. If he is not, the committee is mistaken and the Attorney General is mistaken. There is a penalty in that act against certain things, but not against the individual who makes an exorbitant and unreasonable charge.

Mr. LENROOT. Let me say—and I am sorry to take the time——

Mr. DIAL. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. But I want the record to be straight. A portion of section 5 of the original act reads:

> Any person who, without a license issued pursuant to this section, or whose license shall have been revoked, knowingly engages in or carries on any business for which a license is required under this section, or willfully fails or refuses to discontinue any unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory, and unfair storage charge, commission, profit, or practice, in accordance with the requirement of an order issued under this section, or any regulation prescribed under this section, shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

The only difference being that the license system must be put into operation to make it apply.

Mr. HARRISON. That is very true. We do not differ about that in its relation to the license system. However, they have demobilized their forces in that department; they have ceased to operate under the license system; and they have stated that it would take some 60 days if they had to reorganize and start over.

Mr. LENROOT. I wished to correct the statement that there was no penalty.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; to that extent there is.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Mississippi a question?

Mr. DIAL. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KELLOGG. Do I understand that the jury in each case, if this amendment were stricken out, would decide what an unreasonable price was?

Mr. HARRISON. That is the idea.

Mr. KELLOGG. Suppose there were two retail dealers in the same town charging the same prices who were both arrested and had separate trials, and that in one case the jury held the price was excessive and in the other case the jury held that it was not excessive; how is a man to know whether or not he is charging an excessive price?

Mr. HARRISON. The fellow who is convicted in that case would be very unfortunate, but I might say to the Senator that that is true in a great many instances. I have seen a man convicted by one jury and another man under the same state of facts turned loose.

Mr. KELLOGG. Is it not a fact that the law must point out a way, so that the individual may know whether or not he is violating it?

Mr. HARRISON. I would say to the Senator, in connection with that, that that is why the amendment known as the Smith amendment gave the Attorney General the power to appoint a fair-price committee, so that prices might be fixed which could be taken as a standard. That is why that provision was included.

Mr. KELLOGG. I understood the Senator was going to move to strike that out.

Mr. HARRISON. I was going to move to strike it out, but I may say that the majority of the committee was against my view on that proposition.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, during war times it made no difference whether or not an act was constitutional or legal, whatever the Government wanted the people were willing to let it have. Now the war is practically over—not legally over, but to all intents and purposes it is ended—and it occurs to me it is time to stop extending any war measures. I know of no ground upon which this proposed law can be based except as a war measure, and we hope that the present condition even of legal war will not continue longer than a very few days or a very short time at most.

Mr. President, I am opposed to hoarding; I am opposed to profiteering; I am opposed to robbery in any shape; but this bill goes further than the war measure, for it includes articles that were not included in the original food-control act. To that extent, I certainly think this bill ought not to be passed. The country has become accustomed to the former law, but now here it is proposed to include wearing apparel. The enactment of the bill will disorganize business; legitimate affairs of the people would be tampered with and all thrown out of gear for some considerable time.

Under this bill the people would be liable to be haled into court, prosecuted, and tried upon an indefinite charge and under indefinite definitions of what profiteering is. I do not know what it is. What would mean profiteering to one person would not appear to be profiteering to another person. So I am utterly opposed to disturbing the business conditions of this country and allowing our people to be harassed with this unnecessary law, as I take it to be. Certainly it ought not to be extended under any circumstances to include articles not enumerated in the existing law. It would result in having men haled before a court, their reputations besmirched for some act that even the courts would not know the definition of, and would never be told until after the jury passed upon it. I repeat, what would be profiteering to one man would not be profiteering, perhaps, to another.

To have a fair-price commission go around over the country—a commission composed of inexperienced men—would greatly disturb business, and I hope that will not be done. I have offered an amendment to strike out the words "wearing apparel," on page 2, line 4.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIAL. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator realizes, I presume, that if wearing apparel should be stricken from this bill we would not be able to get at the profiteers who are making big profits on shoes.

Mr. DIAL. The trouble, Mr. President, and the chief cause of the high cost of living is that people have quit the farms and have gone to town. They want to get into houses, instead of working outdoors. I left here the other night on a train. A gentleman happened to be sitting by me in the smoker who, as it turned out, was a former client of mine. He was a manufacturer of shoes; he owned a shoe factory; and he told me the other day his wife bought a pair of shoes which cost her $6, and that was the highest price she had ever paid for a pair of shoes. In a day or two his stenographer came in wearing a new pair of shoes and he asked her what her shoes cost, and she said they cost her $16. He told her she was not able to pay that much for shoes, but she answered that she made the money and she was going to buy such shoes as she desired to buy. That is one reason why the cost of living is high; it is high living. People are spending money unnecessarily.

The other day I heard of a colored man stepping into a store in my adjoining county and asking to see some shirts. They showed him a $2 shirt and he said that was not fine enough. Then they showed him a $6 shirt and he said that was not good enough. He was next shown a $10 shirt, and he said he would take three of those; and he pulled out three $10 bills and paid for them. That is one reason for the high cost of living.

I heard a man say the other day he stepped into a store where they had a pile of shirts as high as his head. A youth entered the store and asked the merchant the price of the shirts. The merchant told him they were $6, and if he wanted any of those shirts he had better pick his out pretty soon to get the pattern he wanted. My informant inquired who bought such shirts, and was told the boys in the mills.

I dined with a friend the other day, a very rich man, whose salary, I think, is $25,000 a year, who said that he stepped into a store the other day with the idea of purchasing a silk shirt. He said that he had never owned one before. He asked the clerk the price of the shirt, and was told $12. He said, "I would consider it a reflection on my intelligence to pay $12 for a shirt." He asked the clerk "who buys that kind of shirts?" and was told the barbers and the hack drivers and the boys who want to blow in. That is the trouble with this country; the people have quit work and are going to the towns, and yet we expect prices to go down. What we need is to have our people get some tools and go back on the farm and produce something to eat.

I am not going to take up much time in the discussion now, but we all know of the inflated condition of the currency; we know of the war destruction and everything of that sort, and we know that prices are bound to be high for a considerable time. I am not a merchant, and the provisions of the bill will not interfere with me at all except in a general way, but I think that the way to bring about natural and normal conditions is to quit being abnormal and to quit passing unnecessary laws and to adjourn the Senate as soon as we can get the treaty ratified and some much-needed reconstructive laws enacted. That would do as much to quiet this country and satisfy our people as anything else that could be done. I would not appear critical of my colleagues, but it is my honest opinion that every legitimate interest would be served if the sessions of Congress were shorter, say not longer than four months in the year. I think then there would not be so much unrest in this country.

I hope this proposed law will not be extended any further than to articles originally embraced in the food-control act. Let us get back to normal and not enact so much legislation in Washington. We have set a good many bad examples here. The way to do is to let the people go back to the country, pay their debts, pay for the expenses of the war, and forget about it.

CITY POLICE AND LABOR UNIONS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I had intended to discuss some of the features of this bill to-day, but I am informed that some Senators desire a short executive session, and I shall therefore postpone that duty until to-morrow. I shall, however, before the executive session is held refer briefly to dispatches reaching the city this afternoon, informing the public of conditions in Boston, where a strike of policemen, called day before yesterday and fixed for 5.30 yesterday afternoon, is now in full operation. I had occasion yesterday to express some anxiety about that situation, and I fear that my apprehensions, as the facts now disclose, are fully justified.

At 5.30 to 6 o'clock yesterday afternoon 85 per cent of the metropolitan police force of the city of Boston and belonging to the police union of that city, previously affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, surrendered their weapons, laid down their clubs, and suspended their activities, the grievance being the discharge of some of the force by the State police commissioner for retaining their federation membership contrary to the order of that official. The papers this morning outlined a somewhat grave situation but carried the encouraging news that the citizens of Boston had taken up the work of their recalcitrant officials and were engaged in policing the city as best they could.

The Evening Star, of Washington, in its last edition devotes the first column of its front page to the subject, and, with the permission of the Senate, I will read the Associated Press dispatches as they there appear.

The first dispatch is very short, announcing that Mayor Peters had taken over the control from Commissioner Curtis, a State appointee—and who, by the way, has not been removed, although the governor has been petitioned by the American Federation of Labor to remove him for disciplining disobedient members of the force—and had called upon the State guard organizations to assist in maintaining order.

Then follows the Associated Press dispatch:

BOSTON, September 10.

Gov. Coolidge early this afternoon called out the Fourth Brigade of the State guard, made up of the Eleventh, Twelfth, and Fifteenth Regiments, and the machine-gun company of the Fourteenth Regiment. The troops were ordered to report to Mayor Peters forthwith.

That is a very serious order, Mr. President. It indicates that a very grave condition existed or it would not have been made. The remainder of the dispatch informs the public of that situation:

BOSTON, September 10.

Lawlessness was rampant in Boston to-day. Without adequate police protection, private citizens were left to their own resources to protect their lives and property.

Since the police struck at 5.45 o'clock yesterday afternoon there has been no organized police power able to cope with the situation that last night approached anarchy and to-day appeared to grow more serious as the inadequacy of the makeshift arrangements intended to preserve public order became obvious to the criminally inclined.

At 11.15 a. m. to-day the State guard had not been called out, and, so far as could be learned, only a handful of higher officers in the police department and an indefinite number of "volunteers" were making an effort to prevent disorder.

Virtually nothing of what was proposed at the city hall or statehouse could be learned this morning. Mayor Peters was said to be "in conference with prominent citizens." Gov. Coolidge was said to be still standing back of Police Commissioner Curtis. At the commissioner's office it was said he had turned the recruiting of an emergency force over to former superintendent of police, William H. Pierce, who was busy swearing in volunteers.

CITY ABANDONED TO HOODLUMS.

Last night the city was virtually abandoned to the hoodlum and criminal. For some reason not publicly explained the volunteer force which it had been expected would go on duty when the police quit was not called out until this morning.

The banks and larger mercantile institutions were protected by their own guards, but the small retailer was at the mercy of mobs, which included in their number all elements, from the purely mischievous to the downright criminal. Store windows to a number estimated at 300 were smashed in and goods by the armful carried away. Police Superintendent Crowley placed the damage done during the night at $300,000.

Supt. Crowley said this morning that his emergency force, made up of a few faithful policemen and volunteers, totaled between 600 and 700. This was less than one-half the number of the regular police force.

DESTRUCTION IN DOWN-TOWN BOSTON.

Down-town Boston presented a sad picture this morning. The systematic looting had ceased apparently with the coming of daylight, but evidences of last night's lawlessness were plentiful. On Washington Street near School Street the whole glass front of a haberdashery had been smashed. Around the corner, on School Street, Walton's cafe looked as if it had been struck by a cyclone. All 10 of the Walton cafes in the city, where there is a strike on, were looted.

Crowds gathered early, as on a holiday, and surged through lower Washington Street and the other narrow thoroughfares of the congested business district. They generally had the spirit of merry-makers, but there was something ominous in the steady augmentation of the idle and the freedom from restraint.

The cross streets, with few exceptions, were unguarded. The reckless motor-car driver was in his glory and pedestrians made dangerous crossings at their peril.

A walk from Boylston Street through Tremont to Bromfield and north through Washington to Court Street revealed only one person who was making any show of authority.

Now listen, Senators:

ATTACKS ON WOMEN FREQUENT.

Attacks of women throughout the night were frequent and atrocious. In numerous parts of the city there were villainous assaults. The vicious element suffered the most, but according to reports no woman was safe in the little-frequented districts or where the streets were not brilliantly illuminated.

Two women were pursued by a mob and found refuge in the city hospital. With a boldness almost unbelievable the mob attempted to force its way into the institution and was only stopped by a handful of officers who had arrived a moment before with a man who had been shot.

WALKOUT SIGNAL FOR ROWDYISM.

Rowdyism started almost with the walkout of the patrolmen last night. Thousands of persons gathered about the police stations before 6 p. m., and when the officers emerged in civilian clothes or without insignia or equipment they were greeted with cheers and jeers, and at some stations youths with grudges against certain officers threw mud, sticks, and stones. These crowds were dispersed by superior officers and loyal patrolmen.

In south Boston rowdyism and looting started early and continued through the night. Windows in whole blocks of stores were broken and their contents scattered. Those who could not get near the windows were able to buy rare bargains in wearing apparel and cheap jewelry from others who were overstocked.

A sailor in an Avoy Street crowd carried a fully dressed store dummy. Without leaving the street he took off his uniform and donned the "civies," even to the collar and tie.

Some one sold him an expensive velour hat for 35 cents, and he departed with his uniform under his arm. Reports that sailors were prominent in the disturbances brought armed guards from the navy yard.

The police strike began shortly before 6 o'clock. The patrolmen reported at the evening roll call and turned in their revolvers, clubs, and patrol-box keys.

Mr. President, I shall not occupy the time of the Senate with reading the remainder of this article. It recites the shooting of three men and the stabbing of one, and gives the immediate cause of the strike as the refusal of Commissioner Curtis to sanction the policemen's union because of its affiliation with the American Federation of Labor, the union voting 1,134 to 2 to call the strike.

To me, Mr. President, this is the logical consequence of the affiliation of the officers of the law with private organizations of whatever character. It is an inescapable fact that when the officials of government assume obligations or enter into covenants which may contingently interfere or conflict with the discharge of their duty they at once became subject to a double allegiance, the fruit of which is inevitable in this imperfect world. Since the Master said, centuries ago, that no man could serve two masters, no man ever has or ever will successfully do so. The conflict of interests and of obligations is absolutely irreconcilable. Mr. President, this is a step which if accomplished will not end with the so-called unionizing of the police forces of America. Already efforts are being made to unionize the Army; and if it is legitimate to unionize the police, it is equally legitimate to unionize the soldiers of the Republic.

The second column of the paper from which I have read contains a most enthusiastic account of the reception given to the immortal Pershing and the equally immortal First Division by the people of the great city of New York. Within 200 miles of each other, there is the contrast—a contrast representing much that is good and all that is sinister in the relations of men to their National and State Governments. I can well imagine how, if this tendency goes unchecked, the splendid record of achievement of the expeditionary force which has written its name in letters of gold upon the imperishable pages of American history may, through its influences, be tarnished by the assumption of obligations inimical to duty and to allegiance.

I have no reason for assuming that Boston will be the only victim of these disturbances. This is but the beginning; and just as surely as the movement is permitted to develop, just so surely will there be repetitions of them in every city in the country.

In the editorial pages of the Star there is expressed the timid hope that these disorders may not visit the Capital City. Why, Mr. President, it is the duty of the press of this city, it is the duty of the press of the United States—a duty which it owes to the people of America—to become the leaders in the effort to suppress official lawlessness, to sound the alarm, and to see that this spirit, now so rampant, shall not be converted into an agency for the destruction of the social fabric.

The Washington Post this morning saw fit to criticize, and criticize somewhat severely, my comments upon the action of Mr. Justice Gould in issuing an injunction against the Commissioners of this District. I am taken to task for using my high position upon this floor, for exercising my privilege as a United States Senator, in expressing some disapprobation of the judicial conduct of a great judge. I have done here what I have done elsewhere under analogous conditions, and what I shall continue to do when occasion demands it so long as I live.

Mr. President, I have always respected the bench; I always shall, as long as it maintains its present lofty standards; but I have had occasion more than once during the long course of practice at the bar and in the discharge in my humble way of some of the functions of a citizen, to criticize and to condemn the attitude of some of the courts of my country. To illustrate, I once felt bound to do so, when the supreme court of my own State imposed a fine upon my former partner some time ago for a criticism, the notorious truth of which he offered to prove. The facts were that the court, with one solitary and honorable exception, had deliberately surrendered to the interests of the public utilities of my home city.

I have had occasion upon this floor to express dissent from certain decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and particularly one which read a word into a statute which had been deliberately excluded therefrom by the Congress, and I shall not now hesitate to continue the same course when confronted by another judge wrongfully assuming jurisdiction of a mighty proposition and tying the hands of the only body invested with authority to solve it. It will be a sorry day for the people of America when our courts become immune to criticism. Public opinion is the one great corrective of their assumptions of power or their misapplication of the law.

I want to say to the people of the Capital City of the United States that if the Boston condition is to be duplicated here, and that is what this decision contemplates, sooner or later they will be confronted with the same consequences. The time will inevitably come when, as in Boston, the women of this city will be unsafe upon the streets of the American Capital, when its stores will be looted, when its citizens will be shot down, and when the middle-class citizen will have to shoulder his gun, take up the baton of the policeman, and patrol the streets for the protection of his property and his family and for the vindication of the law.

We must meet this situation, and if it be true that it is the logical development of conditions which we can not suppress or prevent, then, Mr. President, we and our children can at least have the consolation of knowing that when the crisis confronted us we did not flinch, but sought to meet it, and to meet it like men.

Mr. President, I do not know what this court will do to-morrow. It may make the injunction perpetual. If it does, it ties the commissioners hand and foot and delivers them to the police union. The District Commissioners may see fit, in their judgment, or through the advice of counsel, to submit to that iniquity. I hope they will exercise their prerogative whatever the consequence. But if they shall bow to the court decree and leave the judges responsible for results, then the duty of the Congress becomes the more insistent. I affirm that an awakening courage and a reviving Americanism in the Senate and House of Representatives, too long repressed, is now quickening into life. May it now assert itself, prove equal to the crisis, and reestablish the conviction that this Republic, equal to every danger which may confront it, is yet capable of accomplishing its destiny through the devotion, the heroism, the sacrifice of its people.

NEW ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to take just a moment to call the attention of the office of information of the United States Department of Agriculture to what I consider a useless waste of money and a useless waste of time. The other day the Senate confirmed Mr. James R. Riggs, who was nominated for Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, and the office of information sent out this advertisement and publicity:

NEW ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

The new Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, James R. Riggs, whose nomination has just been confirmed by the Senate, is a farmer—not merely by way of interest in the subject, but by life-long, practical application. Farming has been his primary occupation all his life. More than that, he is a farmer by heredity. So far as the available record shows, the Riggs line from which he is descended has been made up of farmers all the way. His grandfather, Hezekiah Riggs, was born on a farm in Loudon County, Va., in 1791. When he was 22 years old he moved to Sullivan County, Ind., and engaged in farming and live-stock growing. There Commodore Perry Riggs, father of the Assistant Secretary, was born, and there he spent his life as a farmer and stock grower. All of his sons and all of his sons' sons have been farmers.

Among the several sons of Commodore Perry Riggs was James R. Riggs. He was born at Shelburn, Sullivan County, Ind., February 17, 1865. For two years after graduation from the Sullivan County High School, in 1882, he was deputy county treasurer and bookkeeper for hardware and lumber firms. In 1885, when he was 20 years old, he began his career as a farmer. He made his first purchase of land in 1888. From that time until the present he has continued in the active management of his farms.

While devoting his energies primarily to farming operations, Mr. Riggs has found time both for other business enterprises and for public affairs. He was elected county auditor in 1894. For a number of years he was active in the development of the coal, oil, and gas industries of his section. For 12 years he was president of a trust company. He has been connected with the construction of more than 200 miles of improved highway. Since 1912 he has been engaged in the manufacture of drain tile.

Mr. Riggs was married in September, 1895, to Miss Bessie Lewman, of Clark County, Ind. They have three daughters.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, that sounds very much to me like a biographic extract from the Congressional Directory.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; only a little longer; and this is issued, Mr. President, with the hope that it is to be published in all the papers in the United States. I want simply to say to the office of information of the United States Department of Agriculture that it seems to me this is an absolute waste of paper, a waste of time, is costly to the Government, and their labors ought to be directed in a far better channel.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, September 11, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

Executive nomination rejected by the Senate September 10, 1919.

POSTMASTER.

George R. Hughes to be postmaster at Frankfort, Ky.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, September 10, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. William Couden, late chaplain of the Second Division, American forces in Germany, offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our sincere prayer is that our beloved America by her patience may win her soul. Give us as a people in our racial relationship charity, in our industrial difficulties cooperation, in our social differences sympathy, in our civic problems earnestness, in our governmental activities justice, and in the outreach of our international influence honor and integrity and helpfulness to the right. Guard us against the evils of peace as well as of war. Keep us from the dangers of prosperity as much as from those of adversity.

Lord God of hosts, be with us yet,
Lest we forget.

Thus may we as a people live and grow a blessing to ourselves and the world and a power pleasing in Thy sight. Bless to this end our national leaders, and especially the Members, officers, and servants of this House of Representatives. Day by day may we give whole-hearted homage to the principles of the kingdom of heaven as set forth by our Lord and Master Jesus Christ, in whose name we pray. Amen.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, the Journal as read by the Clerk discloses that Mr. VOLSTEAD, of Minnesota, asked for a conference on the bill "6808." The number is H. R. 6810. It is my understanding that that should be corrected.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the correction will be made.

Mr. GARD. There is some question about what the Senate messaged over in regard to that bill, whether or not the official papers containing the message carried with them a request for a conference on the amendments of the Senate to the House bill. However, I do not desire to make any question about it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that they did not request a conference.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Ohio having mentioned the matter, I think it is perhaps as well to say that the Senate in passing the prohibition-enforcement bill agreed to a motion which was made that the Senate insist upon its amendments and ask for a conference; but in messaging the bill over no reference was made to that action of the Senate, and the House acted in accordance with the record which it had before it; and as the record did not indicate that the Senate had asked for a conference the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD], in making his final request, asked for a conference. I assume that when the bill reaches the Senate, the Senate, without regard to its former action, will agree to the conference requested by the House.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. GARD. The House had no official notice of what was really the action of the Senate, or what the Senate intended to do, except that the Senate had passed the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. The only notice that the House had officially, of course, was the notice carried in the message, and the announcement made by the messenger from the Senate, and the House acted properly in view of the information that it had in the notice that was given it.

Mr. GARD. But with the subsequent information it developed that the House did not act properly, because it had no authority to do that which it did do.

Mr. MONDELL. I would not want to admit that the House did not act properly, because I think the House always acts properly when it acts in accordance with the official information before it. The House is not chargeable with the fact that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD indicates that the Senate moved to insist upon its amendments and ask for a conference. No such notice as that was served on the House, and therefore the House had to act, and properly did act, on the information which it had.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Is not that an unusual procedure, where the Senate amends a House bill and then insists upon its amendments and asks for a conference before the bill is returned to the House?

Mr. MONDELL. Not specially unusual. That action is sometimes taken by both the House and the Senate.

Mr. FESS. Sufficiently unusual, however, so that unless we had that information we could not act otherwise than as we did.

Mr. MONDELL. Whether it was unusual or not, we are not assumed to know anything about the action of the Senate except what is conveyed in the papers that are delivered to us.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If that is true, how does it happen that we are carrying on this conversation here?

Mr. MONDELL. It was not my purpose to refer to the matter at all, but the gentleman from Ohio did refer to it, and I thought that, reference having been made to it, the correctness of the action of the House should be made clear, in case any reference should be made to the matter elsewhere.

Mr. GARD. The request of the gentleman from Minnesota was to disagree to the Senate amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

Mr. MONDELL. That was his first statement, but that was objected to, and his final statement, and the request submitted by the Chair, was in accordance with the facts as they had been presented to the House by the message.

Mr. GARD. This is what he said, as it appears on page 5081 of the RECORD:

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I renew the request to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 6810) to prohibit intoxicating beverages, and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendemnts, and ask for a conference.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes. That request was in accordance with the information we had as to the status of the matter, and that was the action taken. The Chair submitted that request just as the gentleman from Minnesota presented it, and the action of the House was correct. It remains for the Senate to take whatever action, if any, they may deem necessary to correct the mistake of the officer of the Senate who transmitted the papers.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman is of the opinion that the error should be corrected upon the other side of the Capitol?

Mr. MONDELL. Entirely so. Notwithstanding the action of the Senate when the bill passed, I assume the Senate may now simply agree to the conference the House has asked.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Journal will stand approved.

There was no objection.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call attention to a statement in the speech delivered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN], but as the gentleman is not present I will defer what I have to say until the gentleman is present.

NATIONAL-BANK SUBSCRIPTIONS TO WAR WORK CAMPAIGNS.

The SPEAKER. To-day is Calendar Wednesday, and the call rests with the Committee on Banking and Currency. When the House adjourned last Wednesday House joint resolution 87, authorizing national banks to subscribe to the united war work campaign, was under consideration in Committee of the Whole, and that is the unfinished business. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of that joint resolution, and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON], who was then in the chair, will resume the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the House joint resolution 87.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I want to inquire how much time there is left for general debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk has gone for the book in which is kept the record and will be back in a moment.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I was advised informally at the desk that there was 30 minutes remaining.

Mr. PLATT. My recollection is that there was some time remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair's recollection is in accord with the gentleman from New York. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] had the floor when the House adjourned.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I controlled the time on this side and there has been 18 minutes used on this side—the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] 10 minutes, I used 3 minutes, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] 5. I offered him 10, but he declined to accept but 5. I do not remember the time on the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] has 37 minutes remaining and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] 32 minutes remaining.

Mr. PLATT. Unless somebody else wants to speak, I call for the reading of the bill.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I will take such time coming to me as I find necessary. In reference to this measure, it is one of the left-over difficulties of the war. The subscription of money out of funds of the banks, which are trust funds in the hands of the directors of the bank, is certainly an extraordinary proceeding by the directors. For this body to authorize it it is necessary that we have extraordinary reasons for granting the authorization. While the war was in process of fighting we did grant to the banks authority to subscribe to the Red Cross fund. Then the claim came up that we should grant the same power with reference to the war-work campaign. A whirlwind campaign was put on and a great many banks did promise to subscribe. The Comptroller of the Currency notified them that while they did not have the authority that he would not object if Congress proposed to give them the authority and if they subscribed and Congress ratified it he would approve it. That was the situation.

My opposition to it is that it is a diversion of the trust fund, and I have been against it from the very start. In so far as the banks subscribed and promised to pay if given the authority and the war-work committees have anticipated and used the funds, I am not adverse to the banks having the authority to carry out the subscription because it is common honesty with them to do so, and I will not oppose it in that shape if it is also conditioned on the approval of the stockholders.

But if you pass this in the shape in which it is there will be another whirlwind campaign and the bankers all over the country will be dragooned almost into subscribing in every community to the fund now, and therefore I think that the chairman of the committee should offer an amendment providing that this shall be permitted only where subscriptions were made before the date when the peace treaty was signed. If that is done, it will remove that particular objection and the banks that have subscribed when the peace treaty was signed will have permission to carry out the moral obligation and other banks will not be subjected to the inconvenience of solicitation of funds under conditions that their conscience will say, "Do not give it," and the public clamor will be after them to give it.

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. BOX. The gentleman said before the peace treaty was signed. Does he mean the armistice?

Mr. STEVENSON. No; before the peace treaty was signed in France. That was as late as they have solicited contributions.

This is an outgrowth of the war and one of the instances and inconveniences and troubles that grow out of every war. Certainly it should be one of the things which should agitate us in considering how to avoid wars in the future.

I am going to digress just a little while to discuss some features of the propositions that are now before the American people to avoid wars in the future.

I am going to cite a very respectable authority as to how that should be done, and I think it is an authority that will be accepted, possibly, with a good deal of consonance on both sides of the House.

Disarmament of the free and liberty-loving nations would mean merely insuring the triumph of some barbarism or despotism, and if logically applied would mean the extinction of liberty and of all that makes civilization worth having throughout the world. But in view of what has occurred in this war, surely the time ought to be ripe for the nations to consider a great world agreement among all the civilized military powers to back righteousness by force.

Such an agreement would establish an efficient world league for the peace of righteousness. Such an agreement could limit the amount to be spent on armaments and after defining carefully the inalienable rights of each nation, which were not to be transgressed by any other, could also provide that any cause of difference among them or between one of them and one of a certain number of designated outside non-military nations should be submitted to an international court including citizens of all these nations, chosen not as representatives of the nations but as judges, and, perhaps, in any given case the particular judges could be chosen by lot from the total number

This is the crux of the whole matter.

To supplement and make this effectual it should be solemnly covenanted that if any nation refused to abide by the decision of such a court the others would draw the sword on behalf of peace and justice and would unitedly coerce the recalcitrant nation.

Now, that embraces certainly the heart of the league of nations, up now before the American people. It suggests a court to determine the right. It suggests disarmament as one of the things that would tend to prevent it, and so it is a league of nations. "It suggests that men who are selected to determine controversies between nations be called judges. It provides that if any member of such league shall refuse to conform to the judgment of the court constituted by itself that the other members of the league shall draw the sword to enforce the mandates by the power of the combined nations that are in the league.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I yield.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. What section of the league of nations proposes the establishment of a court of adjudication of differences between the nations?

Mr. STEVENSON. I am glad the gentleman asked that question. Let us see what the league of nations provides.

Mr. LAZARO. Whom does the gentleman quote?

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman asks me whom I quote. I quote Theodore Roosevelt in the Outlook of September 23, 1914. [Applause.] Let us see what court is provided. In the first place there is a court of arbitration. If the United States has an interest and is afraid to stand by the court of arbitration, then there is the court of the executive council, in which each of nine nations has a representative chosen, as Mr. Roosevelt says, as judges to determine the issue, and on which no interested nation's representative will have a vote. If they are not satisfied with that, then there is the assembly of the representatives of all the nations in the league. You have got three tribunals. Now let us see about the court of arbitration——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Is there anything in the nature of a judicial process before either one of the tribunals to which the gentleman referred?

Mr. STEVENSON. There is no judicial process as between nations, but the nations will be entitled to resort to the court of arbitration, and the same distinguished author from whom I quoted at least had in mind that very court. I read from the same article:

> What has occurred in this war ought to bring home to everybody what has of course long been known to all really well-informed men who were willing to face the truth and not try to dodge it. Until some method is devised of putting effective force behind arbitration and neutrality treaties, neither these treaties nor the vague and elastic body of custom which is misleadingly termed international law will have any real effect in any serious crisis between us and any, save, perhaps, one or two, of the great powers.

And therefore the distinguished author, Mr. Roosevelt, was dealing absolutely with the court constituted as one of the courts that is provided for in the league of nations or the arbitration court which he said should have force and power behind it when it comes to its enforcement.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I will yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Does the gentleman believe, in view of the fact that the President of the United States and the leader of the gentleman's party has just said in St. Louis that he wished both parties were smothered in their own gas, it would be well for us to abandon the league of nations for to-day and proceed with the consideration of this bill?

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman from Kansas might be correct, but the discussion of this league of nations has gone on and a day or two ago was taken up very elaborately by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] on that side, and therefore I am not bound by his ruling here.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEVENSON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KING. Does the gentleman find anything in that article that suggests that one country should have six delegates against the United States' one?

Mr. STEVENSON. I am glad that the gentleman asked that question. Let us look at the formation of the nations' court. In the assembly one nation has six delegates and all the others have one, according to the construction that is put there by some people, but let us see, if a nation is interested its member can not vote on any of those questions and none of its members can, and therefore it is disqualified. Now, I wish gentlemen would look at another thing.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I will.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman understand by the interjections that the gentlemen from Kansas [Mr. STRONG and Mr. CAMPBELL] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING] are against this league of nations to enforce peace in this world?

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not undertake to understand what any gentleman means. Now, I want to proceed without interruption for a few minutes.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEVENSON. For one question.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman is on the committee?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESS. Is he aware that on Calendar Wednesday debate must be confined to the bill?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes, sir; I am aware of that. If the gentleman makes the point of order, I shall ask unanimous consent. I have been a Member of this body for three years and have never trespassed for half an hour on its time since I have been here.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman on his feet will not make the point of order, because he enjoys the gentleman's speech too much.

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; I know the rule and I am prepared to conform to it, if anybody makes an objection, and then I shall ask unanimous consent to proceed.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Far from taking the gentleman off his feet, I want to give him a little good news. I want to tell him that yesterday the league of nations was indorsed by the National Undertakers. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENSON. Then, it has gone from the cradle to the grave, and the only people that are opposed to it are the phrase makers that are sitting at the other end of the Capitol. They are the people who are opposing it, and I am informed that the undertakers are patiently waiting for them. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, gentlemen bring in the question of some nations having more votes than others. Now, I want to call your attention to the fact that these people, and they are following the plan of Mr. Roosevelt, are selected as judges, and they are not supposed to represent merely the nation they are put there for. You take the situation in the Capital, with the State of Ohio having two members on the Supreme Bench and the State of West Virginia without any. Does the State of West Virginia object when its controversy with Ohio upon natural gas comes up to the Supreme Court, because, forsooth, Ohio has two members and the State of West Virginia none? Not at all. Why, the most acrimonious and most important lawsuit, I will state, in which I have ever been engaged was between the State of South Carolina and a citizen of Illinois and a citizen of Ohio, citizens of States one of which had a Chief Justice and another an associate justice. We did not object to the Supreme Court hearing that case with those men on it, because they were citizens of the same States as those of the men who were litigating, while South Carolina had no representative. They are chosen as judges, and therefore, under the very language of Mr. Roosevelt, they are there as judges and not as partisan representatives of any nation.

Well, the gentleman has asked what court. Now, I have shown you. Here is the arbitration court, here is the executive council, and here is the assembly, and if one of the nations is not satisfied with one it can go to the other until it gets satisfaction or what is coming to it—probably justice.

There is another feature of this matter I want to discuss for a minute. We hear a great deal of talk about the Shantung settlement and the strangulation of Pekin, and I want to call your attention to the fact that the importance of the Shantung settlement, the Shantung acquisition by Japan, is very well illustrated by a map in the Christian Science Monitor, which shows that it puts a strangle hold on Pekin, in the center of China, and it does this by virtue of the fact that Korea and Manchuria are already in the possession of Japan and are being monopolized by her and being ground to the earth by her.

A friend of mine not long ago was driving across a railroad track in Korea, and his automobile was struck by a train and his wife and a friend who was with them were killed, and instead of their having anything done to the railroad people they took the missionary up and tried him and sentenced him to pay $25 for involuntary manslaughter in killing his wife. That is the kind of justice they have over in Korea, and we do not hear so much boasting about that.

Now, I want to show you that we had an obligation as to Korea in 1905, and I will read it to you. We had this obligation:

> That if other powers dealt unjustly or oppressively with either Government—

That is, Korea and the United States—

> the other would exert their good offices, on being informed of the case, to bring about an amicable arrangement, thus showing their good feeling. (Treaty of 1882–3.)

Now, what happened? In the Russo-Japanese War Japan went through Korea to get at Russia. She agreed to get out. She agreed that she would guarantee the independence of Korea and would get out when the thing was over. What did she do? Why, when the time came she said, "No; we will not get out." She subverted the Government of Korea. She took charge, and to-day she has her courts and her machinery, and she rules Korea in a most despotic manner, as I indicated awhile ago when I told you about the missionary, Dr. Bell, of Kentucky, who was treated in so summary a manner when a train ran over his automobile and killed his wife. That is the way they get the strangle hold on Pekin. Korea sent her representative here to the administration, and they refused to see him; they refused to hear his plea. They said, "This matter has gone into the hands of Japan, and we will have nothing to do with it," and they refused to carry out the terms of our treaty. Yet, forsooth, we hear a great deal about our enforcing the rights of China. Let us see whether that was approved or not by the great party that was then in power. I just want to read you. This is from the same article from which I quoted a while ago, by Mr. Roosevelt:

> Korea is absolutely Japan's. To be sure, by treaty it was solemnly covenanted that Korea should remain independent. But Korea was itself helpless to enforce the treaty, and it was out of the question to suppose that any other nation with no interest of its own at stake would attempt to do for the Koreans what they were utterly unable to do for themselves.

I ask you now, if China is not able to enforce her rights with Japan, under what more powerful compulsion are we to go and enforce her rights than America was when we had an absolute contract with Korea to see that her rights were maintained?

Moreover, the treaty rested on the false assumption that Korea could govern herself well. It had already been shown that she could not in any real sense govern herself at all.

China has had three or four governments in the last two or three years. I read further:

Japan could not afford to see Korea in the hands of a great foreign power. She regarded her duty to her children and her children's children as overriding her treaty obligations. Therefore, when Japan thought the right time had come, it calmly tore up the treaty and took Korea, with the polite and businesslike efficiency it had already shown in dealing with Russia, and was afterwards to show in dealing with Germany. The treaty, when tested, proved as utterly worthless as our own recent all-inclusive arbitration treaties—and worthlessness can go no further.

So that the assumption of power in the subversion of the Korean Government was not only connived at at the time in 1905, and not only was there a refusal to assert the rights that we agreed to assert under our treaty, but it was actually condoned and approved by Mr. Roosevelt after the beginning of this war in 1914, as I have read you.

Gentlemen say that we must not become entangled in foreign alliances, and yet they insist that we must go over and get Japan out of China. That is what you mean. Is there any logic in the position? Absolutely none, and the inconsistency of that position becomes all the more glaring when you put it alongside the fact that the very party that makes that clamor was particeps criminis in the subversion of the Government of Korea and is to-day responsible for it, because if it had not gone back on its word it could have prevented it. See the absolute hollowness and hypocrisy of the position of these gentlemen who are waiting for the undertaker to carry them away after the eulogies!

Now, there is another thing that I want to say about that. In speaking of foreign alliances we hear a great deal suggested about Washington's Farewell Address—"Avoid entangling foreign alliances." Why did he say so? He said if we do—

We will avoid the necessity of these overgrown military establishments which under our form of government are inauspicious to liberty and which are to be regarded as particularly hostile to republican liberty.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

In other words, the fundamental proposition of the league of nations was the reduction of armaments, and they quote George Washington on the question of entangling alliances, but they absolutely dodge the position where he said that the most hostile thing in a republican government is a large standing army. I stand with George Washington on the proposition that anything that will bring about a reduction of armaments, that will justify a reduction of armaments, and reduce the autocratic power that grows up under the manipulation of any great war department that handles great armies—I say that doing away with that is a first step toward the preservation of the liberties of any republic, and George Washington put that right alongside as the reason why we should not become entangled in foreign alliances and foreign affairs in Europe. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina reserves seven minutes.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I understand I have 37 minutes remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. Thirty-seven minutes.

Mr. PLATT. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. McFADDEN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFADDEN. I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for 10 minutes.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MAPES having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2472. An act to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act.

NATIONAL BANK SUBSCRIPTIONS TO WAR-WORK CAMPAIGNS.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed out of order for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, on the 15th day of February, and again July 14, 1919, I introduced here a resolution for the appointment of a special committee to investigate the official conduct of John Skelton Williams, Comptroller of the Currency. I subsequently sought the action of the Rules Committee to the end that the promptest possible consideration might be obtained by this House of my resolution. At the request of the chairman of the Rules Committee of this House, on Saturday, the 19th day of July, I appeared before that body to press upon its favorable consideration the special rule referred to. In taking these steps I was exercising my privilege and performing my duties as a Member of this body.

Mr. Chairman, there has come to my possession information which I solemnly declare has convinced me that John Skelton Williams has been guilty of malfeasance in office. I presented for the consideration of the Rules Committee of this House a statement respecting one such matter.

While the Rules Committee of this House had under consideration the subject I have just referred to, and before it had acted thereon, the Comptroller of the Currency demanded, in intemperate and vituperative language, that I, a representative in Congress, should appear before a committee of that other honorable body of the Congress of the United States, namely, the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, and there submit the charges relating to the misconduct in office of Mr. Williams and the proof in support thereof, and in connection with that demand of the Comptroller of the Currency a Member of that other body, Senator GRONNA, submitted to the Senate committee remarks, which, as published in the public press, carried with them a criticism of my conduct as a Representative. Mr. Chairman, it is my firm belief that having introduced a resolution in this House, and having appeared in connection with the question of the consideration of that resolution before the Rules Committee of this House, it would be unseemly for me to transfer the consideration of the subject, certainly prior to the action of the Rules Committee and of the House of Representatives, to the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency. I have the highest respect for the Senate committee and for its Members. I have the highest respect for the honorable Senator whose remarks I have risen to bring to the attention of this body. I must believe that there momentarily escaped his attention the fact that a high committee of this House was considering the matter of investigation into Comptroller Williams's official conduct, and that the statement which I had made, and which the honorable Senator referred to, had been made by me before the Rules Committee of this House. I very respectfully, but earnestly, insist that no criticism can be justly made at my failing to transfer from the Rules Committee of this House to the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency the present consideration of the matters I have referred to.

I have been present as a spectator at several sessions before that committee. Of course, its members have been conscientiously seeking for information on the subject of the fitness of John Skelton Williams for the office of comptroller, but such information as has been submitted, either in opposition to or in support of Comptroller Williams, has been contained in voluntary statements of persons not sworn, and has been governed by no rules of evidence.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that the conduct of John Skelton Williams requires the most searching investigation and careful consideration. That character of investigation I have sought by the resolution submitted to this House. I have believed, and still believe, that while the report of a rule for the consideration of that resolution is before the Rules Committee of this House, and prior to the action of the House itself thereon, it would not be within the bounds of propriety for me to present the questions involved in the resolution before a committee of the other House, the Senate.

I rise now, Mr. Chairman, in justice to myself and because of the seriousness of the question presented by the criticism of my conduct, to say that if, in the opinion of the Rules Committee of this House, I should, prior to a disposition here of the resolution I have referred to, and while the Rules Committee is considering the matter presented to it, appear before a committee of the Senate, and thereby transfer from a committee of this House to a committee of that House my charges against Comptroller Williams, I shall do so.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. No; I can not yield for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. McFADDEN. Until and unless the Rules Committee votes that that course of conduct, in its judgment, would be the proper one for me to pursue, I must consider that the pendency of the question here makes inappropriate my appearing before a committee of the other House in connection with the same question.

I have received from the Comptroller of the Currency a communication of the most insulting and scurrilous character ever directed by an executive officer to a Member of the legislative branch of the Federal Government. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, that officer has said that a Member of the House of Representatives who makes charges in this House and before the Rules Committee thereof is a "licensed slanderer" unless he will consent to appear before a committee of the Senate in support of those charges. That executive officer has said that he purposely made his communications to me as "stinging" as he possibly could. Neither scandalous communications nor stinging insults from an intemperate and incompetent autocrat will deter me from the performance of my official duties as I see them, or tempt me to the impropriety of transferring from the consideration of a committee of this body to one of the other body of Congress a question of which, at my instance, the former has taken cognizance.

Meantime I respectfully submit, sir, that neither inadvertently nor otherwise should a Senator of the United States adversely comment on the conduct of a Representative in presenting to a committee of his own House for its consideration charges against the Comptroller of the Currency merely because that Representative does not prior to action here go before a Senate committee with the same charges.

It is in no light spirit that I call upon the comptroller to prove his own rectitude, because rectitude once destroyed can scarcely be regained; also because I deplore the shock which comes to the public when they lose confidence in exalted officials of the Government.

Not long after Mr. Williams became comptroller rumors of strange operations began going the rounds, but lately they have taken concrete and astounding form. Statements have been submitted to me in my capacity as a Member of Congress which were so definite in their suggestion of irregularity that they founded the basis of the introduction of the resolution of investigation, to which I have already referred.

The last session of Congress adjourned before action was taken, but the Senate took cognizance of the situation by holding up Mr. Williams's confirmation for a second term until the truth or falsity of the rumors could be established. His vindication would be a personal triumph and redound to his honor and further prestige. If he is not innocent of deviating from the path of upright conduct, he must pay the penalty attaching to one who has failed to observe the sound principle that a public office is a public trust, and in the case of the official who occupies a fiduciary relation to the accumulated funds of the business world, funds intrusted to the 8,000 national banks of the country, such a lapse is even more reprehensible than when an ordinary administrative officer falls short in his conception of his public duty. No man in this country is so high that he is above the law. No official of the law may meet that law with defiance, with impunity.

All the officials of the Government, from the highest to the lowest, are creatures of the law and are bound to obey it. It is the only supreme power in our system. Our Government—and every man who by accepting office participates in its function—is only the more strongly bound to submit to that supremacy and to observe the limitations which it imposes upon the exercise of the authority which it gives.

If the fact that Mr. Williams holds his office by the appointive power of the President, and is, therefore, strongly intrenched in possession and can administer the law as he sees fit, without regard for the law, it savors of tyranny, and tyranny has no existence in the monarchies of Europe nor in any other Government which has a just claim to well-regulated liberty and the protection of personal rights.

In this connection Mr. Justice Brewer said in his decision of the Kansas City Stock Yards case that—

> It has been wisely and aptly said that this is a Government of laws and not of men; that there is no arbitrary power located in any individual or body of individuals; but that all in authority are guided and limited by those provisions which the people have through the organic law declared shall be the measure and scope of all control exercised over them.

Mr. Justice Matthews has said:

> When we consider the nature and theory of our institutions of government, the principles upon which they are supposed to rest, and review the history of their development, we are constrained to conclude that they do not mean to leave room for the play and action of purely personal and arbitrary power. Sovereignty itself is, of course, not subject to law, for it is the author and source of law; but in our system, while sovereign powers are delegated to the agencies of government, sovereignty itself remains with the people, by whom and for whom all government exists and acts. And the law is the definition and limitation of power.

It is, indeed, quite true that there must always be lodged somewhere and in some person or body the authority of final decision; and in many cases of mere administration the responsibility is purely political, no appeal lying except to the ultimate tribunal of the public judgment, exercised either in the pressure of opinion or by means of the suffrage. But the fundamental rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, considered as individual possessions, are secured by those maxims of constitutional law which are the monuments showing the victorious progress of the race in securing to men the blessings of civilization under the reign of just and equal laws, so that, in the famous language of the Massachusetts Bill of Rights, the government of the Commonwealth "may be a government of laws and not of men."

I again quote Mr. Justice Matthews:

> For the very idea that one man may be compelled to hold his life, or the means of living or any material right essential to the enjoyment of life, at the mere will of another seems to be intolerable in any country where freedom prevails, as being the essence of slavery itself.

And further:

> Though the law itself be fair on its face and impartial in appearance, yet if it is applied and administered by public authority with an evil eye and an unequal hand, so as practically to make unjust and illegal discriminations between persons in similar circumstances, material to their rights, the denial of equal justice is still within the prohibition of the Constitution.

I also quote from an editorial appearing in the August 22, 1919, edition of Financial and Commercial Chronicle, the leading financial journal in the United States, which journal sets forth its views in no uncertain terms in regard to Comptroller Williams. I quote from page 416 of that issue, as follows:

> When Comptroller Williams, in the exercise of the ministerial duty of the supervision of banking conduct, goes so far as to declare that rates of interest charged by a certain class of banks are excessive, when he engages in public controversies with banks and bankers over question of individual internal conduct (though seemingly provoked thereto by general attacks on the efficiency of his administration and his fitness and fairness in office) thus revealing to the public special corporate deficiencies which in his protection he is bound to prevent, does he not add a personal element to his service that exceeds the limitations of his office, if and unless he is empowered to declare the rates of interest and is required publicly to know and point out special banks for public examination? Have any of these things been done in the recent course of official conduct? If they have, however well meaning and wise, are they in line with a strict construction of "the public service"?
> It is our consent—the public—not the consent of elected officials, which declares national and, if you will, international principles, and defines domestic procedures of public service. There can arise out of our negligence an autocracy of officeholders presenting us plans and theories of government after the fact that will finally shackle the electorate and cause us to live under the dominance of a "service" we are powerless to control.

The comptroller affords a shining example of the autocratic spirit which has grown up in the executive branch of our Government, but upon which I need not further expatiate at this time except to say that he tolerates no opposition to his rule. He intends his ipse dixit to be as final, as though it emanated from a ruler possessed of absolute power. He assumes to be master, not servant, of the people. Criticism, even when offered in a wholesome constructive spirit, excites him to furious reprisals. He usurps a prerogative of the Lord by making vengeance his own.

The original reports concerning the questionable activities of the comptroller pertain to the misuse of public funds, and it has already been shown at the hearings before the Senate committee that Treasury cash and the sacred funds belonging to the Red Cross have been distributed for the special benefit of particular individuals and banks, and favored banks in the city of Washington and elsewhere have been the recipient of these favors at the hands of Mr. Williams. Whether these favors have been distributed with an eye to the personal profit and building up of financial relations beneficial to Mr. Williams and his family and business associates I leave you to decide, but if current reports are to be relied upon there has been during his administration a remarkable rehabilitation in the Williams' family fortunes. This in itself is startling enough, but it is especially shocking in view of the profession of probity and unctious morality we have heard from this particular source. These deposits apparently, from the evidence submitted to the Senate committee, were made with amazing audacity and brazen defiance of public sentiment, particularly that manifested in banking circles.

For other banks to presume to protest against such favoritism and arbitrary and anomalous use of public funds was to invite attack by the comptroller, and he made examples of enough of them eventually to intimidate practically all, for bankers, being the custodians of other people's money, are proverbially timid about incurring the hostility of the official who under the law has supervision of their institutions, and this cautiousness is quite natural. Many a banker, could he divest himself of his responsibility to his depositors, would unhesitatingly have asserted his manhood when unjustly assailed by the comptroller, but in the interest of those whose funds he was safeguarding and investing he was compelled to submit in an apparent craven fear to bullying and browbeating and insults of a shameful character. The result is that the comptroller has the national banks of the country terrorized. They tread lightly in his presence, but carry no big stick, for safely ensconced in his office, buttressed about with the almost limitless power of the Federal Government, he simulates a ferocious courage toward men who would maul him all over the lot did he dare to affront them in any other environment.

Sitting in austere majesty on the dais of authority, like Jove he hurls his thunderbolts at men who in private life are his peers, but who as bankers and the custodians of other people's wealth fear to retaliate even to defend themselves. Intrenchd as he has been and possessed of the implements of sabotage which national bankers most dread, his reputation for vindictive ferocity has spread to the field of State banks and trust companies, and more than all other men and influences combined he has been the obstacle to the unification of our monetary system. When Congress passed the Federal reserve act it took only the first step toward the formation of a genuine national banking system. Coordination with institutions chartered by the States was essential to its proper and full development, but it has been delayed largely as a result of the comptroller's extremely bureaucratic methods and his savage and irreconcilable personality. True, a few trust companies, responding to patriotic impulses when we entered the war and hoping that eventually a more normal person would succeed to the comptrollership, joined the Federal Reserve System, but nearly all have held back, although I predict that when Mr. Williams retires, the movement to consolidate and unify will proceed rapidly and we will soon have the ideal system of the world. At this juncture, when the United States is expected to play a vital part in the resuscitation of Europe, enfeebled by more than four years of terrible war, and when its financial resources are ready to be mobilized in response to the needs of other continents besides our own, and when our exigencies in the matter of readjustment and reconstruction can scarcely be comprehended by even the collective mind of Congress, there should be hearty, frank, and wholesome cooperation among all factors that are able to contribute to the success of this gigantic task.

The administration should be the last to check this amalgamation of effort, this unification of energy, this essential coordination of banking power. Yet the renomination of Mr. Williams as comptroller acts as a deterrent; it brings dismay to elements of great strength which otherwise would cheerfully join the Federal Reserve System and bring to the stage of human perfection a system already producing marvelous results. I do not indulge in hyperbole when I speak of the comptroller as an obstacle to the development of our banking system, as resolutions adopted at various bankers' conventions show:

Resolved, That the National Association of Supervisors of State Banks, in convention assembled, extend their congratulations to the State banking institutions of the United States upon their splendid record during the war and the strength and stability which they have evinced, notwithstanding the stress and strain incident to the unprecedented financial requirements of the National Government and the necessity at the same time of financing the business and commerce of the Nation. These institutions have fully performed every patriotic duty and responded to every demand made upon them. We confidently rely upon them to maintain the credit of the country and aid in extending its commerce in the days of reconstruction that are before us. We deprecate the attempt to create distrust of these institutions on the part of an official of the National Government. If the duties of the office of the Comptroller of the Currency were limited to the supervision of the national banks, and that officer confined himself to his duties, we should recognize the impropriety of any criticism on our part; but as that officer is a member of the Federal Reserve Board, and State banks and trust companies are members of the Federal Reserve System, which was designed to unify the banking resources of the country, and as the office of Comptroller of the Currency is no longer needed, we recommend to Congress the abolition of that office, without regard to the personality of the incumbent, in order that his powers may be exercised by the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve System freed from the danger of political control, which has from its inception been recognized by financiers as its greatest possible weakness. Be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of this association is hereby instructed to forward to the President, both Houses of Congress, and the Federal Reserve Board copies of this resolution.

The Mississippi Bankers Association at its thirty-first annual convention, held at Clarksdale, Miss., May 13 and 14, adopted the following resolution:

Whereas the Comptroller of the Currency, Hon. John Skelton Williams, has from time to time given statements to the press of the Nation, in which statements he frequently gives comparisons contrasting the safety and growth of national banks as compared with the State banks; and

Whereas this association believes that such statements are not only not helpful to the national banks, but that they tend to closely draw the lines between the two classes of banks, to create antagonism where none should exist, and to promote discord between the two classes of financial institutions; and

Whereas we believe such a policy is detrimental to the banking interests of the entire country, for the reason that banks of each class should work in entire harmony, all of them giving the strength of their resources to the development of our common Nation, and all of them as a unit serving the people in their respective spheres: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Mississippi Bankers Association, That we deprecate such statements on the part of one occupying the high official position of Comptroller of the Currency, and that the representatives of this association to the American Bankers Association be requested to present to that association suitable resolutions, to be adopted by it, urging the comptroller to desist from the giving out of statements which are not taken from the official report to Congress and which are likely to produce feeling and antagonism among the financial institutions of our country. (Carried.)

PETERS TRUST CO.,
Omaha, March 17, 1919.

Hon. L. T. MCFADDEN,
President First National Bank, Canton, Pa.

DEAR MR. MCFADDEN: I have been interested in reading the account of your fight against the confirmation of the reappointment of John Skelton Williams, and I am wondering what the Nebraska bankers can do to help you.

I know it is the unanimous desire of every banker in our State, regardless of whether he is engaged in the national banking business or the State banking business, that you succeed. I think I am in position to get resolutions passed by our group meetings and State Bankers Association commending your action if you desire it.

I shall be glad to hear from you.

Yours, very truly,

W. S. WESTON.

To the Officers and Members of the Arkansas Bankers Association:

We, your committee on resolutions, to whom was referred the attached circular from the office of the Comptroller of the Currency, wish to make the following report:

That all bankers surely appreciate receiving from the comptroller's office circular letters from time to time giving statistical and other information of direct interest to the profession.

A careful reading of the circular dated May 7, attached to the resolution, seeks to draw the inference and to make a distinction which might easily be construed as being unfavorable to banks and trust companies operating under a State charter. This inference may be construed as being entirely unfair, although perhaps not intended in that manner. Your committee would respectfully suggest that the comptroller be furnshed with a copy of this resolution, indicating the feeling of this association upon that subject.

Respectfully submitted.

JACK BERNHARDT, Chairman.

Let me cite an example or two to illustrate and prove Mr. Williams's autocratic tendency. At a recent convention of bankers, the head of a great New York bank, not a member of the national system, questioned the accuracy of a statement of the comptroller which reflected upon the relative safety of trust companies as compared with national banks. It was a temperately expressed difference of opinion and met with the cordial concurrence of the audience, composed entirely of bankers. What happened? The New York banker was as viciously assailed as though he had accused the comptroller of stealing the gold reserve in the Treasury vaults, and this unwarranted onslaught, spread broadcast throughout the country by the comptroller's agencies of publicity, was followed by the withdrawal of $75,000,000 of deposits from the bank in question, one of the greatest, most successful, and safest banks, not only in the United States but in the whole world, with assets of three-quarters of a billion dollars. Those funds had been deposited by railroads, and Mr. Williams, in his capacity as chairman of the Finance Division of the United States Railroad Administration, arbitrarily withdrew them and deposited the money in banks of his own choosing, not only as a punishment of the institution because its president had dared to resent the comptroller's slur on the trust companies of the United States but as a warning to other bankers not to criticize him, no matter what the provocation might be. Such an iniquitous act would have seriously embarrassed the average bank, but this institution is so impregnable that it withstood the loss of that prodigous sum without a tremor. The sense of outrage throughout financial and business circles caused by the comptroller's unspeakable action was so great that unsolicited fresh deposits poured into the institution from every quarter, and they exceeded the funds withdrawn, stupendous as the sum was.

I will digress for a moment to recall to the attention of the House that before he entered public life Mr. Williams was in the railroad business. He was the head, or at least the controlling factor, in what is now known as the Seaboard Air Line. For reasons which I shall not take the time now to detail, he lost control of the road to a group of eastern financiers, some of whom are now identified with this same New York bank. Mr. Williams made most desperate efforts to regain control of the road, but without avail, and his failure embittered him deeply. Would I be rash to say that perhaps deep in the recesses of the comptroller's seething brain was the grim thought that in thus penalizing this New York trust company he was getting even for what he regarded as an old grievance? And the mention of the Seaboard Air Line further reminds me of what very likely was the original animus of the comptroller's sensational attack upon the Riggs National Bank of this city. In due time, following his loss of the control of the railroad, another financial group in the East obtained possession of it, the National City Bank interests of New York among them.

There is a close business alliance between the National City Bank and the Riggs Bank. Although deposed as the head of the railroad in the operation first mentioned, Mr. Williams was permitted to serve as a director, but when the new group took hold it displaced him with Mr. Milton E. Alles, a vice president of the Riggs Bank. It is a matter of common knowledge that Mr. William's rage against both the National City Bank and Riggs Bank knew no bounds, but he was helpless against them until he became comptroller, and then he quickly sought his revenge.

The House knows the story of how he drew upon every vestige of power lawfully vested in him to harass and badger these two institutions, but it does not yet know how far beyond lawful limits he went in seeking vengeance for a grievance which began when he was a private citizen. And he has had the effrontery to try to conceal his vicious, unholy motives behind the cloak of sanctity, and while denouncing reputable financiers on a general ground of their wealth, he and his friends have been busy using the power of the Government to amass fortunes of their own and to form alliances with great financial interests.

We have heard even the President compliment the comptroller on "his subjugation of Wall Street." What has he done? I challenge him to point to a single solitary improvement or reform, and if he is able to show one I will show half a dozen instances where he has closed his eyes to alleged iniquities or abuses which he proclaimed he was engaged in uprooting. He makes a boast of having put an end to failures of national banks. What is the truth in this? It is that during the first four years of his administration in office there were 58 failures of national banks under his administration, whereas under the previous four years' administration there were 23 failures of national banks. Now, in this connection it is interesting to note that in the first Federal reserve district and the ninth Federal reserve district, the Federal reserve banks located in both of these districts are in a serious controversy with the Comptroller of the Currency at the present time over the chartering of banks in localities where banks are not needed and in many instances where the State bank department has refused to grant charters. For what purpose is Mr. Williams granting charters to banks in isolated territories like these unless it be to show that the system is so popular and thus to permit him to boast of the large number of organizations of national banks, when as a matter of fact he has chartered many banks in localities where a national charter should never have been issued? As I have indicated before, the comptroller has developed from a swaggering autocrat into a mad terrorist. An autocratic régime is obnoxious enough and not to be tolerated in this country, but when it grows into government by terrorism we can not act too quickly to destroy it.

Congress has been urged to vote millions of dollars to enable the Department of Justice to wipe out terrorism from among a certain element of our population. The vast punitive machinery of that department is moving rapidly and I trust ruthlessly to eradicate this poisonous growth from the American system. Many of those against whom the department is proceeding are misguided men whose mental processes are so primitive that they have but a vague or distorted idea of our democratic institutions and at most a meager comprehension of what constitutes free and orderly government. Some of these men do not realize that this is the land of boundless opportunity for their own kind, and that most of our famous and most useful citizens have risen to eminence from poverty and obscurity. I am sorry for benighted people who fall under the influence of unscrupulous demagogues, who from places of comparative security spur their deluded victims to deeds of violence and anarchy.

But the underlying principles and the history of our democracy are no closed book to the Comptroller of the Currency. He knows this is a government by law, not a government by personal whim. Yet contemplate the example of lawlessness which this high official sets to the ignorant man of alien political notions. The comptroller becomes a terrorist the instant the law fails to serve his radical or personal purposes. He immediately adopts the perverted and discredited Hun doctrine that might makes right. He has spread terror through the banks of the country, not for the mere joy of watching the bankers shiver and squirm, but to intimidate them in order to further dark and devious schemes of his own. I have mentioned specific instances of his terroristic methods and will allude to another.

Because I was bold enough to ask for an investigation of his office at the last session of Congress, the comptroller entered upon a plan of persecution of the bank of which I am president, and might have ruined it had not the United States court of the middle district of Pennsylvania, to which the bank appealed, intervened and restrained him from further efforts to undermine it. He deliberately and maliciously spread false and sensational rumors about the bank, intimating that its solvency was in question when he knew it was perfectly solvent, and caused a run on it which led frightened depositors to withdraw between 12 and 15 per cent of its aggregate deposits, and caused the bank a loss of thousands of dollars in earnings. He connived with a rival bank, whose president was summoned to Washington for a conference with him, to stampede the depositors of our bank, and as they, bewildered by the spurious reports of alleged insolvency, withdrew their funds they were herded into the rival bank and there solicited to deposit their money. But, as I have said, our bank stood the strain, great as it was, and remained solvent, as it always has been. But not knowing what other diabolical means the comptroller would adopt next to accomplish its ruin, having thus far failed, the bank, as I have indicated, appealed to the United States court, which promptly enjoined him from any further machinations against its continued existence and prosperity. I herewith insert the order of the District Court of the United States for the Middle District of Pennsylvania:

[In the District Court of the United States for the Middle District of Pennsylvania. First National Bank of Canton, complainant, v. John Skelton Williams, defendant. In equity No. 275. May term, 1919.]

On reading the original bill of complaint herein and the verified bill of complaint supplemental thereto and the exhibits thereto annexed and the supporting affidavits submitted therewith, and it clearly appearing from the specific facts shown thereby that immediate and irreparable loss or damage will result to the complainant before the matter can be heard on notice and that prima facie the complainant is entitled to a temporary restraining order enjoining the defendant herein from the acts threatened and complained of;

Now, on motion of the said complainant, it is Ordered that the defendant, John Skelton Williams, show cause, if any he has, before the District Court of the United States for the Middle District of Pennsylvania at the court room of said court in the city of Harrisburg, county of Dauphin and State of Pennsylvania, on the 9th day of May, 1919, at 10 o'clock a. m. of said day, why the preliminary injunction, as prayed for in the said bill of complaint, should not issue;

And in the meantime it is hereby ordered that the defendant, John Skelton Williams, his agents, subordinates, deputies and attorneys, and all persons acting by or under his authority, direction, or control, and each of them be, and hereby is, restrained and enjoined until the hearing and determination of said application and the entry of an order thereon as follows, to wit:

1. From calling and continuing to call for, or attempting to enforce his call for, the alleged special reports mentioned in said John Skelton Williams's, the defendant's letters dated April 15, 1919, April 16, 1919, April 21, 1919, and April 28, 1919; and in the letter of Bank Examiners Roberts and Stauffer, dated April 19, 1919, respectively; and from assessing or collecting, or attempting to assess or collect the penalties against the complainant for failure to file such alleged special reports.

2. From calling for any special report or reports from the complainant for the private and personal purposes of the defendant, or for the purpose of harassing or persecuting the complainant in the manner alleged in the bill of complaint, or for the purpose of obtaining information for public distribution with a view to injuring, impairing, or destroying the reputation and credit of the complainant or its president, LOUIS T. MCFADDEN, or for the purpose of instituting prosecutions against the complainant, or its said president for alleged offenses, or for the collection of penalties in order to destroy the reputation, credit, and business of the complainant and its said president, as alleged in the bill of complaint herein; and from calling for or attempting to enforce his call for any other special report or reports from the complainant when the same are not bona fide within the meaning and purpose of sections 5211 and 5212 of the Revised Statutes of the United States and reasonably necessary to a full and complete knowledge of the complainant's condition and expressly authorized by said sections; and from exercising any visitorial or inquisitorial power over the complainant or its officers except as expressly authorized by law.

3. From opening or causing to be opened the private papers, letters, and packages of customers of the said complainant, left in charge of the said complainant for safe-keeping or from interfering with the same in any manner whatsoever.

4. From disclosing to the officers, directors, agents, stockholders, or employees of the Farmers National Bank of Canton, Pa., any information with respect to the private business or affairs of the complainant or its officers.

5. From disclosing the private business and affairs of the complainant or its officers to banks, bankers, individual Members of Congress, representatives of the public press, or to the public generally for the purpose of injuring the complainant or its officers and of impairing or destroying its or their credit and reputation or for any other purpose except pursuant to law.

6. From disclosing to the stockholders, depositors, or creditors of the complainant and to the members of the community in which the complainant is established information with respect to the affairs and business of the complainant or its officers intended and calculated to create alarm or apprehension with respect to the credit and solvency of the complainant or any of its officers, and from distributing such information and from spreading or causing to be spread reports with respect to the complainant or any of its officers intended or calculated to cause the withdrawal of deposits from the complainant by its depositors.

7. From inciting or attempting to induce any person or persons whatsoever to present and press claims against the complainant or any of its officers and from inciting litigation against it or them.

8. From demanding or attempting to enforce the compulsory production or exposure of the private books or papers or affairs of the complainant or its officers for the purpose of attempting to subject it or them to any penalties or forfeitures or criminal prosecutions or of compelling them to be witnesses against themselves.

9. From using the powers of the office of the Comptroller of the Currency over the complainant or its officers for the private and personal purposes of the defendant, without reference to the proper duties and functions of the said office, and in particular for the purpose of impairing or destroying the credit and reputation of the complainant and its president and its and his property and business in the manner set forth in the bill of complaint.

10. From calling, or attempting to enforce in calling, for any special report or reports from the complainant or any of its officers as to any of the details relative to the filing of this suit or any privileged communications between the complainant or its officers and its or their attorneys relative thereto or for the purpose of defending the same.

And it is further ordered that the service hereof may be made by delivering a copy of this order certified under the hand and seal of the clerk of this court and also a copy of the papers upon which it was obtained to the defendant personally, if found within this district, and if not so found to the United States attorney for the middle district of Pennsylvania, and by mailing such copies by registered mail to the defendant, addressed to the office of the Comptroller of the Currency at Washington, D. C.; and that service hereof in the manner hereinbefore specified on or before May 5, 1919, shall be sufficient.

And it further appearing to the satisfaction of this court that the defendant, John Skelton Williams, is not now personally within this district, it is ordered that service of the bill of complaint herein and of the bill of complaint supplemental thereto and of the process of subpœna issued thereon, may be made by delivering a copy thereof to the defendant, John Skelton Williams, wherever he may be found, or by mailing such copy by registered mail to said defendant, addressed to the office of the Comptroller of the Currency at Washington, D. C., and by delivering a copy thereof to the United States attorney for the middle district of Pennsylvania on or before the 5th day of May, 1919.

Complainant to furnish bond in the sum of $500.

CHARLES B. WITMER, District Judge.

Dated at Scranton, in the middle district of Pennsylvania, this 1st day of May, 1919.

Mr. Chairman, these are but random examples of the terrorism which the comptroller practices whenever it suits his purpose or whim. I stand here unterrorized, and so shall I always stand.

Mr. Chairman, Mr. Williams attempts from time to time to make the public believe there are practically no banks or others who are opposed to his methods of administration. In addition to what I have already placed in the RECORD, I desire to insert an editorial from one of the leading financial journals of Chicago, which article appeared in the September issue, and is as follows:

CRITICISM OF JOHN SKELTON WILLIAMS.

As a result of the recently published statement of Comptroller of the Currency John Skelton Williams, in which the safety of national banks was emphasized and figures were presented tending to discredit the State banks, a letter was prepared a few days ago by Otto L. Klauss, State auditor, and Charles W. Camp, chief of the State bank department of Indiana, criticizing the Washington official for his "odious and ill-timed comparisons."

The letter sent Mr. Williams reads:

"As the official of Indiana, charged for the time being with the supervision of all the banks and trust companies of this State, other than the national banks, I resent the efforts that are continually being made by your office, through the press, to discredit our State financial institutions by lauding the standing of national banks.

"I am of the opinion that the State banks of Indiana—779 in number—taken as a whole, are as ably managed and supervised as are the 240 national banks, and give as my reasons that, while four of our institutions have been closed in the past four years, no loss has been sustained by any depositor.

"In view of the fact that our banks have stood shoulder to shoulder with the national banks in the purchase of each issue of Liberty bonds and United States certificates of indebtedness, I am inclined to believe that your comparisons are odious and ill-timed."

I also want to append hereto copy of an editorial appearing recently in the San Francisco Chronicle, as follows:

A DEMOCRATIC SCANDAL.

Whether Comptroller of the Currency John Skelton Williams interested himself to help his brother to make a big sale to the Government or not, and whether, if he did, is a matter for Congress to determine. Representative MCFADDEN says he did, and Comptroller Williams says that Representative MCFADDEN is another.

But that the Senate should reject the nomination of Williams for another term of office is certain. It is possible to find men, and even Democrats, who will honestly and effectively administer the office of Comptroller of the Currency without being eternally in a rumpus and making themselves hated and feared by the entire national-bank fraternity.

Comptroller Williams is not merely an autocrat. That would be expected. This is an autocratic administration. But he is so arrogant and disagreeable in the administration of his autocracy that the Senate would be inexcusable to permit him to serve another term.

I also insert a letter from the editor of Leslie's Weekly:

LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED WEEKLY NEWSPAPER,
New York, March 28, 1919.

Hon. L. T. MCFADDEN, M. C.
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I read with much interest your correspondence with the Treasury Department. I believe that Mr. Williams is absolutely unfitted for his place. He should go!

Very truly, yours,

JOHN A. SLEICHER, Editor.

Mr. Chairman, in view of the attack which John Skelton Williams has made upon me, I ask your forbearance by inserting in the RECORD copy of the resolution passed by group 4 of the Pennsylvania Bankers' Association, assembled in annual meeting on May 30, 1919. This is an organization of bankers comprising the banks in and around my congressional district. The resolution is as follows:

Group 4, Pennsylvania Bankers' Association, assembled in annual meeting, hereby puts of record an appreciation of the character and reputation of Hon. LOUIS T. MCFADDEN, Member of Congress from the fourteenth district of Pennsylvania, and a member of this group.

We have always found Mr. MCFADDEN a zealous advocate in Congress of all constructive and remedial legislation affecting the interests of banks and other financial institutions; always courteous and helpful to the members of our business fraternity, and faithful in the discharge of his duties, and an efficient member of the Banking and Currency Committee of the House.

As a member of our group we have always found him kindly in all relations to his fellow bankers. And he has lent distinction to our group in being honored as president of the Pennsylvania Bankers' Association, an office which he adorned, and through which he advanced the interests of all bankers in Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That this minute be spread upon the minutes of our group as an expression of our confidence in, and warm admiration for, our fellow worker, Hon. L. T. MCFADDEN.

Mr. Chairman, I also insert in the RECORD at this time a letter from Bird W. Spencer, president of a bank in New Jersey, which is typical of many letters I have received, but because I do not want to encumber the RECORD, I insert this as a specimen without further comment:

PASSAIC, N. J., March 17, 1919.

Hon. L. T. MCFADDEN,
Care First National Bank, Canton, Pa.

MY DEAR SIR: I have read with a great deal of interest your controversy with John Skelton Williams, present Comptroller of the Currency, and I sympathize with you and desire to offer you any support in my power.

I am largely interested, and vice president of the Carlstadt National Bank, a small bank located 2 or 3 miles distant from this city. I have noted that the unusual requirements of the comptroller's office have been very burdensome and annoying to our people.

When this institution, with the other institutions in New Jersey, entered the Federal Reserve System, we insisted, so far as we could, that while we were willing to subordinate ourselves to the Federal Reserve System, we could not join if there were any possibility of our coming under the control of the present Comptroller of the Currency.

The writer was treasurer of the Erie Railroad Co. for a number of years, and has kept in close touch with that company's management, especially as relates to its treasury, and is aware of the annoyances and exactions created by the policy of Mr. Williams while financial director of the Federal Railroad Administration.

We have no personal acquaintance with Mr. Williams, and our opinions are formed entirely on what we see and hear, but they are sufficiently positive to express the hope that he will be eliminated from the control of the banking system of the country or any part of it.

Senator FRELINGHUYSEN and EDGE, of this State, I think understand the situation. I have written to them, as a member of the executive committee of the New Jersey Bankers' Association, urging that Mr. Williams be relieved of his job.

Please command me if I can serve you in any way.

Very truly, yours,

BIRD W. SPENCER.

Mr. Chairman, in concluding, I want to call attention to the fact that it has been clearly proven in the hearings, which have been conducted by the Senate committee, that John Skelton Williams has violated the law wherein he has not complied with the requirements of the law in examining all of the national banks of the country twice each year. This evidence proves that he did not do this in the District of Columbia, and I have no doubt that if the truth were known that there are many banks in the United States which have not been examined twice in each year of his administration, and in some instances not even once.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back two minutes.

Mr. PLATT. Does the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] want to use some more of his time?

Mr. STEVENSON. I do, but I am not quite ready. Will the gentleman use some of his time?

Mr. PLATT. I will yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. STEVENSON. Before the gentleman does that, I will yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas is recognized for seven minutes.

Mr. WINGO. I do not know whether it is worth while to take even seven minutes of the time of the House to discuss the questions that have been raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN]. The House and the country are familiar with the personal controversy that has been going on between those gentlemen for many, many months. You could not even in seven minutes, if it were thought worth while to take up the time of the House, go into the merits of that controversy.

As I gathered from the gentleman's statement, it was in answer to the suggestion of the Comptroller of the Currency, made in the public press, that if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN] had any evidence to support the charges that he has made against the comptroller he should go before the committee of the Senate that is now, and has been for many months, investigating these very charges and investigating the character and the fitness and the qualifications of Mr.

Williams, with a view to voting upon the confirmation of his reappointment as comptroller.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania says that it is beneath the dignity of a Member of the House to go before a committee of another body. Well, be that as it may, there are no strings upon the gentleman. His party has been in power here for four months in both branches of the Congress. He has charged, and he has charged deliberately, upon his responsibility as a Member of this House, the Comptroller of the Currency with conduct which, if he can support by evidence, will support impeachment charges. Why does not the gentleman from Pennsylvania either "put up or shut up"? If he can get the backing of the Republican Members of this House, why does he not introduce resolutions of impeachment? He has back of him a Republican majority.

The reason is very simple, gentlemen, and it is because he can not get even a majority of the Republican side of this House to support the charges that he is making against the Comptroller of the Currency, much less a sufficient vote on both sides of the House to sustain impeachment charges.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think I am justified in making that statement, because the gentleman has gone before his own Committee on Rules. The gentleman's attack here this morning is not simply a repetition of his attack upon the Comptroller of the Currency but, as a matter of fact, it is an attack upon the Rules Committee of this House.

And however much we might differ with the judgment of the members of the Rules Committee upon both sides of this House, we regard the membership of the Rules Committee, both Democrat and Republican, as being composed of the ablest, most patriotic, level-headed Members of this House; and if the gentleman has not sufficient evidence to support his charges against the Comptroller of the Currency, and if he can not get the Rules Committee of this House to accept the proof that he offers there, then why should he continue to annoy this House and to repeat his charges against the Comptroller of the Currency? It is nothing more than a personal grievance, and I say that with all kindness to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN]. I hold no brief for the Comptroller of the Currency. I differ with him upon detail questions of policy possibly as much as does the gentleman from Pennsylvania; but in spite of whatever faults John Skelton Williams may have, there is one thing that even his enemies admit, that he is Comptroller of the Currency and he is enforcing the laws that you and I have made; and most of the criticisms against John Skelton Williams are criticisms against the laws that you and I framed, and which we permit to remain upon the statute books; and I for one appreciate the fact that he has the courage to discharge his duties and to enforce the laws. If those laws are wrong, if it is vicious for the American Government through the Comptroller of the Currency to supervise the conduct of the great national-banking system of this country, then as Members of Congress we ought to have the courage to repeal those laws and not be continually nagging at the Comptroller of the Currency because he carries out the letter of the law. It is not an attack upon the character of John Skelton Williams, it is an attack upon the efficiency of John Skelton Williams's conduct that is troubling the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] and some other bankers throughout this country.

Oh, Mr. Chairman, it is easy to stand here and attack a public official. It does not require any particular courage to do that—for a Member of Congress to get up here and attack a public official whose mouth is closed and who can not be heard upon this floor; and I for one am sick and tired of it. If his enemies have the proof, they have their remedy. They have raked the four corners of this Republic, they have spent months in trying to find some ground upon which they can refuse to confirm his renomination. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] has had months and months and months. Let him have the courage to stand up here and prefer impeachment charges against the Comptroller of the Currency and offer the proof, and then we will vote upon the merits of the case aside from any personal prejudices that may exist between the two gentlemen. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. WINGO. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Is there anything in the precedents of the House that would make it undignified or improper for a Representative here who believes that he has relevant information upon the subject to go before the Senate committee and present it?

Mr. WINGO. Not only is there nothing to the contrary in the precedents but I want to say, and I think it is the judgment of every Member of this House, that if the nomination of any man is sent to the Senate for the filling of any important public position, if any Member of this House knows of any reason why he should not be confirmed, if he knows of facts which demonstrate that that man is unfit for public place, it is not only his right but it is his duty to go before the Senate committee and give them the benefit of his information. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. PLATT. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed out of order. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, all the country is interested, historically as well as otherwise, in the famous trip the President is now making over the country, chiefly because it is an effort to compel the Senate to obey the presidential decree to ratify the treaty just as he hands it to that body. Some of us are sufficiently interested to read all the speeches of the President as they are reported from day to day. The interest grows not alone in the issue that is being discussed—because it is a one-string violin so far as this tour goes, discussing but one issue in the main, the league of nations—but we are also interested in the character of utterances of the Chief Executive and in the general response that the public is giving to our distinguished and capable head of the Nation. Is the response given to the sentiment in approval or to the spirit of the gladiator or to the President of the Nation?

A great many people have thought that great outpourings on such occasions are significant of approval of all that is said. Others say it is that response which greets the man in the ring, because the people applaud a fighter, while still others declare that whenever the President, especially the President with a mission, as he thinks, in times of great excitement over a great issue, goes to the country carrying a cause that he wants to espouse, and for which he is willing to suffer, it naturally brings great crowds, no matter whether the people indorse what the President says or not. So the country might be divided on those lines, that the significance of the great gatherings now in progress greeting President Wilson is not necessarily conclusive evidence that those who gather approve of the position he takes. I, as a Member of the House, share in that judgment, that wherever the President will go he will have, and ought to have, not only a respectful hearing but a great outpouring to hear him. That is due the office he holds without much regard to who holds it.

That was true in 1866. There had been a very severe dispute between the Executive and the legislative growing out of the questions inherited by the Civil War. It was so acute that it soon reached an open rupture of national concern. The veto power was employed freely, and the overriding of the veto was very general. Finally, on August 28, 1866, the President carried his cause to the people. It had been widely heralded weeks before that the President would make a tour of the country and lay the cause of the protection of the Constitution and the restoration of the Union before the American people.

It was well understood that he was stating his method to compel Congress to accept his plan of reconstruction. He had refused to call Congress in special session after his inauguration, on the 15th of April, 1865, and between that date and the meeting of Congress in December he proceeded to reconstruct the States as an Executive rather than a legislative function. This was the point of difference which he proposed to carry to the country. He left this city the latter part of August, 1866, traveling to Philadelphia on the main line to New York, from New York to Buffalo, from Buffalo to Cleveland, thence over the overland line to Toledo, thence to Detroit, thence to Chicago, from Chicago through Springfield, Ill., to St. Louis, St. Louis back to Indianapolis and Louisville, then to Cincinnati, Columbus, Steubenville, and Pittsburgh, and Harrisburg, and on back to Washington.

Mr. ROSE. He stopped at Johnstown, for I saw him there.

Mr. FESS. Yes. Now, I have the files of the New York Times giving a description of the wonderful ovations and outpourings that greeted President Johnson. At Cleveland the outpouring was so tremendously enthusiastic that the correspondent makes this statement in the Times which was printed September 4:

There can be no adequate description of President Johnson's reception to-day. From the time he arrived at Buffalo until he reached Cleveland his reception by the people all along the route was an ovation of unparalleled magnitude, which culminated at this point with a tremendous explosion of enthusiasm. Without any exaggeration I consider the mass of human beings assembled together this evening in front of the Kinnard House the largest collection of people that I have ever seen at any one time.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. FESS. In a moment, but not at this point. At Detroit the statement of the New York Times says the enthusiasm remained unabated. At Erie, Pa., the statement was that the oldest citizens are reporting that there is at least one-half greater crowd than ever was seen in this city before. The same thing at Chicago. The New York World says that there were 80,000 people at the grounds where the Douglas monument was being dedicated, which, as Members know, was the occasion for the President's trip. However, the President extended his trip to take in St. Louis.

Similar outpourings that I do not care now to read but will make a short insertion, within the rules of the House, indicate that there was no point that the President did not have a wild demonstration from the populace.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. DEWALT. Has the gentleman read the account as published by Rhodes in his history of the reception to President Johnson at Cleveland?

Mr. FESS. Rhodes, the historian? I think I have.

Mr. DEWALT. In which he says the reception given to Johnson at Cleveland was far from enthusiastic, and that he was hooted at that time in Cleveland.

Mr. FESS. If I should say that I would be charged with partisan utterance. That is the reason I do not read from the New York Tribune or the Independent. I am reading from the New York Times, a Democratic paper.

Mr. DEWALT. History, as indicated by Mr. Rhodes, says he was not received with much enthusiasm.

Mr. FESS. The Times says that it was a magnificent ovation. It is the Times which to-day seems to attach so much significance to the demonstrations accorded President Wilson, and while the editorial staff is not the same, I take it that it desires to be regarded as accurate in its conclusion now as it claimed to be then. I quote from the Times, September 10, 1866:

The reception of President Johnson and his party yesterday by the people of St. Louis constituted the most brilliant ovation ever tendered an American citizen by the American people, and was the most magnificent spectacle ever witnessed in the West.

I further quote from the Times:

At Alton the entire population and some twenty thousand people from St. Louis assembled upon the levee to participate in the presidential welcome.

The Times reported that at Louisville "over 150,000 people had gathered early to greet the President." The same sort of enthusiasm greeted him at Cincinnati, Columbus, and Pittsburgh.

I think that is sufficient to indicate that there was no lack of enthusiasm on this journey.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. I appreciate the statement that the gentleman wanted to be nonpartisan, and this leads me to hope that he will bring the record down to date and read extracts of the tremendous reception that President Roosevelt got when he went over the country denouncing the political porch climbers of the Republican Party. That would constitute a perfect record. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FESS. The gentleman in control of the floor is trying to show that the make-believe of the Democratic side of the House—or, rather, Members of that side—of the demonstrations shown to Mr. Wilson are not conclusive as to the popularity of the position he has taken. On that basis of judgment President Andrew Johnson, according to the Democratic Times, was the most popular man in America at the very moment he was undoubtedly the most widely distrusted Executive we have ever had. It is this feature I am calling to the attention of the country.

That is the purpose of this [applause on the Republican side], and I am leaving the Democratic side of the House to draw its own conclusions on this matter, reading only the facts as detailed in the Democratic press and not the Republican press.

Mr. POU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I do.

Mr. POU. I would ask the gentleman from Ohio if anything has been said about these crowds on this side of the House? I have not heard it.

Mr. FESS. Many things have been said to me personally. I think most of the Members are afraid to say anything publicly. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. POU. I have not heard one single comment on this side of the House in reference to the size of the crowds.

Mr. FESS. I arose for an additional purpose. In addition to indicating that the great demonstration given to the President on his famous swing around the circle is not significant of their approval I want also to indicate that his line of utterances in the form of argument between this tour that is now being made and the tour made in 1866 is not different; that the argument now is quite similar to what it was then. Yesterday I read that the President stated that if his removal was necessary he would be willing to sacrifice his life. I am sorry that statement was made. I am not making it as a criticism. I think, however, that all of us wish that that statement had not been made. It can not produce good results. Now, let me read from a speech on the first swing around the circle. At Niagara Falls this statement was made by President Johnson:

Let the Union be restored and harmony and prosperity be again given to the land. When this is done I would, like Simeon of old, after he had seen the babe of Bethlehem, exclaim, "Lord, I have seen Thy salvation, now lettest thy servant depart in peace."

[Laughter on the Republican side.]

At Erie, Pa., he said:

If it is my life they ask; if it is my blood they want as a last offering upon the altar of my country, they can take it.

An utterance this morning, reported in the Post, indicates that the President informs the country that the opposition to the league is largely pro-German, another very unfortunate statement to emanate from the head of the Nation. Let me read what President Johnson said:

We who fought and gave our blood to perpetuate this Union will not permit it to be severed by Sumner, Thad Stevens, and their coconspirators.

Let me read what he said at Cleveland. I quote from the Times:

As I go round the circle having fought traitors at the South, I am prepared to fight traitors at the North.

At St. Louis, he said:

I shall stand by the Constitution and with your help and God being willing all the powers this side of the infernal regions combined can never drive me from the discharge of my duty.

These are but samples of his utterances, bitter in character, defiant in purpose, and confident in ultimate result, which indicate his determination to dominate Congress. All through President Johnson's speeches we find that dissatisfaction and impatience that reach a point almost of petulance, if not of uncontrolled temper.

This will introduce what I did not want to inject when my friend and colleague, Mr. DEWALT, of Pennsylvania, interrupted me. President Johnson had a great outpouring at Cleveland, as he had in all other stopping places. At Cleveland some one in the audience put a question to him that threw him off his guard. He took it as a personal offense and launched out in a very bitter strain, in ungoverned language, assailing all the people who opposed him on the basis of disloyalty and actuated with a desire of personal animosity. For a time the demonstration was so vociferous and offensive that the President could not continue. This unfortunate event was precipitated by President Johnson himself. It was very noticeable that the bitterness of his language increased with the tour and that fact seemed to arouse his audience, as was shown on the route, since the enthusiasm that was provoked by his utterances was unbounded. The President employed the ad hominem argument everywhere, declaring he was willing to leave the issue with the people, who could always be trusted even when their Government was not to be—

Through your honored chairman, gentlemen, please accept my sincere thanks for this cordial welcome. It will not be expected of me to make a speech on this occasion. I can only return my thanks and say that I feel gratified for this demonstration of respect for one who has at least tried to serve you faithfully. Your chairman has alluded to the Constitution—

And this last sentence is the closing sentence with which Mr. Johnson usually finished his speeches at most places.

I leave the Constitution in your hands. I leave it with you, the people in whom I have always confided. The Constitution of the Union and the flag of the country are in your hands. There I know that they will be preserved. Thanking you—

And so forth.

Everywhere the President went he breathed this assurance. He was charged with the future welfare of his country and its people, and would succeed in spite of its enemies, the Congress. I am right, and the cause that I represent must be justified. I leave it with the people, assured that I will be vindicated by the repudiation by them of the Congress which strives to block the way of restoration of the Union. I think that President Johnson in the midst of this struggle was stimulated by meeting the people on his famous tour to believe his contest could have but one ending—a sweeping victory. I am also absolutely certain that President Wilson to-day is firm in his own conviction that the position he has taken on compelling the Senate to come to his view of the league of nations must win, because he is not accustomed to confess a mistake. His habits of mind argue any position he takes is right, and he undertakes, like Andrew Johnson, to carry the contest before the country to prove it a struggle between the people and the Senate, in which he represents, as he believes, the cause of the people of the country, and everywhere he is willing to leave it to the people. This plea of Wilson is very much on the plane of that made by Johnson, and to like crowds. I give it to you as my closing thought that President Wilson is fighting a losing game. His attitude toward the coordinate treaty-making body is only one of the many items in his efforts of Executive superiority in his relation to the other coordinate branches of the Government. This attitude is more than mere impulse. It is policy with him. He but attempts to practice his theory. The President becomes sometimes out of humor and impatient with any sort of opposition, notwithstanding that opposition is not only justified but a constitutional duty of Senators, and, as one Member of this House, I now declare that the time is here, gentlemen of this House, for genuine Americans who are Members of this House to let the country know that the legislative body is still in existence and no one man, be he our President or not, can dictate his will as law, even by the threat that he will take it to the whole people. [Applause on the Republican side.] And I now wish to advise our Democratic friends that these people who have insisted that the demonstrations of President Wilson are conclusive of the support that he is to receive on a disputed measure are destined to become embarrassed, for such an argument would prove that Andrew Johnson was more popular than President Wilson, because he got greater crowds than did President Wilson. I simply throw this out to my friends on the Democratic side that the President's tour will not be a determinant, except to arouse the American people to speak their minds when the time comes, as they surely will do when they decide whether we are to preserve American sovereignty and independence. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] give me two or three minutes?

Mr. PLATT. I yield. I understand I have but five minutes left, but I yield to my friend from Virginia.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Virginia three minutes.

Mr. PLATT. I yield three minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the gentleman from Ohio, the chairman of the Republican congressional committee, has just made a speech which is in line with a newspaper interview he gave out the other day, in which he undertakes to draw a parallel between Andrew Johnson and Woodrow Wilson. He makes the point that because Mr. Johnson had great audiences and Mr. Wilson has great audiences, it is to be deduced that Mr. Wilson will suffer the fate which overtook Andrew Johnson. Why does he not draw a parallel with reference to 1912, when Mr. Wilson's speeches were heard by great audiences, and not with any adverse result, but with the result of the Republican Party carrying but two States in the Union, the two small States of Vermont and Utah? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Then, in 1916, Mr. Wilson again made speeches to great audiences and with the same force and same charm which mark those he is delivering now, and again the Republican Party went down to defeat and Mr. Wilson was elected to the Presidency. [Applause on the Democratic side.] When he draws a parallel—and he is a historian of high scholarship, the author of a historical work which he wrote when at the head of Antioch College, before he came into the arena of active partisanship—why does not he and the other critics tell us of the great audiences that greeted George Washington in his day, when the people poured out to show their appreciation of him and their devotion to him, and yet, then in the second term of his Presidency and in his second year—note the coincidence—Washington was so bitterly vituperated and assailed by his enemies, just as Wilson is now, that he has left on record the fact that he felt all the pain and humiliation which was conceivable.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman let me have a minute or two more?

Mr. PLATT. I can not yield to the gentleman any more time.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. As a very new Member I ask unanimous consent to continue for a minute or two more.

Mr. RUCKER. Five minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the debate be continued for five minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the rule of Calendar Wednesday is that more than two hours can not be taken in debate.

Mr. RUCKER. Can not the committee extend the time five minutes, if it is done by unanimous consent?

Mr. POU. It can be done by unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. RUCKER. I ask unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can proceed, and if anybody raises objection——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, personally I regret that the time of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] was not extended, because he made a most excellent speech. There is only one point of it to which I desire to refer. He speaks of the parallel between the present tour of the President and the President's tour in 1912, when, the gentleman from Virginia said, his delightful oratory won a result of which he is very proud and apparently which he desires to have repeated. Allow me to call the attention of the gentleman from Virginia to the fact that as a result of the speeches made by Mr. Wilson in 1912 he only got about a third of all the votes cast at that election. [Applause on the Republican side.] If the gentleman desires to have that result repeated, I think he can find a hearty response on this side of the House.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. There is a question I desired to propound to the distinguished chairman of the Republican committee. We have heard talk without much cessation, going to the very extreme of criticism not only in reference to Mr. Wilson but in reference to the league of nations, and I would like to ascertain whether the gentleman from Ohio, representing his party or his party behind him upon that side of the House, approves or disapproves of the league of nations.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is the gentleman referring to me or to my distinguished colleague?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. To the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. We were told the other day by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] that it is entirely proper for this House to consider a resolution in respect to foreign affairs. If this endless criticism of the league of nations is not to continue, but is to reach some crisis, why does not the dominant party in this House bring forward a resolution expressing its condemnation of the league of nations and furnish us an opportunity to vote upon it? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] has expired.

Mr. PLATT. I yield to the gentleman another minute.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I yield to the chairman of the congressional committee.

Mr. FESS. In reply to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE], whose judgment and personality I very much admire, I would say that the resolution that he suggests this House should bring before it would probably not be regarded in order, because it is a matter for the Senate. Speaking for myself, I am positively and uncompromisingly opposed to Mr. Wilson's league of nations and in favor of the Americanism of the reservations of Senator LODGE. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, it is not unnatural that opposition would be developed to a league drafted by a gentleman who, having appealed to the people for support, having gone to the country with a request that a Democratic Congress be given to him in both branches, received as an answer from the American people an adverse majority of more than a million votes. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I understand I have four minutes remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has four minutes remaining.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to take any part in this discussion over the league of nations. I have sometimes felt very much disposed to criticize the President of the United States, and sometimes I have felt very much disposed to support him and have very strongly supported him, even when members of his own party did not support him. [Laughter.]

I have reserved a few minutes just to bring back the committee for a moment or two to the consideration of the joint resolution before us, and to state that I think that the opposition to it, or most of it, has passed; and I wish to call attention to the fact that the resolution refers back to the Red Cross act. It is limited to the continuance of the war now existing, and requires each association to report to the Comptroller of the Currency, within 10 days after making any contribution, the amount of such contribution and the amount of net earnings in excess of such contributions.

Now, the only possible question raised in the debate last Wednesday was as to the limit of time for contributions. To meet that question or objection, such an amendment as this might well be adopted at the end of the resolution, adding it as a proviso:

Provided, however, That for the purposes of this act the war shall be considered to have ended when the treaty of peace was signed.

That would limit the period of contributions to last May or June, when the treaty was signed, and not to the time when the treaty will be ratified, so that no further contributions can be made or solicited.

We all know that these organizations did splendid work. Many of our troops were still in Europe until after last May. The peak of the returning crowd did not come until June. Those organizations did splendid work while our troops were there. I think they were entitled to such support as they could get in this or in any other way, and they were dependent, to a certain extent, upon the contributions that they supposed they were sure to get from a number of national banks. A good many of the national banks have not contributed, as I am informed, and there will be no possible pressure put upon them in future to make them contribute.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask that the resolution be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the resolution for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That it shall be lawful for any national banking association to contribute to the united war-work campaign in the same manner and under the same conditions they are authorized to contribute to the American National Red Cross by section 1 of the act entitled "An act authorizing national banks to subscribe to the American National Red Cross," approved May 22, 1918.

With committee amendments, as follows:

In line 4, after the word "campaign," strike out "in the same manner and," and in line 5 strike out the word "as" and insert "and limitations under which."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the first committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, lines 4 and 5, strike out the words "in the same manner and."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the second amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 5, after the word "conditions," strike out the word "as" and insert "and limitations under which."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WINGO. What is the amendment? Is it a committee amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PLATT: At the end of the resolution add the following: "Provided, however, That for the purposes of this act the war shall be construed as to have ended when the treaty of peace was signed."

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, as I have already explained, this resolution refers to the Red Cross act passed May 22, 1918, which is limited to the continuance of the state of war then existing. Now, it might be held and is held technically that the state of war still exists, and will still exist until the treaty of peace is ratified. So I have offered the amendment providing that the war shall be considered to have ended for purposes of this act when the treaty of peace was signed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARRETT: Page 1, line 3, after the word "association" insert "by and with the consent of, or when authorized by, the majority of its stockholders."

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, this is the amendment of which I gave notice when this resolution was under discussion on last Calendar Wednesday. It strikes at what I believe to be the inherently erroneous principle involved in the resolution. I do not believe that it is wise or proper for the Congress of the United States to let down the bars and authorize the national banking associations, through their directors, to contribute the funds belonging to their stockholders without the consent of those stockholders, even though it be to worthy causes such as are involved in the United War Work Campaign.

Last Wednesday I undertook to point out a difference between the Red Cross organization, to which the national banks were authorized to contribute, and the organizations that compose the one engaged in this United War Work Campaign, namely, that the Red Cross is a Federal incorporation, chartered by a special act of Congress. Its powers are fixed in the terms of its charter, and the purposes for which it is authorized to raise funds are fixed in the charter. Those can not be changed except by act of Congress itself. But the organizations which make up this United War Work Campaign are not, I think, incorporated organizations, and if any of them is incorporated, or if all of them consolidated are incorporated under the laws of some State, there will be no control by the Congress over them. They can change their plans and methods at the whims of the individuals who control them whenever the State will permit. That difference exists. But the fundamental thing here is that we are giving authority to directors to take funds of which they are trustees without consulting the cestui que trust and contribute them. I do not think that is right, and for ha reason I have offered his amendment.

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak for five minutes in favor of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes in favor of the amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, the directors of a corporation are simply the agents both of the corporation and the shareholders. By a fiction of law the property of the corporation belongs to the corporation and not to the shareholders, and hence it may be argued that, technically, when you authorize the directors to give away this money they are giving the money of the corporation and not of the stockholders, and that they are the only existing officers of the corporation and under the charter have full power and control over the corporation funds. But that is a legal fiction, just as a corporation itself is a legal fiction, and really the directors of a corporation are simply the agents of the shareholders and the property of the corporation, in substance, is the property of the shareholders. Here it is proposed to tell the agents that, without consulting the people who own the property, without regard to their wishes, perhaps directly contrary to their wishes, these agents shall take their property and do what they please with it. That can not be right or just or fundamentally sound as a matter of justice. If I be your agent, having control of your property, deriving all my authority from you, my only duty being to serve you, surely no one would argue that it would be right and proper for some outside agency to authorize me to take your property and divert it contrary to your wishes. Yet that is what we propose to do in the bill as drawn. I do not think it is fundamentally sound as a matter of justice or as a matter of right, particularly in view of the fact that the money is being given away. A man should have the right to say whether he shall give his own or not, and that right should not be conferred upon some one who does not own the property, whose property it is not, and who has no sort of right or title in it. For that reason I trust that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] will be adopted.

Mr. MACCRATE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VENABLE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MACCRATE. Is there anything in the bill compelling the directors of a bank to make this payment?

Mr. VENABLE. There is not.

Mr. MacCRATE. Will not the stockholders of the bank have the right to object to the action of the directors of the bank?

Mr. VENABLE. Yes; they might object; but the directors, under this act, could make this contribution, contrary to the objection of the stockholders. This confers power.

Mr. MacCRATE. This Government of ours, by act of Congress, has loaned billions of dollars to foreign nations. The people have never been consulted about that. We are their agents.

Mr. VENABLE. Well, that is a loan. A bank loans money and gets it back with interest. The Government loans money and gets it back with interest; but here you are proposing to give away the money of others.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by inserting after the word "majority" the words "in interest."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment as stated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT. Let it be reported as modified, so that Members may see how it will read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARRETT: Page 1, line 3, after the word "association," insert "by and with the consent of or when authorized by the majority in interest of its stockholders."

Mr. PLATT. May I ask the gentleman from Tennessee if he will have any further objection to the bill if this amendment is adopted?

Mr. GARRETT. No; I will be satisfied with it with that amendment.

Mr. PLATT. I am inclined to agree with a good deal that the gentleman says. Therefore I do not object to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 80, noes 1.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the joint resolution to the House as amended, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the joint resolution as amended do pass.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will pardon me, was there another amendment to be offered?

Mr. PLATT. I think that amendment was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 61, noes 1.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman who it was who voted in the negative? There was no gentleman who voted in the negative.

The CHAIRMAN. Some gentleman was standing on the left of the Chair.

Mr. BLANTON. I understand him to say that he did not do it. I just ask for information.

Mr. RICKETTS. I make the point of order that that is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order. There was no gentleman voted in the negative.

The CHAIRMAN. Some gentleman on the left of the Chair was standing.

Mr. WINGO. I make the point of order that the point of the gentleman from Texas is dilatory. There is nothing involved.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is agreed to; and the committee determines to rise.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration H. J. Res. 87 and had directed him to report the same back to the House with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the joint resolution as amended do pass.

Mr. PLATT. I move the previous question on the joint resolution and the amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put the amendments in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 103, noes 3.

Accordingly the joint resolution was passed.

On motion of Mr. PLATT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the secretary of state of the State of Minnesota announcing the ratification by the legislature of that State of the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women.

The amendment was received with applause.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 2875) to amend section 7 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes," approved March 1, 1919, and the same was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

FARM LOANS.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I call up H. R. 9065, to amend sections 3, 8, 10, 12, 20, and 21 of the act approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm-loan act.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York calls up H. R. 9065. This bill is on the Union Calendar. Under the rule the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] will take the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, the report on this bill gives very full information as to just what it is. It makes sundry amendments in the Federal farm-loan act to make the act more workable and to take out what the farmers call in many cases red tape, principally in the working of the farm-loan associations. Several sources of delay have developed, which many farmers seriously object to, and which drives some of them to private loaning agencies rather than to wait for the time it takes to get a loan approved by the farm-loan association and then carried up to the land bank.

The first section of the bill, as anyone will see by looking at it, provides for the appointment of an assistant registrar in each land-bank district. The registrar occasionally gets sick or is absent, and if he is not there nobody is now authorized to perform his duties and it makes delay. One of his chief duties is to receive applications for loans.

Section 2 provides that when a man's loan is approved he shall become a member of the farm-loan association to which his application is made, instead of getting the association together and voting on his name, which makes another delay, because it is often not easy to get the members together.

Section 3 strikes out the provision requiring that all three members of the loan committee of a farm-loan association shall be required to join together in signing a report showing that all three had visited the land of an applicant and made an appraisal. Their appraisal does not govern, anyway. An appraiser is sent from the land bank, who goes over the farm, and it is his report that governs the loan. All the loan committee really needs to do is to testify as to the character and solvency of the applicant and have a report made with regard to the value of his farm. In the country, generally speaking, a man knows his neighbors and knows their character and solvency, and it is not necessary to get all members of the loan committee together in a report showing they have visited the land. This amendment allows them to have the work done by an appraiser if they wish to.

Section 4 of the bill amends section 12 of the act in reference to the restrictions on loans. The first part of it refers to the payment of loans. We provided in the farm-loan act that after five years anyone could pay as much as he wanted on his loan in multiples of $25. It seemed to those of us who had some part in framing the bill that $25 was the most convenient small payment that could be made. But, as it worked out, such a fixed payment upsets the amortization scheme. The amortization scheme adopted contemplates a payment of 6½ per cent, 5½ of which goes for interest and the rest payment on the principal, so that in about 34 years the loan is paid up. If you pay an amount like $25 you upset the whole scheme. We have provided simply that advance amortization payments may be made.

We have made a little change in the purposes for which loans are made. I shall offer a committee amendment adding to that, for I think we have taken out something that we did not intend to take out. This system is one with many privileges, and the act provides that loans can only be made for certain purposes, for the purchase of land for agricultural uses and to provide for the purchase of equipment, fertilizer, live stock, and so forth, and to provide buildings for the improvement of the farm lands; also to liquidate existing indebtedness, if incurred for one of the above-mentioned purposes or if existing as a mortgage at the time the first farm-loan association of the county was organized. In making some change in this provision the committee inadvertently struck out the clause allowing loans to take up mortgages already on the property when the first association of the county was formed, and I shall later offer a committee amendment to restore that.

Of course, it would be impossible to go into the purpose for which a mortgage of long standing was made. That would greatly narrow the application of the act and hamper its usefulness.

Section 5 of the bill simply strikes out the very small denominations of bonds which have become unnecessary to small investors since the advent of the $50 Liberty bond. Few of the small bonds have been issued, and there is a tendency to use them as currency, thus creating inflation.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. I will.

Mr. MORGAN. What is the provision where there is a limit—that no bonds shall be issued less than $50?

Mr. PLATT. Less than $100, as we have it in the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, what is the object of that?

Mr. PLATT. Because there are $50 Liberty bonds, which fill the purposes of a bond for small investors; scarcely any of those small farm-loan bonds have been sold. If a man takes a $25 bond, he is likely to consider it practically as currency and not an investment. It simply adds to inflation in too many instances.

Mr. MORGAN. Is it supposed that the Government expects to sell additional Liberty bonds?

Mr. PLATT. No; I think not. But they are in the market and anybody can buy them for less than par.

Mr. MORGAN. Then what is the object of this change—to enhance the price of the Liberty bond?

Mr. PLATT. Well, I would hardly say that. It saves the expense of the Government in printing bonds which are not being sold and which are not necessary, either for the small investor or for the system.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, it is the theory of the measure—and I think that is true in such banks in Europe—that bonds are issued in small denominations for the purpose of encouraging and educating persons of small means to invest in such bonds. Now, there are many persons who may have $25 but who would not have $50 to invest, and the object of this system is to encourage thrift and the investment in these standardized securities.

Mr. PLATT. Anybody who has got $25 can buy a $100 bond exactly as well as the $25 bond.

Mr. MORGAN. Why so?

Mr. PLATT. By putting it up at the bank as collateral and paying as he can save the money. That is what we want to get the people to do.

Mr. MORGAN. Maybe that would be so with Liberty bonds, but it is not so in farm-loan banks' bonds.

Mr. PLATT. Does the gentleman mean to say that the national banks do not consider farm-loan bonds good collateral?

Mr. MORGAN. A man has to make some arrangement with the bank to loan the money. That is a process that is necessary.

Mr. PLATT. It is a very simple process, which every man ought to know how to do, and a good many do not know how to do, and what we want to teach them to do. This Farm Loan System shows how a man with $2,500 can buy a $5,000 farm. In the same way a man with $25 can buy a $50 or a $100 bond.

Mr. MORGAN. The expense of printing these bonds would be very small after they are sold. I think it is a very doubtful amendment there, and I do not see how it would be of any great value after it is put in.

Mr. PLATT. I do not think it is of very great consequence one way or the other, but the Farm Loan Board recommends it and says that the bonds are not selling in considerable number in these small denominations since the Liberty bond issues; that they are not being purchased to any extent by the small investors.

Mr. MORGAN. The Farm Loan Board probably is relying upon the moneyed institutions to buy these bonds. That is not the theory. The theory is that people generally all over the United States should be encouraged and educated to buy these bonds everywhere and not rely chiefly upon banking institutions. I think the Federal Farm Loan Board so far has relied too much upon the banks to buy these bonds. However, I am not criticizing them.

Mr. PLATT. There may be some truth in the gentleman's criticism, but at the same time the gentleman knows the bonds have certain privileges that make them attractive to large investors.

Mr. MORGAN. I think we ought to cultivate the purchase of these bonds as investments by the great mass of the people. Now, of course, the gentleman knows that there have been a large amount of these bonds sold and invested in by the masses of the people, and——

Mr. PLATT. Yes; I think that is true, but not in the very small denominations. I think we want to limit the size of these bonds. My experience in the Liberty-bond campaigns leads me to believe that if a man can buy a $50 bond he can buy a $100 bond. If he gets a $100 bond, he considers it as something of an investment, as it brings him in a return that he can see, whereas if he gets a $50 bond he considers it as a very small business—considers it but as currency and passes it out very likely for something that he wants, or thinks he wants. He goes into a store and sees something for sale for $45, and if the salesman says he will take a Liberty or a farm-loan bond he will probably pass it over and lose $5. Take these little bonds for $25, the average man does not consider them as an investment; it is so small he can not see it. A workingman earning $20 or $25 a week or more nowadays can buy a bond larger than $25 or $50.

Mr. HAUGEN. He would have to make arrangements with the bank to borrow the money.

Mr. PLATT. Not necessarily. He could put the money in the savings bank until he gets $100.

Mr. MORGAN. That will help the savings bank; maybe that is the purpose of it.

Mr. PLATT. It ought to be so, for a man making $30 or more a week as a farm laborer in the gentleman's neighborhood should be able to buy a $50 or a $100 bond rather than buy a $25 bond.

Mr. MORGAN. I will ask the gentleman this: If in his investigation of this subject in Europe these institutions issue bonds of small denominations for the purpose of enabling them to make sales to persons of small means; is not that true?

Mr. PLATT. I think it is true; but whether that is going to be continued with such accumulations of Government bonds, I do not know. It was true before. I do not know what the smallest denomination was. I doubt if it was below $25.

Mr. PELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. I yield.

Mr. PELL. I rather agree with the gentleman who has just spoken. It seems to me it is a very good thing to provide not only one attractive and excellent investment to the people in the form of Liberty bonds, but to give them as varied a choice of investments as possible in order to make the country at large realize the use of bonds. The gentleman says that a man will get a $50 Liberty bond and will spend it for $45 worth of merchandise——

Mr. PLATT. They do it right along.

Mr. PELL. Now, you are not going to take a $1,000 Liberty bond and spend it for $900 worth of stuff. Of course, we understand about bonds and own them; but people who are not accustomed to such investments ought to be able to learn their value. The great need in this country to-day is thrift and economy. And it seems to me that a really varied list of possible investments, in which the people can not possibly be swindled, would provide the best conceivable education for the American public in economy and thrift.

Mr. PLATT. I agree with the gentleman fully, but at the same time the gentleman knows that a small bond is too often not regarded as anything but currency. The small investor has postal-savings banks and other savings banks to put his money into until he can buy a bond of some size; also he can deposit $25 or any multiple thereof with any farm-loan association for conversion into farm-loan bonds. A 5 per cent return on $25 is so small that the average workman who makes $25 or $30 a week does not consider it anything. He makes more money in half a day than the return on that bond will be.

Mr. MORGAN. Did the Secretary of the Treasury recommend the change in the bonds in any way?

Mr. PLATT. No; I think not, unless he may be considered to have recommended what the Federal Farm Loan Board, of which he is a member, recommended.

Mr. MORGAN. Then, I understand that there has been no recommendation by the Treasury Department or the Secretary of the Treasury to change the denominations of those bonds?

Mr. PLATT. No direct recommendation, to my recollection.

Mr. BRIGGS. This bill does not include any feature as to increasing the amount of loans to be made, does it?

Mr. PLATT. We had such a feature before the committee, and we decided not to approve it. At some future time it may be brought up. There was a good deal of discussion about that.

Mr. BRIGGS. There seems to be in my locality a considerable number that find the amount too low—the restriction.

Mr. PLATT. I think there is something to be said for that. At the same time, the gentleman knows the act was intended to help the small farmer, who might be and often was the prey of various money lenders, and could not easily make arrangements for borrowing money. If a man has a farm worth $40,000 or $50,000, he ought to be able to take care of himself.

Mr. BRIGGS. The limit now is what? Ten thousand dollars?

Mr. PLATT. Ten thousand dollars.

Mr. BRIGGS. They could increase the limit to $20,000 and make the farm-loan banks much more useful, and enable very many more of the farmers to develop and improve the holdings they have, and which now have to be neglected because they have not money enough with which to tide them over.

Mr. PLATT. The larger farmers can go to the joint-stock banks and pay just a little higher interest, offset by quicker service.

Mr. BRIGGS. That is the trouble. They have to pay higher interest. Has it been found in the study by the Banking Committee that the rate of interest now charged for these loans is such that the earnings are sufficient to enable a reduction in the loan rate to be made at some early time?

Mr. PLATT. That may be made at some time. The system started with 5 per cent loans, but the rate had to be increased to 5½. The banks are expected to return to the Government the revolving fund which was originally given to them.

Mr. BRIGGS. The act does not require that?

Mr. PLATT. Yes; it does, and it should be done, certainly.

Mr. BRIGGS. What percentage of this surplus goes back to the retirement of the revolving fund, if any, and that is not distributed in dividends?

Mr. PLATT. I can not answer the gentleman's question fully without looking up the act, but the act requires that 25 per cent of earnings shall be carried to surplus, and after that the return goes to the farm-loan associations, who pay it to the borrowers in dividends. And then after the capital of the bank equals a certain amount—$750,000 in subscriptions from the associations—a portion of the money goes back to pay the Government off. Several banks are already paying back to the Government.

Mr. BRIGGS. It has not been determined yet, however, whether or not the committee will recommend an increase of the loan amount?

Mr. PLATT. It has not been determined yet, and I think it is somewhat doubtful whether it will be done unless in connection with something else, possibly in connection with a bill, to assess the expenses of the Farm Loan Board on the banks. I want to say to complete my explanation that the last paragraph of the bill, section 6, simply provides for the appointment of a vice president to sign bonds in case the president is not able to do so, for the purpose of avoiding delay.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. I will.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. As I understand, the Federal farm-loan bank pays out the dividends to the stockholders in these local farm-loan organizations?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Now, my information is that the farm-loan bank will not pay out these dividends to the stockholders of the local association if there is any one of the stockholders in arrears as to interest, or there is a foreclosure proceeding pending. They hold back the dividends until all the stockholders have made good their loans. Am I correct in that?

Mr. PLATT. The farm-loan associations?

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Yes. They are treated by the banks, in other words, as I understand it, as an entity; and if a single stockholder is in arrears in interest, or a foreclosure is pending against him, the farm-loan bank does not send out the individual checks of the stockholders in the local association.

Mr. PLATT. You mean that the local association does not send them out?

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. No. The Federal farm-loan bank in that particular district. These dividends are declared by the farm-loan bank.

Mr. PLATT. Payable to the farm-loan association, which in turn makes its own distribution.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. They will not, therefore, send them down to the farm-loan association so long as there is one man belonging to the farm-loan association who is in arrears and who has not paid his interest.

Mr. PLATT. That may be. It is news to me and very interesting.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. They construe that, I will say to the gentleman——

Mr. PLATT. The farm-loan association is a cooperative association, and the members are supposed to be able to put pressure upon a delinquent member to get him to pay up.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. The farm-loan bank, as I understand it, treats the farm-loan association as an entity, and therefore they send these dividends down to the farm-loan association to be distributed among its members; but they will not send them down as long as there is a single member of that association who is in arrears, or who is in a position where foreclosure has commenced.

Now, section 2 provides "That the third paragraph of section 8 be amended by striking out the words 'if the application for membership is accepted and the loan is granted.'" Then I notice here in your report on the bill that you say:

> Section 2 of the bill amends section 8 of the act, a section which has reference to the farm-loan associations, the cooperative associations of borrowers. None but borrowers on farm mortgages can be members, but the act at present appears to require that an association shall vote upon an application for membership, besides approving the loan applied for.

Now, if I understand the procedure at this time, the local farm-loan association appoints a committee, and that committee of three passes on the loan?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. You are changing that by providing that it is not necessary for all three to act and the three, or a majority of the three, may act through some one party that they may designate. I do not find any fault with that, but the question presented to my mind is this: In the first place, the man must be accepted by the association as a member. They have authority to keep out or prevent any man from becoming a member of the association. If your amendment is adopted here, the question of membership does not cut any figure. In other words, they can not keep him out. If he has the security and he joins he is entitled to a loan.

Now, there are two things to be considered in making all loans: Not only the collateral to secure the loan, but also the moral risk of the borrower. For instance, down in my district I know that at this time there are foreclosure suits pending where the security, the land, is worth four or five times the amount of money advanced, but the mortgagor was not a good moral risk.

Mr. PLATT. If I might interrupt the gentleman right there——

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Let me get through with the question. He fails to make payment of the interest at maturity, and therefore the bank has been compelled to start foreclosure proceedings on those particular loans, although they are amply secured. In consequence of that situation, all dividend checks are being withheld, although there are 150 or 200 members of the association, and notwithstanding the fact that the security is ample. Now, if you strike this out——

Mr. PLATT. There must still be report as to the character and solvency of the applicant. A man's neighbors are supposed to know his character.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. You make it possible when you adopt section 2 here and when further sections of this bill are agreed to for a third party to be appointed by this association loan committee to go out and report on what? Simply the value of the security. The security may be ample, the loan may be well secured, and still the moral risk may not be good, and in that event under the ruling of the Farm Loan Board it is possible that all of the dividends going to the various stockholders of the local farm-loan association may be withheld simply because a suit is filed or some member has failed to meet the interest on his loan at maturity.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman knows it is comparatively easy in a farming community, where people know each other, when a man's character or reputation is known to be bad—it ought to be easy or possible under this arrangement to keep him off. The present arrangement is a prolific source of delay. A man has a mortgage due next month and he goes to the farm-loan association and tries to get that off; he can not get it in a month. He has to go somewhere else to borrow the money.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I will say to the gentleman that down in my country the farm-loan associations are usually coincident with the county. They usually form one in a county, and the membership is scattered over the entire county.

Mr. PLATT. Exactly. That is the general rule.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Now, it may be impossible for the local farm-loan association committee of three to go out and examine these loans. I think the gentleman is right in providing that another party may be designated to make the examination. But here is a man who wants to join the association, and when you adopt section 2 you provide, in effect, that the association has no right to pass upon the question of his membership; in other words, you repeal their authority to negative his election. Then one man, the examiner, goes out to any part of the county and makes an examination and comes back and reports on the value of the security offered. You have stricken out the provision that requires the vote of the membership of the local farm-loan association before he can become a member of the association and in that way you are likely to increase these foreclosure suits and these failures to pay interest, by admitting to membership bad moral risks. You are likely to bring the whole system into disrepute and render it unpopular among the stockholders by withholding these dividends.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman's statement does not show that the present provisions of the law have prevented people of that kind from getting into the association.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Just the moment you commence to withhold these dividends will not the stockholders commence to inquire why? And then you come back and say, "The reason the dividends are withheld is that you people permitted men who were not good moral risks to come into the association; you must remedy that yourself." The object of the farm-loan act was to enable people to meet and form their association and cooperate with each other.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman is making a good point, but I hope he will not take up all my time. It seems to me the provisions of section 3 pretty well cover it by providing—

That whenever an application for a mortgage loan is made through a national farm-loan association the loan committee provided for in section 7 of this act shall forthwith make, or cause to be made, such investigation as it may deem necessary as to the character and solvency of the applicant and sufficiency of the security offered, and cause written report to be made of the result of each investigation.

If they report that a man is a bad character and carry that up to the land bank, or that the man is of doubtful character, I am sure the bank will not make the loan.

Mr. STEVENSON. And is not that in addition to section 10? There is no provision in section 10 as it stands, is there, about looking into the moral risk? This is really a safeguard on that, is it not?

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. No; the local association, under the law as it exists, must vote to accept him. The membership of the association in accepting a borrower as a member pass on his moral character. If they are careless and make a mistake they are the ones who suffer by having their dividends withheld.

Mr. CANNON. I want to ask a question.

Mr. PLATT. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Is there anything in the act, or in the proposed amendment, that makes a master of morals—to say that this shall be the moral code?

Mr. PLATT. Of course, there is not.

Mr. CANNON. Or a just code, or a good code?

Mr. PLATT. No; but this is a cooperative association, and there is some force in the gentleman's argument that, being a cooperative association, the people who belong to the association should have something to say about whom they take in, but there are associations were they have tried to keep men out. For instance, a new man comes into the neighborhood, and people do not like his looks, and so they have tried to keep him out.

Mr. CANNON. Has anybody been kept out on account of religious differences?

Mr. PLATT. I do not think religious differences have entered into the matter so far.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I do not know of any political questions or moral questions that have been injected. I am simply stating the condition and calling attention to it.

Mr. PLATT. In the last publication of the Farm Loan Board, the Borrowers' Bulletin, the gentleman will find a case of that sort cited; not where a religious question was involved but where a new man came into a neighborhood and the people did not seem to like him. The man who had owned the farm before him had not had a very good reputation, and the farm had a bad name, and the local farm-loan association turned him down. But the new man who had come in managed to get his case before the land bank, and they sent an appraiser down who looked the farm over and found that everything was all right. The appraiser was convinced that the new man was a good moral risk and persuaded the local association to take him in, and the whole thing turned out well.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa, chairman of the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. HAUGEN. On page 8 of the bill is the following:

Such bonds shall also contain in the face thereof a certificate signed by the Farm Loan Commissioner to the effect that it is issued under the authority of the Federal farm-loan act, has the approval in form and issue of the Federal Farm Loan Board, and is legal and regular in all respects; that it is not taxable by National, State, municipal, or local authority.

Has the committee given any attention to the question of taxing these bonds?

Mr. PLATT. Not in this bill.

Mr. HAUGEN. It is provided that the bonds shall state that they are not taxable by National, State, municipal, or local authority.

Mr. PLATT. That is the present law, simply repeated in order to incorporate the amendment we have made to another part of the paragraph.

Mr. HAUGEN. Has the committee given any consideration to the subject of repealing the exemption of these bonds from taxes?

Mr. PLATT. A number of bills have been introduced, one or two bills at least, for the repeal of the exemption on farm-loan bonds, but the committee has never taken up those bills. I have no objection to saying personally that I do not think that as yet the exemption ought to be repealed. Ultimately, when the system gets well established, I think farm-loan bonds might be put on the same basis as Liberty bonds are; but for another year or two yet, until the taxes on Liberty bonds are reduced, and until the system is pretty firmly established, I do not think they ought to be subject to taxation, which would greatly interfere with the sale of the bonds. I do not think the system ought to be hampered in that way. Of course, when this act was passed nobody had any idea that Government bonds would ever be taxed, and the trouble is really that we have taxed Government bonds rather than that we have exempted them. What we ought to do is to bring down to some extent the tax on Government bonds by lowering the surtaxes.

Mr. HAUGEN. I have had a number of inquiries and I wanted to know the views of the committee.

Mr. HULINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HULINGS. Does this bill provide for an additional number of officials for these banks?

Mr. PLATT. A vice president and a registrar.

Mr. HULINGS. And one or more land-bank appraisers?

Mr. PLATT. Oh, no.

Mr. HULINGS. I see this provision here:

Farm-loan registrars, deputy registrars, land-bank appraisers, and land-bank examiners appointed under this section shall be public officials.

Is this loading up the whole institution with a lot more officials?

Mr. PLATT. There is nothing new provided except the deputy registrar and the vice president and I believe an assistant secretary in the land banks.

Mr. HULINGS. Does this bill provide for the taxation of these bonds?

Mr. PLATT. No; it does not.

Mr. HULINGS. They go free of tax now, do they?

Mr. PLATT. Yes; they go free of tax now.

Mr. HULINGS. One more question.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-two minutes.

Mr. PLATT. I will answer one more question.

Mr. HULINGS. The present limitation on a loan is $10,000?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. HULINGS. Is that limit increased?

Mr. PLATT. No; we have not put anything about that in this bill. We had it in the bill originally but struck it out.

Now, Mr. Chairman, having answered all questions about the bill pending, I want to make a brief statement with regard to the Farm Loan System. I have taken great interest in the system, because I was a member of the subcommittee of the Sixty-third Congress which, after the passage of the Federal reserve act, began the consideration of a rural-credit system. We held extensive hearings and went into the whole subject very fully. At that time, as many of you know, there had been a commission appointed which went to Europe. There was also a commission from the Southern Commercial Congress, some of whose members went to Europe and studied the question of rural credits very fully. One of the members of the commission who went to Europe was the Hon. Ralph Moss, of Indiana, a Member of this House who has now passed away, to whom perhaps more credit should be given for the adoption of the Federal Farm Loan System than to any other one Member of the House. I say that, although he was a Member of the other side of the House. Mr. Moss had been and was a farmer himself, a genuine farmer, not a political farmer, and a genuine, whole-souled, manly man, and also a very faithful student of economics. He worked as very few Members of this House ever do work, although a good many more men in the House are harder workers than people give us credit for. He worked very hard in the preparation of the bill which was first known as the Moss bill, and afterwards as a member of the commission which drafted the Federal Farm Loan System and still later as a member of the Banking and Currency Committee and of the conference committee in putting the bill in final form.

The subcommittee which in the Sixty-third Congress first took up the matter of rural credits did not indorse the Moss bill but proceeded to prepare a new bill, which was known as the Bulkley bill, a bill which we had to turn down finally because of certain Government-aid provisions which were considered unsound. I was one of those who joined with the then chairman of the committee, Mr. Glass, now Secretary of the Treasury, in turning down that bill because of certain provisions. The Bulkley bill, although never reported by the Banking and Currency Committee, containing many good features, represented a lot of hard work extending over many months, and was largely the foundation of the bill prepared by the joint commission appointed as the result of a special resolution passed at the end of the Sixty-third Congress. Mr. Bulkley is entitled to a share of the credit though he insisted on retaining the feature which caused the rejection of his bill.

In the Sixty-fourth Congress the report of the joint commission was ready and we took it up first in subcommittee and worked out what is now the Federal farm-loan act. I was a member of the conference committee which put the final touches on the act in conference between the House and the Senate, a conference which lasted for several weeks.

Having said this much to show my interest in the subject and perhaps my right to speak in regard to it, I want to say briefly that the system has been very successful. Considering the way the bill was built up, it is really surprising that practically nothing in it has been found unworkable. The last report of the Federal Farm Loan Board goes down only to November 30, 1918, and there has been a great deal of growth since this report has been made. The capital of the 12 land banks had grown during the year covered by this report of November, 1918, from $10,488,230 to $16,250,000, and on August 31 last had reached $20,978,236.50, of which $12,622,647.50 came from the farm-loan associations. The amount of loans outstanding had grown from $29,816,000 to $149,004,000, and on August 31, 1919, to $252,958,976. The total amount of farm-loan bonds authorized up to August 31 is $285,600,000. The number of borrowers August 31 was 101,000, and the average loan $2,500. The net earnings of the system were up to the end of August $889,360.78, an increase of $169,809.29 during the month, as compared with the statement of July 31. Of these earnings $190,477 was carried to reserve and $287,458.40 had been paid out in dividends to farm-loan associations, leaving $411,427.38 undivided profits on hand.

These figures are enough to show the success of the system which we are now trying to make still more successful for the farmers. The indirect benefit of the system to all borrowers on farm security, furthermore, has been great in that it has brought down interest charges of private individuals and mortgage companies. I have so far been speaking only of the cooperative system, the land banks and the farm-loan associations, but the so-called joint-stock land banks, provided for in the act, have been also remarkably successful, their number having grown from 9 last November to 23, and their loans from $7,380,734.07 to $34,145,216.87 on July 31.

There have been a good many more loans made in my own neighborhood in New York State than I supposed would be made in competition with the great mutual savings banks, the loans in my own county amounting to some $300,000, and I think still larger in the adjoining county of Orange in my district. We have always had the benefit of comparatively low interest rates, and mortgages have generally been allowed to run on from year to year without renewal involving commissions, so I think the amortization feature must be the chief reason people are taking to the system in my neighborhood and in other States where the interest rates have been low. Take, for instance, Iowa, where the rates are low, and where it was supposed the system would be of little benefit; it has been remarkably popular there, due to the amortization feature that gives a man an opportunity to pay a small installment on his principal every year, which he can easily do. As he goes on paying from year to year, and pays off a considerable part of his mortgage, his personal credit improves and he can more easily obtain accommodation from the commercial banks.

In conclusion I may add that I am proud of having been of some service in the preparation of the bills establishing the Farm Loan System and in furthering their passage. I rejoice in the success of the system and shall do what I can by sound amendment, as chairman of the great committee which reported the farm-loan bill, to make it more workable and more successful.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes; now I will yield.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. These farm loan bonds issued draw 4½ per cent, but then there is another per cent allowed for overhead expense?

Mr. PLATT. Yes; 4½ and 5 per cent. The bond rate was raised to 5 per cent in May, 1918, and is still 5 per cent. There was a "spread" of 1 per cent between the bond rate and the mortgage rate.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. It is the difference between the 4½ per cent or 5 per cent at which they sell the bonds and the 5½ per cent which they charge the farmer, or 6 per cent. Does not the gentleman think that that 1 per cent is very high for overhead charges? Does the gentleman think it could be reduced?

Mr. PLATT. I think that at present it is only one-half per cent. Any profit made goes to the farm-loan association. It is simply returned to the borrowers through dividends. Of course, there are two ways the thing can be done—either cut down the interest or they can pay larger dividends.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Does the investigation that the gentleman has made of the system enable him to speak with information with regard to whether or not it can be reduced?

Mr. PLATT. I think it could not be reduced at present. They started lower, with 5 per cent mortgage interest, but had to raise to 5½ per cent because of the increase of interest rates due to the war financing.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. One-half of 1 per cent.

Mr. PLATT. Yes; they increased the rate one-half of 1 per cent.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. I will.

Mr. BRIGGS. To what extent are the facilities of the joint-stock banks being used as compared with those of the farm-loan banks?

Mr. PLATT. The joint-stock banks charge 6 per cent interest, I believe, but there is more freedom, so much of the red tape is cut, as compared with the other, and they are very prosperous. For instance, if a man has made an application to a joint-stock bank, the appraisals are quickly made and he gets his money in a few days. The farm-loan associations operate more slowly of necessity.

Mr. MORGAN. Right along the line of my colleague from Oklahoma, these banks have 1 per cent margin between the rate of interest they pay and the bonds and the rate of interest they charge the borrowers?

Mr. PLATT. They did leave 1 per cent spread, but I think it is now one-half per cent.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, the gentleman is aware in European institutions they do not have anything like 1 per cent for expenses, and I would like to know if the gentleman has made any inquiry as to whether or not those banks, those Federal farm-loan banks, are being operated economically; that is to say, what about the salaries they are paying to their officers and all their employees, and are they being run economically? Because, of course, the borrowers have to pay those expenses. Has the gentleman made any investigation of that?

Mr. PLATT. I have made considerable inquiry. I think they are paying some pretty fair salaries, but I would not say they were not justified. Salaries in the banking business run pretty high, as officers have to keep up their end with other financial institutions. Farmers do not want their banks to look like 30 cents alongside of other banks, and they like to have men to represent them properly, which I think is all right.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. The gentleman, in answer to the interrogatory proposed by myself a moment ago in reference to 1 per cent between the interest the bonds drew and the interest charged to the farmer, said that it did not make any difference, because it went back in the way of dividends. I call his attention to the fact that the dividends are limited to 6 per cent.

Mr. MORGAN. I think not.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. My understanding is they are limited to 6 per cent, and even if that were not true, my colleague's suggestion would result in this, that the piling up of a large surplus is calculated to make men who work for a bank demand larger salaries and make them extravagant.

Mr. PLATT. The system is growing very rapidly, and all the banks except two eastern banks are making money, and several of them are returning or beginning to return money to the Government. The Government capital, on which no interest or dividends are paid, has been cut down from $9,000,000 to $8,265,809. The two eastern banks have not come up to the others yet, but they are coming forward rapidly. It seems to me it is pretty strong testimony to the success of the system that they are able to compete at all in these eastern neighborhoods, where farmers can obtain credit from savings banks and other institutions. For instance, I was over at Frederick, Md., some time ago talking to the president of a bank there that has a large number of deposits from the farmers, and the president of the bank said to me that if a man came in who had a farm worth $10,000 and wanted to borrow $5,000, he did not even ask him for a mortgage, but let him have the money.

I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York has explained the bill very fully. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE].

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I was not present some minutes, being unavoidably detained, when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN] made his remarks in connection with himself and in animadversion of Mr. John Skelton Williams, the present Comptroller of the Currency.

It is not my purpose to reply to these remarks, except to say in passing that it is regrettable that the gentleman usually selects a forum of attack in which Mr. Williams can make no defense. It is not a very ennobling performance for a public official to shoot from ambush.

Mr. Chairman, I arose primarily to say to the committee that Mr. John Skelton Williams has been known by me for 25 years. He is an honored resident of the city of Richmond, and a constituent of mine. He possesses courage, industry, probity, fidelity, honesty, and ability to a very extraordinary degree, qualities which I submit constitute the best attributes of a public official.

In the administration of his public duties his "spear knows no brother." Perhaps it has been this rigid and austere performance of duty that has provoked the criticisms of himself which seem to have gained some currency here and there—criticisms, I submit, that emanate in nearly every instance from some form of personal dissatisfaction, which at this time I do not wish to discuss. It is due Mr. Williams, to his family, and to his friends and associates, who have unbounded confidence in his integrity, in his inflexible fidelity to public duty, and in his courage in the discharge of that duty, that I say what I have said, and which I submit to the fair, disinterested consideration of this body. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the residue of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back one minute.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I wish to take the 20 minutes in discussing the proposition of farms for soldiers, in connection with a bill to be administered by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Farm Loan Board.

The movement to provide farm homes for our soldiers and seamen who served in the recent war against Germany had its origin in the desire of the American people to express their appreciation and in some substantial way manifest their gratitude for the great services rendered and the heroic sacrifices made by these men in the defense of our Nation, its honor, the rights of its people, the principles upon which it was founded, and the cause of justice, liberty, and right.

Every man who went into our fighting forces offered his life for the vindication of his country's cause and placed himself at the command of his Government for whatever sacrifice might be necessary. The patriotic, courageous, and daring manner in which they met every test and discharged every duty is now a matter of history and known to the world.

Now, if the prime purpose of the proposed legislation is for the country to express its gratitude to our returning army, and to do this in such a way as to be of some material assistance to the men composing that army, then the main object to be sought is their benefit and welfare. Therefore we should avoid laying the foundation for any sort of future land speculation, and no opportunity should be given for any man or set of men to unload on the Government in the name of or at the expense of the soldier.

That Congress earnestly desires in some practical and businesslike manner to aid those who have served in our naval and military forces by placing at their disposal opportunities whereby they may acquire rural homes and become the owners and proprietors of the soil they till is an accepted proposition. So far as I know, there is no difference of opinion on this subject. There are some gentlemen who do not believe that we should stop with the farm-home proposition, but that aid for the acquisition of urban homes should also be extended to those who choose to live in the large cities and industrial centers.

Recent developments in this country have furnished proof more convincing than ever that those living in the towns and cities are largely dependent for their prosperity and economic existence upon the people engaged in agricultural pursuits, and that there should be some inducement offered that would have a tendency to shift the population from the congested centers back to the country. The development of the agricultural interests and resources of this Nation by an independent, self-reliant, and prosperous rural population who are the owners and proprietors of their own homes is absolutely essential to its continued peaceful economic existence. The streaming flow of our population from the country districts to the towns and cities has for many years been alarming. This movement, which is depleting our rural districts of the forces most needed for their development, could, in my judgment, be checked by making farm life more attractive and more successful, and by encouraging and assisting every farmer to become the owner of his home and the master of his surroundings.

A close study of this question has resulted in the general opinion and conviction that everything possible should be done to attract a maximum percentage of our returning soldiers and seamen into agricultural pursuits and to induce those who went from the farms at the call of their country to resume their former occupation. So the question here in Congress is to work out the best method by which this may be accomplished. With this in view many plans have been proposed, several bills have been introduced, and much testimony taken by the Committee on Public Lands. However, as a general proposition, I do not believe that the soldiers or the public have had the opportunity to analyze these measures, though the plan of Secretary Lane, embodied in the bill introduced by Mr. MONDELL, of Wyoming, has had wider publicity and greater consideration than any other of the proposed laws.

I have studied this question very closely and with the earnest desire to assist the soldiers and at the same time enable them to become important factors in the welfare of their country in peace as in war, and with the view of placing no unnecessary burden upon the taxpayers, of whom they must form an important part. With this end in view I have framed and introduced a bill, H. R. 5395, and which I discussed before the Committee on Public Lands, with the hope that the principles and provisions embodied and set forth therein might be adopted and included in its report. The report of the committee indicates that it considered all the bills presented, but only the Mondell bill, H. R. 487, received the approval of a majority of the committee.

THE MONDELL BILL.

This bill provides in substance that the Secretary of the Interior may acquire and reclaim by drainage, irrigation, or by other means, areas of land of sufficient extent for the establishment of independent communities, which are termed "Soldiers' settlement projects." The lands out of which these projects or colonies are to be developed are usually referred to as waste lands, cut-over lands, unused swamp or marsh lands, or arid lands. The lands composing the projects are to be reclaimed and made habitable and productive by drainage, irrigation, clearing, the removal of stumps, or other means, as the case may be. Each project is to be divided into farms, each suitable for the support of a family, and houses are to be built, all by and at the expense of the Government and out of the appropriation of $500,000,000 authorized by the bill.

In all this work discharged soldiers are to be employed in so far as practicable. Soldiers are to have the preference in purchasing the farms thus established, and as between soldier applicants preference will be given those who have rendered material service in the development of the projects. The sale to the soldier-settler will be made at a price sufficient to cover the original price of the land, the expense for reclamation and buildings and any other expense incurred in the process of development. Where a soldier has purchased his farm tract and desires to make his own improvements, he may borrow from the fund established by this bill three-fourths of the amount necessary, provided the loan to him shall not exceed $1,500 for that purpose. He may also borrow from the fund $1,200 for the purchase of live stock and equipment, provided this amount does not exceed 75 per cent of the purchase price of live stock and 60 per cent of the cost of the equipment. This bill has nothing in view except the use of large areas of land for the purpose of community settlements. In stating the purposes and objects of this bill in hearings before the committee, Mr. MONDELL said:

Now, briefly, as to the plan and purpose of this bill, it is proposed to secure by purchase, gift, deed, or in some other manner, areas of land from the various States, and in all the various States where such lands are available in sufficient areas, when divided into farms, to form complete and comparatively independent communities. The community settlement idea is at the bottom of this legislation. It is believed that development of communities is essential; that only in that way can we reclaim large areas of land that are now comparatively useless, but contain all the essential elements of fertility when they are made available. I am emphasizing this feature of the matter because that is the very base of this soldiers' settlement bill—the community idea. If the thought on which this bill is based, and on which practically all the bills have been based, as I understand it, is carried out, no developments will be attempted where there is not available a sufficient area of suitable land for a good-sized, comparatively independent community, and the development will be with such reservation for towns and community centers as may be necessary to foster and develop and maintain the community idea.

Evidently the plan and purpose of this bill could not be met or accommodated except by the use of a very large area of land for each project. The hearings show that such areas may be found in several States, namely, those having arid lands, cut-over lands, swamp and marsh lands, or waste lands.

As to just what extent it would be necessary to purchase these large tracts of land from private owners, corporations, or individuals, the hearings do not show. The acquisition of the land for each project after the price and conditions of transfer have been agreed upon by a representative of the governor of the State in which the land is situated, an appraiser designated by the Federal Farm Loan Board, and the Secretary of the Interior; the plans and method of reclamation; the subdivision into farms; and the regulations governing the development of the settlement and the distribution of homes or "farm tracts" among the purchasers; and all expenditures and loans are under the control of the Secretary of the Interior. An approved applicant for the purchase of a farm must make an initial payment of 5 per cent, the remainder to be paid in not exceeding 40 years, with interest on the unpaid portion of the purchase price at the rate of 4 per cent per annum. The time for reclamation of one of these projects according to the hearings would be from two to five years, and the cost of each farm would be on an average of from five to six thousand dollars. Discharged soldiers who are already the owners of farms or rural homes would not be eligible as purchasers of a farm in one of these community settlements.

In my judgment there are many serious objections to the Mondell bill as reported by the committee, chief among which may be stated as follows:

First. It authorizes the purchase from private owners, individuals, or corporations of large tracts of land known as waste or unused lands, and therefore without any or little present value, and the expenditure of large sums of money taken from the United States Treasury for the purchase and reclamation of same without knowing to just what extent the soldiers will be benefited.

Second. It is evident that only a small number of our returning soldiers will ever be willing to abandon their present homes and surroundings to be settled in these Government colonies.

Third. It affords no assistance or encouragement to the soldier who is already the owner of farm land, but on the other hand makes him ineligible to acquire the ownership of one of these farms purchased and reclaimed at the expense of his Government.

Fourth. It deprives the soldier of the right to exercise his own initiative and enterprise in the acquisition, development, management, and improvement of the farm which he is to own and occupy as a home.

Fifth. It deprives the soldier of any immediate Government assistance to acquire a farm if he desires to do so.

Sixth. Even after one of these projects is reclaimed at Government expense, before the soldier can become a purchaser his application must be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and he is therefore deprived of the right of unrestricted choice, and made subject to the dictates of a bureau established in Washington.

I do not believe this plan will meet the approval of either our soldiers and sailors or of the American public, which is so much interested in their welfare.

This bill may have much merit as a reclamation measure, but I have been unable to reach the conclusion that it carries any important or outstanding benefits for our soldiers. The ex-service man is not seeking to become a ward of the Government or to place his new power and efficiency resulting from his war training and experience under the control of some bureau in Washington. He simply wants an opportunity to get started, to get a foothold, and having this he should then be allowed the greatest freedom for the exercise of individual initiative and enterprise. If we are going to give him this opportunity, then why limit and restrict him to Government settlements, Government projects, and Government colonies and deprive him of the right of self-determination.

I have endeavored to solve the problem of farm homes for our returning soldiers by the introduction of H. R. 5395, and very earnestly urged before the Committee on the Public Lands the adoption of the plan therein set forth. The substance of this bill may be stated as follows:

Section 1: The title is "The Soldiers' and Sailors' Farm Settlement Act."

Section 2: Authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury for and on behalf of the United States Government to make loans secured by first mortgage on farm lands to all those who served in our military and naval forces during the war against the German Government, and also to Americans who served in the armies of our associates in this war.

Section 3: The Federal land banks established under the Farm Loan Act are designated as the financial agents of the Government in making these loans, and are granted all necessary and additional powers not given in the Farm Loan Act.

Section 4: All loans are made payable to the Federal land bank of the district in which the land is situated. Each Federal land bank is authorized to select or designate as its agent for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act the secretary-treasurer of any national farm loan association, or such other agents as it may deem necessary, and to charge not exceeding one-half of 1 per cent of the amount loaned for the services rendered by such agent.

Section 5: Provides that loans may be made for the following purposes:

(a) To provide for the purchase of land for agricultural uses.

(b) To provide for the purchase of equipment, live stock, and other things necessary for the operation of the farm.

(c) To provide buildings for the improvement of farm lands either acquired or owned by the soldier.

(d) To pay and discharge debts already existing against the land or improvements to be acquired or already owned by those receiving the benefits of this act.

Section 6: Each loan shall not exceed 100 per cent of the value of the land and the permanent insured improvements. The amount of loans to any one borrower shall not exceed $5,000 nor be less than $100. Interest rate shall not exceed 4 per cent per annum, the loan to run for not exceeding 40 years. Payments falling due for the first two years may be deferred. In the event of the sale of the land to any person not entitled to receive the benefits of this act, the entire amount of the loan may become due and payable within six months, or the purchaser may execute new notes at the same rate of interest now charged under the Farm Loan Act, at the option of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Section 7: Authorizes the appropriation of $50,000,000 a year for the next three years, for the purposes of the act.

In substance this bill provides for a loan to the soldier farmer in the sum of $5,000 for the purchase, improvement, and equipment of farm land, or for the improvement and equipment of such land already owned by him, and up to the value of the land and security offered. It is provided that the payments falling due during the first two years may be deferred; this will give time and opportunity to place the land in productive shape.

It is proposed to utilize the existing machinery of the Farm Loan Board for administrative purposes and thereby avoid the creation of any additional offices or bureaus with their attendant expenses. Hence every dollar appropriated will be available for the benefit of the soldiers and will be used only as required by them upon their own applications.

Under this bill the beneficiaries may purchase and improve farms in the community or locality of their choice and carry out their own plans for the establishment and improvement of the properties which are to be their homes. The loans will not depend upon the securing of funds by the sale of bonds, but the appropriations for this purpose will be made direct.

The number of our returned soldiers who will desire to engage in agricultural pursuits is a very uncertain proposition, and while we hope to attract others to the soil and are offering the same opportunity to all, yet in the very nature of things we all know that the greater percentage of them will be those who were either engaged in farming at the time of their call into the military or naval service and those who had previously lived upon farms and had agricultural experience. Since the armistice was signed my own experience has been that, as a general rule, the soldiers have sought to return to their former employment or occupation. And especially has this been true of the boys who went from the farms. Many strong appeals have been made by fathers who were unable to manage and conduct their farming operations without the assistance of their sons, for whose return they felt free to ask as soon as the war was over. And likewise the boys themselves asked for discharge in order to return to the old homestead and take up where they left off at the country's call to service. In many other cases the soldiers already owned farms and had families. No doubt these farms suffered in the way of loss of equipment and attention during the war. There are many others who have in view the lands they would like to purchase in the communities where they have lived and who are anxious to settle among their neighbors, friends, and relatives. Now, it occurs to me that our hope to advance and develop the agricultural interests of the country and to materially assist the discharged soldiers to become farmers and home owners lies chiefly with this class of the men whom we are so earnestly endeavoring to assist. They have the experience and are already accustomed to rural life and can easily adapt themselves to farming as an occupation with every chance for success, and all that is needed is liberal assistance in the way of credit for the purchase of lands and for improvement and equipment, and this the Nation can afford to give freely, and do it at the present time.

The effect of the war upon American character has been to revive and intensify its original quality, hence the returned soldier is just like any other normal American citizen. He is not seeking charity. His first desire is to become an important independent factor in the community in which he lives, to operate upon his own initiative, to formulate and carry out his own plans for the development of his farm or other business, and he is therefore not seeking to be colonized and is not likely to accept any assistance from the Government, if in order to do so he is required to abandon his home surroundings, the association of his friends and comrades, and go to some distant reservation which is to be developed and controlled by regulations of governmental bureaus, and it will be very much to his credit that he prefers to act upon his own responsibility and work out his destiny by his own methods and in his own way, not restricted and hedged about by governmental supervision of those affairs which make up his daily life and occupation.

Centralized power and control is a condition essential to the successful prosecution of a war, even by a republic. The American citizen readily adjusts himself to this condition when a state of war exists in which his country is involved. But in peace time his normal attitude is antagonistic toward all forms of paternalism. Fortunately for the country, our returning soldiers are bringing into the life of the Nation anew the original spirit of American individualism. I was very much impressed with this fact while talking with a soldier from my own State, who had returned from Europe, about these bills providing farms for soldiers. He had heard of them, and asked for information. I explained to him as best I could the main features of the Lane plan, or Mondell bill; also my own plan set out in the bill I have introduced. He spoke, with some feeling and emphasis, about as follows:

> I propose to be a farmer, but I do not want to work for myself under Government regulation, and do not want to be placed on a Government reservation or be colonized. I own a small tract of farm land and would be glad to have some financial assistance in order to improve it. I had just begun these improvements when the war came on; was called in the first draft, waived all claims for exemption, and was trained and went early to France, and was there fighting in the Argonne when the armistice was signed. The war is over now, and I am going to be discharged, and when I get back to work, unless another war breaks out, I would like for the United States to let me alone for awhile.

I am not sure but what this husky young farmer soldier expressed the feelings and voiced the sentiment of many of the boys who went out and did the fighting and finished the job, and likewise of the American public in general, which is restless for a complete release from war conditions and a shift back to normal life in all industries and all occupations as soon as possible. We can not have this if we continue to make burdensome appropriations calling for more taxes for the extension of the power and authority of the Government bureaus for those activities which in the main should be left to private enterprise.

Another feature of the matter which makes the segregated, independent farm proposition preferable to the reclamation, community settlement measure is that there is to-day an abundance of good agricultural land available without the necessity of spending hundreds of millions of public funds on great areas of waste, swamp, marsh, and cut-over lands in the way of reclamation before they could be converted into farms.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I understand that what is known as the Mondell bill is absolutely dead and sidetracked. So why does the gentleman waste his time in discussing incidentally the features of that measure?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I am not possessed of that information. It may be that it has been sidetracked, but it is still being discussed here.

Mr. BLANTON. It was sidetracked by the Republican steering committee, but I have not heard anything from them. I supposed it had died a natural death.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Well, I hope that is true; unless it could be materially amended or some proper substitute for it adopted. We would be glad to see the owners of these lands reclaim and develop them, and in most instances they are quite able to do so without taxing the rest of the public for that purpose. I do not undertake to speak definitely about other sections of the country, but in my own State there is a vast acreage of good farming land, uncultivated, but highly fertile, and which needs no reclamation. All that is necessary to make good farms is for good farmers to get on the land and develop it. These lands may be had at reasonable prices, and the way can be made easy for our returning soldier to acquire such land, which will always be ample security for the Government.

Let me cite you to an instance just what occurred in south Louisiana near the town of Jeanerette recently. Here two plantations, comprising 1,700 acres in all, were divided into small farm tracts and sold to about 20 farmers, who were practically without capital. This was done through the assistance of the Farm Loan Board on a basis of 50 per cent of the appraised value of the land and 20 per cent of the appraised value of the permanent insured improvements.

It is fair to assume that private enterprise assisted in this transaction, as it often occurs where the land is to be improved, cultivated, and used as a home by the purchaser that the seller is willing to take second mortgage for one-half of the purchase price, but this demonstrates the great value of the Farm Loan System, and how its present machinery may be used to assist farmers in acquiring homes. Now, under the liberal provisions of the bill to aid discharged service men, which I am advocating, these things could be even more easily accomplished, since it provides on their behalf for a loan for the full appraised value of the property which they may desire to purchase or improve.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I am thoroughly convinced that we can best solve the problem of farm homes for our soldiers by enacting legislation of this character, whereby through the agency of the Farm Loan System, already established and in successful operation, the loans may be made to former service men, permitting each soldier, sailor, or marine to make his own selection and exercise his individual choice as to his tract of land and the locality for his home, and to carry out his own plans and methods for improvement and development.

This course will best insure the much-needed increase in production so essential in bringing the cost of living to the proper level, and serve to retain and develop in our citizenship those elements of character and the spirit of independence that must be our safest reliance against the destructive teachings of Bolshevism and the red flag of anarchy. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Under the leave granted to extend these remarks, I am printing herewith a copy of H. R. 5395, to which I have referred:

A bill (H. R. 5395) to provide soldiers, sailors, and marines with capital for agricultural development, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this act shall be cited as "The soldiers' and sailors' farm-settlement act."

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized, in the name and on behalf of the United States Government, to make loans, secured by first mortgage, on farm lands to all persons who have served in the military or naval forces of the United States during the present war against the German Government, and who, at any time subsequent to April 6, 1917, have resigned or been discharged under honorable conditions, or, in the case of reservists, been placed on inactive duty; to all citizens of the United States who served with the military or naval forces of any of the nations allied against the German Government and its allies and have since been discharged under honorable conditions; and to all former citizens of the United States who served with the military or naval forces of any of the nations allied against the German Government and its allies and have since been discharged under honorable conditions and repatriated.

SEC. 3. That the Federal land banks established under the Federal Farm Loan Act approved July 17, 1916, shall be designated as financial agents of the Government of the United States for the purpose of making and collecting farm loans herein provided for. Such agencies are granted all additional powers necessary to administer the present act. These powers shall be exercised, as nearly as practicable, in accord with the provisions under which the Federal Farm Loan Act is administered. All loans made under this act shall be made in the same manner as and subject to all provisions of the above cited act and regulations prescribed thereunder except as herein otherwise specially provided.

SEC. 4. That all loans made under the provisions of this act shall be made payable to the Federal land bank of the district in which the mortgaged land is situated, as financial agent for the United States Government, and the principal and interest shall be payable to the Government at such Federal land bank.

Each Federal land bank, for the purpose of discharging its duties as financial agent of the Government under the provisions of this act, may designate the secretary-treasurer of any national farm loan association, or such other agent as it may deem necessary, to receive applications for loans as herein provided for, such agents to be approved by the Federal Farm Loan Board, to be required to give surety bond in such sum as the Federal Farm Loan Board shall prescribe for the proper handling of all funds, and to be authorized to collect from borrowers a charge not exceeding one-half of 1 per centum of the amount loaned as compensation for receiving the application and performing such services as may be required of them in the closing of loans.

SEC. 5. That such loans may be made for the following purposes and no other:

(a) To provide for the purchase of land for agricultural uses;

(b) To provide for the purchase of equipment, fertilizers, and live stock necessary for the proper and reasonable operation of the mortgaged farm, the term "equipment" to be defined by the Federal Farm Loan Board;

(c) To provide buildings and for the improvement of farm lands, the term "improvement" to be defined by the Federal Farm Loan Board; and

(d) To liquidate all incumbrances constituting a charge upon the land to be mortgaged and all other indebtedness for the owner of the land mortgaged existing at the time of his application for the loan and indebtedness subsequently incurred for purposes mentioned in this section.

SEC. 6. That each loan shall be subject to the following conditions:

First. Each loan may equal but shall not exceed 100 per cent of the value of the land mortgaged and 100 per cent of the permanent insured improvements thereon.

Second. The amount of loans to any one borrower under this act shall not exceed a maximum of $5,000, nor shall any loan be for a less sum than $100.

Third. The interest rate on farm loans made under the provisions of this act shall not exceed 4 per cent per annum on the unpaid principal, from which interest as collected the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to allow the several Federal land banks to retain a sum not exceeding one-half of 1 per cent per annum on the unpaid principal as a charge for administration.

Fourth. The installments for the repayment of any loans made under this act which, through the amortization plan become due during the first two years following the loan, may be deferred in whole or in part to such later date as the Federal land bank of the district shall recommend. No such extension shall be granted until the recommendation therefor has been approved by the Federal Farm Loan Board. Such deferred payments shall continue to bear a rate of interest not in excess of 4 per cent per annum on the unpaid principal.

Fifth. In case of the sale of the mortgaged land to anyone other than a person qualified under section 2 of this act, the mortgage shall, at the option of the Secretary of the Treasury, become within six months thereafter due and payable. The Secretary of the Treasury may, however, upon the recommendation of the Federal land bank of the district, permit the mortgage indebtedness of the vendor to be assumed by the purchaser, but in such cases the purchaser shall be required to execute a new note and mortgage subject to the same rate of interest as that prescribed at the time for persons receiving loans under the Federal farm loan act approved July 17, 1916.

SEC. 7. That for the purposes of this act the sum of $50,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for each of the fiscal years ending June 30, 1920, June 30, 1921, and June 30, 1922. Such sums shall be, under the direction and in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, allotted to the several Federal land banks for the purpose of making loans as herein provided, and at such times and in such amounts as he shall deem expedient and necessary for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this act.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, before I commence I want to ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, because I expect to make one speech and to print another. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MURPHY], on this floor on the 29th ultimo, delivered an unseemly philippic against President Wilson. He took for a text, "Tell the truth."

His speech, however, disclosed that he had but an academic interest in his text, for his remarks were entirely at variance with it. The text served him merely as a vehicle to deliver a tirade against the President of these United States, the treaty of peace, and the league of nations.

There is, however, food for thought in his text, although none whatever is found in his remarks. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

This extraordinary session of Congress, which convened on May 19 last, was called for two purposes—primarily to pass needed appropriation bills killed by the Republican filibuster in the last days of the Sixty-fifth Congress, and to enact legislation to enable the workingmen of this Nation to know whom their employers were to be and under what conditions and at what wage they should toil, and to assure them the necessities of life should be brought within their means.

The body at the other end of the Capitol—the Senate—was more particularly charged with the duty of ratifying the treaty with Germany, so that the world might once again draw its breath in peace.

We at this end of the Capitol so far have failed. The Senate has more signally failed, if, indeed, there be degrees in failure.

After we had been in session for weeks and accomplished nothing an agreement for a recess was had. President Wilson again called the attention of Congress to the necessity of enacting legislation which would reduce the ever-increasing cost of living and reduce the mounting discontent and unrest throughout the country.

This request was made more than a month ago. It has been responded to by talk. Day in and day out we sit here, for the most part engaged in making political speeches that no one reads. No one reads these speeches, because the unrest in this country is industrial, not political. Therefore there is no interest in mere academic discussion of political issues.

"TELL THE TRUTH."

The Republican Party in this House seeks to beguile itself and fool the country by engaging in a pretense of enacting tariff legislation. It passes through this House tariff bills which it knows will never become law. These bills each deal with but a single item. For instance, the first, chemical glass; the second, tungsten ore; the third, buttons—pearl buttons.

There are more than 4,000 items in our tariff schedules. Under this method of passing tariff legislation, item by item, since it requires approximately a day and a half to pass a single bill, it would take more than 6,000 days to revise the tariff laws, or a bit more than 16 years, if a general revision is to be had, and you Republicans say that you intend to revise the tariff. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Is the country, then, to be kept in this unsettled condition while you thus "revise the tariff"?

Are all the demands for remedial legislation to await this political camouflage that goes on here day by day?

Do you hope to deceive the people and induce them to believe their hunger satisfied by reading these Republican speeches on the tariff?

Do you believe all the thousands who ask merely for an opportunity to work at a wage that will provide them and theirs with the necessities of life can be satisfied by these shopworn Republican generalities about protecting the American workingman; that by raising the tariff $2,000 a ton on certain ores a sufficient supply of which it is exceedingly doubtful ever can be produced in this country, or by putting a duty on pearl buttons of 250 to 300 per cent, that the people will think their requirements have been met, their rightful demands granted, and that the opportunity to purchase the necessities of life at a price they are able to pay has been afforded them? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Do you believe the patriotic American citizens, the honest, working, sober-thinking people, are deceived by that clamor that goes up in the Senate pretendedly against the provisions of the treaty of peace and the league of nations?

Do you believe they will forget their real needs and wants and aspirations in watching that sham battle?

They will not, because everyone who has read the treaty of peace and the league of nations knows that the speeches of those in that body and in this against the provisions of the treaty and the league of nations are not against the terms of the treaty or those of the league of nations, but against their author—President Wilson. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. This is such an extraordinarily good speech that I think the gentleman from Arkansas ought to have a quorum. Does he want it?

Mr. CARAWAY. No.

Mr. BLANTON. Then I will withdraw that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas will proceed.

Mr. CARAWAY. "Tell the truth."

Had the same documents been laid before the Senate by a representative of the Republican Party—had the people been so unwise as to have placed that party in power in 1916—we would have found all you and them who now oppose it praising it.

You and they take the desperate chance of destroying the world that a Republican administration may be elected in these United States. Whether you are to win by that gamble is yet to be determined. If you do you will do so at the price Samson paid to avenge himself upon his enemies—by pulling down the temple on your own heads. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

"Tell the truth."

Say you seek to defeat the treaty and the league of nations in order to destroy the influence and prestige of its author, President Wilson; that you are willing to delay its ratification months and months, thereby keeping our soldiers longer in Europe; that you are willing to imperil civilization itself and plunge the world again into war, if you may by that means secure a political victory. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

"Tell the truth."

No cause is worth fighting for unless you can fight for it in the open, truthfully and honestly. A motive that has to be cloaked and disguised is an unworthy motive. A fight that has to be won under false colors is one that ought not to be won, ought not to be waged.

You won a Republican victory last November by misrepresentation and an appeal to sectional prejudice, and now are in control of the legislative branch of this Government. What use have you made of that victory other than to gather the spoils of patronage that goes with it?

Is it wise now to neglect all our country's interests to prepare for another such struggle? The time is more than a year till the next election.

Fulfill your past pledges before you assume new vows.

In God's name lay aside political wrangling in this House long enough to legislate wisely for the people who suffer under the disturbed conditions growing out of the war.

Let us do whatever Congress may to lighten the burden of those who pay the enormous taxes levied.

Let us check and punish the profiteer and bring the necessities of life within the reach of those who consume them.

In speaking of the high cost of living, most people have more immediately in mind the things which they eat. Other things—clothing, implements with which they toil, and many others—enter into this question; but, as I said, most people think only, or primarily, of the things which they eat.

And now is the harvest time of the farmer, who has toiled through the weary months to produce those things which sustain life. It is necessary that he shall receive for these products a price sufficient to reward him for their production. It is equally necessary that the consumer shall receive them at a price he can afford to pay.

To accomplish this legislation is necessary.

The gamblers in futures are now robbing the farmer of the fruits of his toil, and the profiteer is enhancing the price at which the consumer must purchase these products.

I know when one asserts that those who gamble in futures—the products of the farm—despoil the farmer, certain gentlemen here, representing certain interests, question it. To know that gambling in futures does rob the producer—the farmer—one needs but to examine the market reports from day to day. Even those gamblers themselves will admit it, except when they appear before legislative committees.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Just why is it that the gentleman from Arkansas and other gentlemen from other cotton States object so strenuously to gambling in futures when cotton is going down and do not object at all when cotton is going up?

Mr. CARAWAY. Well, inasmuch as "no gentleman" occupies that position, I am not compelled to answer that question.

Mr. MACCRATE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. MACCRATE. Under the provisions of section 13 of the food act, can not the President shut up every such gambling exchange in the country if he wants to?

Mr. CARAWAY. No. If the gentleman will read that act some time he will be able to answer his own question. [Laughter.]

As an illustration, I quote the following, which appeared under a New York date line of July 21:

> A liquidating movement on a large scale, mostly from Wall Street houses, influenced by a break in stocks, caused another violent drop in cotton prices to-day. The selling movement reached its climax in the afternoon, when October dropped to 33.52 and December 33.70, or 80 points.

It is here admitted that Wall Street interests beat down the price of cotton—cotton not then made and not now harvested—$4 a bale, or struck from the price of cotton that is to be harvested this fall in these United States more than $45,000,000 in one day.

Since the opening of this cotton year, these speculators, these gamblers in futures, have beaten down the price of the cotton crop that is yet to be gathered approximately $40 a bale, or $451,200,000, if our crop does not exceed 11,280,000 bales.

Has the consumer profited by this? No. The price of cotton goods has constantly climbed. Between the gambler who thus destroys the price of the product in the hands of the farmer and the profiteer who despoils the consumer, both the producer and the consumer perish.

Both the gambler and the profiteer exist by reason of the action—or, rather, inaction—of this Congress.

As an evidence of the enormous profits that come to those who reap but toil not, who gather but sow not, a seat on the New York Exchange—a mere opportunity to gamble in that which other men's toil has produced—brought, on the 7th of June last, $90,000.

The profiteer likewise has availed himself of his opportunity to plunder the people.

A Member of this House told me that he knew a man who last year, on stock he owned in a cotton mill, received a dividend of 150 per cent; upon an investment of $100,000 he received in one year a dividend of $150,000.

These gamblers and these profiteers both exist, because, as I said, we have been unwilling that they should perish. Congress could, if it would, strike both down. He who eats his bread in the sweat of other men's faces, living by destroying, and he who takes such enormous profits as this man who owns the stock in that cotton mill, prey upon those who produce the raw material, upon the laborer who manufactures it, and upon the consumer who uses it. They should have no protection under our law.

The food hoarder likewise adds to the price of the things people eat and produces nothing but want and misery. Under a Paris date line of September 3, Herbert Hoover, whose name has become a household word throughout the world, said that food gamblers were responsible for the high prices of food in America; that they not only were compelling us to pay extortionate prices for what we eat, but were withholding from the suffering peoples of Europe the supplies shipped them, hoarding these necessities of life—while men, women, and children fought and starved for them—in order that their profits might be enhanced.

Laws should be enacted to prevent these men from taking profit of suffering, want, and misery anywhere, everywhere. There is no reason why the manufacturer who changes the raw material into the finished article should not be compelled to stamp upon the article the price he paid for the raw material, the cost of its manufacture, and the price for which he sells it. If this were done, the consumer who must buy it would know what the profits of the manufacturer and the middleman were. These profits should be fair, but certainly not exorbitant. No one dealing at this time in the necessities of life should be permitted to take a profit—as this cotton-mill man did—of 150 per cent, nor a tenth part of that.

Efforts to enact legislation to curb these evils seem to be decried in this Congress. It is said to be an unwarranted invasion of private business.

Private business is entitled to protection so far only as it is honest business. If it is honest and fair in its dealings, it has no objection to publicity. If it is dishonest and unfair, it has no right to be shielded.

The world to-day is not the world that was. A new era has come. Whether it will be a better or a worse world depends on whether we meet these new conditions with a spirit of fairness and sanity. If old privileges are sought to be enjoyed still under these new conditions, disaster confronts us all.

It is necessary for big business and little business—for all of us—to realize there is a kinship between those who toil and those who direct, those who produce and those who consume. Each is accountable to the other; each has a right to demand of the other fair treatment.

The farmer who tills the field and the laborer who stands at the forge each now apparently receives more for the products of his toil, though in reality neither is as well paid as under previous conditions.

Enormous profits are taken. But these profits are taken by the gambler and the profiteer—the men who produce not, yet take profit of everybody's industry and add nothing to the wealth of the world.

Recently, in one day, the packers in Chicago beat down the price paid the stock raisers for hogs and cattle $1.50 a hundred pounds. Since then a further fall in these prices has been registered. No corresponding decline has been seen in the markets where consumers buy. This drop of $1.50 at one time, and other declines since, has been absorbed by some one between the stock grower who lost this decline and the consumer who bought the finished product.

Legislation should be enacted to disclose who was the beneficiary of this decline.

It could be done. It should be done. It will be done. If we refuse, others will sit in our seats who will respond to this just demand. There is a jail for the profiteer. If we refuse to incarcerate him, others will be found who will.

Tell the truth.

It has been tried, and tried sufficiently to demonstrate beyond cavil, that so-called fair-price fixing by committees will not secure the result aimed at.

I have been grieved each time a so-called fair-price-fixing committee has been appointed here in the District of Columbia to observe that as soon as it organizes and issues its fair-price list the price rises on every necessity of life. I do not speak of luxuries, but of meat, bread, sugar, and those other things everyone must buy.

For illustration, sugar was selling in the District of Columbia recently at ten and ten and a half cents a pound. Then a fair-price committee was organized and issued its fair-price list—sugar was eleven cents a pound and other things were in proportion.

The expediency, therefore, of attempting to fix prices and thus restrict profits and bring the necessities of life within the reach of the people has failed. These committees, in many instances, it must be confessed, have been composed of those who were partly or wholly in sympathy with the profiteers. But I doubt if otherwise constituted, relief would have been obtained.

It is apparent then that nothing but legislation—new legislation—can bring the people the relief they are entitled to receive. This legislation must come from Congress, and Congress seems unwilling to enact it.

Again the text: "Tell the truth."

Tell the country these so-called tariff revisions that occupy the major part of the time of this House are not tariff revisions in reality. These bills are not expected to be enacted into law. They are simply bait cast upon the political waters in the hope of again deceiving the people and bringing another Republican victory.

Tell the people the truth: That the attack upon the treaty of peace and the league of nations is not an attack upon the treaty of peace and the league of nations as such, but a political attack upon its author, President Wilson, and the party to which he belongs.

Tell the people the truth: That this Republican Congress is not trying to solve the industrial problems that confront the people, but is prolonging the unrest that now so profoundly disturbs the peace of this Nation and threatens its very existence, that political advantage may be coined out of this unrest.

Tell the people the truth: That until they cease to be moved by these denunciations of political opponents, the waving of bloody shirts, the false pretense that the protection of American industries protects American labor, and thereby are induced to vote for men and measures regardless of their real merit—that no Congress so elected will answer their cry of anguish in hours such as these.

Tell the truth.

Especially tell the returned soldiers the truth: That this Republican Congress promises to do nothing to provide them with homes; that the so-called Mondell bill, which was fathered by the Republican Party, not as a legislative program but as a bid for the soldier vote, is not to be enacted into law; that the Republican party never expects it shall be considered on the floor of this House; that if enacted into law in its present form it is but a cheat and a sham. Tell them that the proponents, even, of the measure cite as its chief merit that it has been made so unattractive that not exceeding 2 per cent of the soldiers will take advantage of its provisions; that those who shall do so, and wade through all the meshes of its red tape and make all the sacrifices demanded by it, will be compelled to work longer to secure a farm home under its provisions than Jacob toiled for the hand of Rachel. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Tell the soldier the truth; tell him that this bill has been framed to meet the demands of those who want the waste places of the earth reclaimed at the expense of the blood and the toil and the blasted hopes of the soldier.

Tell him that its chief advocates are found among those who took the soldier's place in the factories and mines in the Northeast, at $5, $10, and even $15 per day, when the soldier went to war with a promise that he should have his old place back again when he should return; that they are now unwilling to surrender those places and wish these soldiers, who fought and dared that liberty might live, to go into the deserts and the swamps, and there—if perchance they may—find homes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. There is one question that I would like the gentleman to answer for the benefit of the country. If the apparent popularity and indorsement of the President of the United States is not real, as the distinguished Republican campaign chairman [Mr. FESS] would have us believe this morning, why is it that he is so apprehensive about it and so concerned with it?

Mr. CARAWAY. Well, I think the question answers itself. If the gentleman from Ohio, who is referred to by the gentleman from Texas, did not realize that the President was impressing the country, he would not take the time of this House to denounce the President. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Tell the soldier the truth: That the Mondell bill offers, in its present form, but a pretense of a reward for the sacrifices he made, for the time he gave his country, for the opportunities he lost, for his dreams that are vanished and his hopes that are dead.

Tell him that when he asks for bread he shall be given a stone.

Tell him the truth; tell him this; or else put this bill on its passage and permit amendments to be adopted that will give him a real opportunity to own the fields he tills, the roof that shelters him and his, and that will provide this home for him where he himself shall choose to have it be.

Tell the soldier the truth; tell all the people the truth: That legislation to relieve the sufferings of the oppressed, to lighten the burden of those who toil, to reward those who fought is not to be had at the hands of this Congress.

Tell them the truth, and tell them this, or cease your political wrangles, your political camouflage, and enact legislation that will reduce the cost of living, that will destroy the gambler, that will imprison the profiteer, that will reward honest labor, and that will not compensate, for nothing could do that, but will in the main keep faith with the soldier.

In conclusion, then, Tell the truth.

That unless this Congress keeps all its pledges and sustains the hopes of those who live beneath and love our flag it will become a byword and a scoff.

Will we do this?

Our action must be our answer. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I yield back the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed all of his time. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] is recognized.

Mr. PLATT. Has the gentleman from Arkansas used all his time?

The CHAIRMAN. He has 11 minutes remaining.

Mr. WINGO. I doubt if we will use any more. The gentleman from New York can go ahead.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACCRATE].

Mr. MACCRATE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] a few moments ago expressed a doubt as to the information I had concerning section 13 of the food-control act. For his information I will read it. Section 13 provides:

SEC. 13. That whenever the President finds it essential in order to prevent undue enhancement, depression, or fluctuation of prices of, or in order to prevent injurious speculation in, or in order to prevent unjust market manipulation or unfair and misleading market quotations of the prices of necessaries, hereafter in this section called evil practices, he is authorized to prescribe such regulations governing, or may either wholly or partly prohibit, operations, practices, and transactions at, on, in, or under the rules of any exchange, board of trade, or similar institution or place of business as he may find essential in order to prevent, correct, or remove such evil practices.

If there are evil practices on stock exchanges or grain exchanges to-day, let the President of the United States close them, as he has the right to do under this law. [Applause.]

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York yields to the gentleman from Pennsylvania eight minutes.

Mr. WINGO. I yield to the gentleman seven minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, a number of Members of the House have been making inquiries of the chairman and members of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries as to what we have been doing in the way of legislation to keep our ships upon the seas. I have prepared a short statement of the work of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, which I hope will answer these questions. Then, if I have any time, I shall be glad to answer any questions which any Member wishes to propound.

On June 6, 1919, the House of Representatives passed a resolution giving to its Merchant Marine Committee full and ample powers to investigate and prepare such legislation as may be found advantageous in helping to keep our greatly enlarged merchant marine upon the high seas. And I thought that the Members of the House would like to be informed as to what the committee has in contemplation to accomplish the purpose of the House in giving to it the powers conferred by the resolution.

It must be understood that there was no purpose proposed by the promoters of this resolution to in any way investigate the past operations of the Shipping Board only so far as would be necessary for them to familiarize themselves with the workings of the board and to secure from that investigation such information as could be of use in accomplishing the reconstruction work.

Since the passage of the resolution the committee has been diligently at work, both as a whole and through its subcommittees, securing, as far as possible in the time used, much valuable and interesting data, which has now placed it in a position to have a fair idea of the problem and of the many necessary branches in which some helpful legislation can be framed.

The committee itself has had hearings covering two or three weeks into the present workings of the divisions of the Shipping Board having to do directly with the operations of ships. Included in these were the division of operations, the division of port and harbor facilities, the division of planning and statistics, and the manning of vessels. These hearings are now being printed and will no doubt make instructive reading for those who are interested. The division of operations has, during the last six months, under the management of Mr. John H. Rosseter, rapidly assumed, in my opinion, and I believe that of most of my colleagues, good shape. From the inquiry we made through the present department of its past performance, I am very doubtful if anything like its present condition could be shown. Of course, up until January 1 war conditions prevailed, and the constant interruption of the commercial work by the necessities of the War and Navy Departments must have led to considerable confusion and loss. However, as the most important work of the committee now is in the future, the past can wait until we have more time to look into its deficiencies.

The subcommittees have been holding hearings upon many varied subjects, including marine insurance, revision of the navigation laws, load-line legislation, necessity of an American registry bureau, manning of vessels, and will in due time report their results, with, we hope, such success as will make and keep the American flag flying on our merchant vessels in every quarter of the globe.

It must be understood by the House that there are many questions vital in accomplishing this purpose that are not now, nor will they for some few months become, pressing. Shipping to-day is profitable owing to the great demand for vessels from all the nations that have been deprived of their normal supplies during the war period. When this demand has been filled and the business returns to normal, undoubtedly, with the enormous increase in tonnage, such competitive measures as have in the past been in vogue will again become actively in force; and then will come our vital test, such a test of our ability that it will take the best thought of all concerned in the business and of Congress to keep our ships upon the high seas. We have made some gains, however, through the war in that we can now build ships as cheaply, if not more cheaply, than the other nations. The wages of the white sailors of all nations are more nearly equal now than ever in our history.

And we have trained up a large body of men who know the life, and are interested in it, and would like to see it maintained.

When I stated there was no haste for legislation along certain lines owing to the necessity of securing details which will not become in any way reliable until shipping is operated upon a more settled basis, I did not mean that there was no work the committee could do at the present time. I did mean that legislation that would depend upon settled conditions would have to be studied over, and the outlines of general policies and plans decided upon. To all of this the committee is giving close attention, and all legislation that will be useful and can be concluded now will be suggested as rapidly as possible for your consideration.

It is very probable the first legislation proposed by the committee will have to do with the sale of ships, the most important question the committee has to deal with at the present time.

In 1914 the United Kingdom and its colonies owned about 43 per cent of the world's carrying capacity, and of our imports and exports overseas we carried 9.7 per cent. In the same year we had 755 sea-going merchant ships with a gross tonnage of 2,128,731 tons; on June 30, 1919, our fleet had increased to 2,058 vessels of 7,300,022 gross tons, an increase of 200 per cent; and when the building program of the Shipping Board is completed in 1921 the Government itself, outside of private owners, will own a merchant fleet of 2,439 vessels of 13,898,106 dead-weight tons, less such vessels and tonnage the building of which may be canceled after April 30 of this year, and sales to private parties, shipping losses. This increase of tonnage by the Government in itself will nearly double the tonnage of our merchant fleet.

The problem before the committee is to arrange in some manner to make an investment in shipping as attractive as a mortgage would be upon real estate. At present this is not so on account of the superior position that liens and other liabilities have over bonds or mortgages against the ship. This prevents investment in ships' bonds and is greatly to the detriment of the operator of a small number of ships whose welfare should be our first thought. If we do not make investment in shipping attractive, the business would gravitate into the hands of a few large corporations who are able to float bond issues on their corporate whole, on account of their size and ability to meet the liabilities. The large number of vessels under their control would not be subject to the high percentage of loss a smaller concern would have.

There is more necessity for quick action in connection with the sale of ships than any other matter before the committee. Voicing my own diagnosis, it is very probable that from 50,000,000 to 55,000,000 gross tons of shipping will be all that will be required in the carrying trade of the world after the transport and other extra services occasioned by the war are completed. Shipbuilding is rapidly approaching this tonnage, as on June 30 of this year, according to Lloyds, there were under construction in the shipyards of the world 2,526 merchant vessels of 8,017,767 gross tons.

Personally I do not believe it is the intention of Congress to encourage Government ownership and operation of our vessels, and the present appears to me to be the time to dispose of them to American shippers. When we consider this question we must arrive at a conclusion which I wish to present to the House; that is, in order to sell and place into operation with American shippers any large number of the vessels of this enormous fleet, the present policy of the Shipping Board of endeavoring to secure a price of about cost or of from $200 to $225 a dead-weight ton is not going to be successful. The reason for this is apparent. The Government should sell these ships at a price, made after due consideration and investigation as to the availability of the ships for the various enterprises, reasonable enough to allow such a depreciation that when times return to normal, which will be in the near future, the purchaser will not be burdened with unusual capital charges in competing with his foreign competitors. It will be far more advantageous to both the Government and the shipper if we take our loss now and avoid a much greater loss at a later date.

Mr. KINKAID. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. KINKAID. Will it be possible for the ships to be sold for a price equal to what they cost?

Mr. EDMONDS. Some few ships have been sold.

Mr. KINKAID. At what price? At cost?

Mr. EDMONDS. They claim in some cases at above cost.

Mr. KINKAID. Was that before the war ended or since?

Mr. EDMONDS. No; several within the last two months.

Mr. KINKAID. There must have been a very great demand.

Mr. EDMONDS. Probably so.

This brings before us the question as to what action the President and the Shipping Board will take in order to make such a price as will encourage shippers to buy. It must be realized that the board certainly will endeavor to hold the ships at as high a price as possible and it is in their power to do so. They may refuse to sell the ships below the average cost of building, and, in my opinion and in the opinion of many of my colleagues on the committee, this can only result in Government ownership and operation. With that in view I introduced a resolution, which I hope the committee will favorably report, authorizing a commission composed of three members of the House Merchant Marine Committee, three members of the Senate Commerce Committee, and three members appointed by the Shipping Board to have charge of the sale of the Government-owned vessels and to approve of the terms of contracts of sale. This will remove the criticism which it is evident is feared by the department; and although it places the responsibility of accepting the great losses that must occur upon Congress, personally I feel that it would be far better to accept the responsibility than it would be to accept the responsibility of encouraging by nonaction the inevitable Government ownership and operation which will occur, with all the contingent troubles and losses which Government ownership results in.

The subcommittee, under its efficient chairman, Mr. LEHLBACH, has been making a complete and exhaustive investigation of marine insurance. Some of the apparent results of this investigation will be rather startling.

With the enormous capital invested in insurance companies it is surprising that so few companies have entered into marine business. Last year over $70,000,000,000 worth of policies were written in this country, exclusive of the insurance carried by the Government. Surely a business of this size must be attractive to American capital, and from the results of the experiment of the Shipping Board in carrying its own insurance upon its owned hulls it must be highly profitable. The investigation being made has not as yet secured all the returns desired, but it will show it is estimated that less than one-third of this business is written by American companies, the large sums of money paid in premiums being mostly turned over to foreign companies.

I will say that in 1916 the sum of $160,000,000 was sent to Europe in the form of premiums on fire insurance policies.

Mr. EMERSON. Is it possible for the gentleman's committee to assist in the establishment of an institution in this country similar to the Lloyds?

Mr. EDMONDS. Unfortunately, I do not believe it is, on account of the fact that we have so many different State laws. There have been concerns established in this country something on the order of the Lloyds, but they have generally turned back into regular companies after a short time.

It is the opinion of the subcommittee, of which I am a member, that our American companies could fairly be charged with lack of enterprise if such a condition were to continue to exist after the matter is brought to their attention, which will be done in the most complete report on marine insurance, now being compiled by the committee. In connection with this hearing, we were informed by the Director of the War Risk Insurance Bureau that that bureau had virtually retired from the marine insurance business, both as to sailors' liability and cargo; their force has been depleted and only sufficient employees are retained to close up the outstanding business.

Mr. KINKAID. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. KINKAID. Are the sales to be restricted to American purchasers?

Mr. EDMONDS. Under the emergency shipping law the President can sell to foreign buyers. Under the shipping act the sales are restricted to American purchasers, without the consent of the Shipping Board.

The subcommittee of navigation, under the chairmanship of Mr. ROWE, will within a short time present a bill having to deal with the manning of vessels and some other modifications of the navigation laws found advantageous and necessary during the speeding up of shipping, caused by its great expansion.

The subcommittee of registry, under Mr. SCOTT, has under consideration at the present time the necessity of load-line legislation, and will probably report at an early date.

Of course, these particular subjects are not all that are being considered by either the main committee or the subcommittees; there are a thousand and one different and some very vital propositions that necessarily will have careful consideration.

Almost any legislation proposed by the committee will find many and very active opponents. Under the operation of our present laws, which have virtually never been brought up to meet modern conditions, there has grown up a large body of men connected with the business who now will most strenuously object to anything new being tried or even to a revision of these laws.

The answer is so apparent that I hesitate to mention it. For 70 years under the operation of these laws the merchant marine of our country has steadily declined until we carried in our own bottoms less than 10 per cent of our trade. When a business is such a failure, certainly any new management would not look to revive it upon the past performance with favor, but would cut and hew to the bone and endeavor to, by new methods, make success.

This we must do, and no matter how it may hurt, if we are to accomplish our object we must steadily progress upon the lines of advanced legislation, trusting that our shipping and shipbuilding people will realize that it will be our endeavor to keep the ships upon the sea, ready to meet the competition of all comers, and in so doing to eventually benefit all in the business. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a letter from the Shipping Board showing the present conditions of shipbuilding.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The document referred to is as follows:

SHIPPING FACTS.
(Second edition.)

SALIENT FEATURES IN ACTIVITIES OF THE UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD FROM SEPTEMBER, 1918, TO SEPTEMBER, 1919.

On August 29, 1919, the total seagoing ship tonnage under control of the United States Shipping Board was as follows:

Built by the United States Shipping Board.

	Number of vessels.	Tonnage.
		Gross.	Dead-weight.
Steel	777	3,511,918	5,267,983
Wood	315	728,079	1,100,218
Composite	15	35,000	52,500
Seized from—
Germany	94	567,490	601,003
Austria	1	8,312	6,500
Purchased from—
Japan	15	85,880	128,820
Austria	5	30,521	29,506
Requisitioned from private owners	58	346,580	519,870
Total	1,280	5,313,780	7,706,400

The foregoing tabulation does not include 122 steel ships of 465,745 (dead-weight) tons and 63 wood ships of 246,982 (dead-weight) tons sold recently to private owners by the United States Shipping Board nor seized foreign vessels that had been sunk.

America's rapid advance from an inconsequential place among the maritime nations to the post of leadership in shipbuilding was not only phenomenal but is a fair augury for the permanence of its new merchant marine built under the stress of war. At the outbreak of the world struggle merchant marine construction had almost become a lost art in this country. To-day this nation has more ship workers, more shipyards, more shipways, more vessels under construction, and is turning them out more rapidly and in greater numbers than now issue from all the shipyards of all the world.

As the premier shipbuilding nation of the world America attained her place in one giant stride. Up to the outbreak of the war we had only 15 vessels of 1,000 tons and over engaged in oversea trade. To-day the American flag floats from 1,280 ocean-going steamships, 1,107 of which had been built by the United States Shipping Board within the last two years.

In June, 1914, the total gross tonnage under the American flag, including coastwise shipping and the fleet operating on the Great Lakes, was 4,287,000 tons.

In June, 1919, its gross tonnage was 11,983,000, an increase of 278 per cent, chiefly in ocean-going steamships.

The steam tonnage under the American flag is now 24.8 per cent of the steam tonnage of the world. The figures are shown in the following tables.

The world steam tonnage of 100 gross tons and over on June 30, 1919, as reported by Lloyds, was:

Number of vessels.	Tonnage.
	Gross.	Dead-weight.
24,385	47,897,000	71,845,500

American steam tonnage of 100 gross tons and over on June 30, 1919, including tonnage on Great Lakes, was:

Number of vessels.	Tonnage.
	Gross.	Dead-weight.
3,687	11,983,600	17,974,500

Per cent of world steam tonnage of 100 gross tons and over under United States flag June 30, 1919:

Per cent of number	15.1
Per cent of tonnage	24.8

The above percentage figures include tonnage on the Great Lakes.

In the four years preceding the war the shipyards of this country turned out a total of 107 seagoing vessels (of 1,500 tons and over, chiefly coastwise). This construction represented 805,037 dead-weight tons.

During 1918, a period when the Shipping Board was getting into its stride, there were launched from the yards under its control a total of 4,216,656 dead-weight tons, five times more than had been built in the four prewar years. During the year 1918 shipyards under control of the Shipping Board delivered 3,107,093 dead-weight tons of completed ships.

From January 1, 1919, to August 29, 1919, 3,983,135 dead-weight tons of shipping have been launched and 3,845,140 dead-weight tons delivered, a total for the 20 months (since the beginning of 1918) of 8,199,791 tons launched and 6,952,233 delivered.

The original construction program contemplated the building in this country of 17,807,071 dead-weight tons of shipping—2,105 steel steamships of 14,351,971 dead-weight tons, 1,017 wood steamships of 2,978,100 dead-weight tons, 50 composite ships of 175,000 dead-weight tons, and 43 concrete ships of 302,000 dead-weight tons, a total of 3,215 ships.

Of this program there have been—

Delivered (inclusive of 1917, 1918, 1919).

LAUNCHINGS.

In shipbuilding annals the month of July, 1918, was made notable by the record established that month in the launching of 124 steamships representing 635,800 tons (dead-weight). That record was exceeded in May of this year when 141 steamships, aggregating 723,958 tons (dead-weight), were launched.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. RICKETTS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 6810) to prohibit intoxicating beverages, and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. STERLING, Mr. NELSON, and Mr. OVERMAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

FEDERAL FARM-LOAN ACT.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill be read for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That section 12 of said act be amended by striking out in the second provision the words "additional payments in sums of $25, or any multiple thereof for the reductions of the principals, or the payment of the entire principal, may be made on any regular installment date," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "the mortgagor may, upon any regular installment date, make in advance any number of payments or any portion thereof on account of the principal of his loan as provided by his contract or pay the entire principal of such loan," so that the provision as amended will read:

"Every such mortgage shall contain an agreement providing for the repayment of the loan on an amortization plan by means of a fixed number of annual or semiannual installments sufficient to cover, first, a charge on the loan at a rate not exceeding the interest rate in the last series of farm-loan bonds issued by the land bank making the loan; second, a charge for administration and profits at a rate not exceeding 1 per cent per annum on the unpaid principal, said two rates combined constituting the interest rate on the mortgage; and, third, such amounts to be applied on the principal as will extinguish the debt within an agreed period, not less than 5 years nor more than 40 years: Provided, That after five years from the date upon which a loan is made the mortgagor may, upon any regular installment date, make, in advance, any number of payments or any portion thereof on account of the principal of his loan as provided by his contract or pay the entire principal of such loan, under the rules and regulations of the Federal Farm Loan Board: And provided further, That before the first issues of farm-loan bonds by any land bank the interest rate on mortgages may be determined in the discretion of said land bank, subject to the provisions and limitations of this act."

And that the fourth provision in said section be amended by striking out in subdivision (d) all after the word "mortgaged" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "contracted for any of the purposes enumerated in one of the subdivisions (a), (b), and (c) above," so that the provision as amended will read:

"Fourth. Such loans may be made for the following purposes and for no other.

"(a) To provide for the purchase of land for agricultural uses.

"(b) To provide for the purchase of equipment, fertilizers, and live stock necessary for the proper and reasonable operation of the mortgaged farm; the term 'equipment' to be defined by the Federal Farm Loan Board.

"(c) To provide buildings and for the improvement of farm lands; the term 'improvement' to be defined by the Federal Farm Loan Board.

"(d) To liquidate indebtedness of the owner of the land mortgaged contracted for any of the purposes enumerated in one of the subdivisions (a), (b), and (c) above."

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment. Page 7, after the third line add a new subdivision (e), as follows:

"(e) To liquidate mortgage indebtedness existing at the time of the organization of the first farm-loan association established in and for the county in which the land is situated."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 32, noes 0.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, on page 5, line 1, I ask to make two typographical corrections. I move to amend the bill by striking out the letter "s" from the word "reductions" and the letter "s" from the word "principals."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PLATT: Page 5, line 1, strike out the "s" from the words "reductions" and "principals."

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman propose to strike out the "s" from both words?

Mr. PLATT. Yes. Both are typographical errors.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman ought to get all the Democrats to stand up.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, there is a good big bunch over here.

Mr. DOWELL. I can count three.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes 1.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska: After subdivision (e), page 7, insert the following:

"And that the seventh provision in said section be amended by striking out the figures '$10,000' and inserting in lieu thereof the figures '$25,000.'"

So that the provision as amended will read:

The amount of loans to any one borrower shall in no case exceed a maximum of $25,000, nor shall any loan be for a less sum than $100.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose this amendment, and I would like to have time either from the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill or the presiding Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman proposing the amendment has five minutes in which to discuss it.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the farm-loan act was originally designed for the benefit of the farmers, not large landowners worth three or four million dollars who incidentally may have some acres in farms on their holdings, yet who would like from time to time to come in under this act and get big loans from the Government at a low rate of interest and on the time prescribed under this act. This is an attempt to infringe upon this act and to extend its provisions not on behalf of the farmers——

Mr. TINCHER. Is the gentleman making a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. BLANTON. I did not understand the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. TINCHER. Is the gentleman arguing the point of order?

Mr. BLANTON. I was arguing the point of order. In brief, Mr. Chairman, the amendment is not germane to the purpose either of the original farm-loan act nor to the purposes of this bill amending that act. It is seeking to extend this right to an entirely different class of citizens of the land—citizens who do not need it.

Mr. WINGO. Oh, Mr. Chairman, while I am opposed to this amendment, there is no question that the proposed amendment is in order. It proposes to change the figures of the original act. This bill proposes amendments to several sections of the act, and, although I am opposed to the amendment, I desire to say, to save time, I do not think there is any question but that it is germane.

The CHAIRMAN. It is clear to the Chair that the gentleman from Arkansas has stated the effect of this amendment; and, if that be correct, the amendment is certainly in order, and the Chair overrules the point of order. The gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, in one sense I regret to be constrained to offer this amendment, in view of the fact that several members of the Committee on Banking and Currency have expressed themselves as being opposed to it. However, it seems to me, based on the very purposes of the act itself, namely, to help the farmers, and based on the volume of letters and petitions that have been coming in from the great agricultural States where the bulk of the products of this country are grown, that in simple justice to the farmers the maximum amount of $10,000 should be increased so as to accommodate those who need to take advantage of the provisions of the act.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the facts are these: That in the great producing sections of this country the farms average in size from 200 acres up—I think, to be correct, it is about 237 acres to the farm—and the average price of land in the corn belt is $200 an acre. This $10,000 maximum is such that it can only accommodate the man with an 80-acre farm in that part of the country. In some sections of the United States the $10,000 maximum is all right, but we want to provide that in those sections of the country where a man who may be just as poor proportionately on 160 or 320 acres as the man is on 80 acres can be properly taken care of. It is just as essential that the man on the large farm be privileged to pay off the higher-rate mortgage he is now carrying and have funds to tile and improve and stock his farm as it is to accommodate the smaller landholder. The agitation on the subject of the high cost of living is so critical that we must give the farmer every possible encouragement in his efforts toward increased production. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have not the time under the five-minute rule, but had I the time I could give instance after instance that has come to my attention where men are unable to finance their farms on the maximum allowance of $10,000. In such cases they are forbidden to take advantage of this act and are compelled to go out and borrow at a higher rate of interest from private concerns and renew their mortgage every five years, paying a liberal commission on the loan every time it is renewed. It is these higher-rate loans that are proving a burden to these farmers and will cause many of them to give up the battle if they do not get relief. If we really propose to adopt something which will be of advantage to the producer, we need to increase this maximum to $25,000. The argument will be used, Mr. Chairman, that the Government is loaning its money to these men in order to accommodate the poor man. That is not the case at all. These farmers are loaning this money to themselves. The Federal farm-loan bank is not a benevolent institution at all, but it is a business proposition. Under this small maximum the farmers out in Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, the Dakotas, and these other great corn-producing States where the farms are from 160 to 320 acres or more, get absolutely no benefit whatever from this act.

The act as it now stands accommodates only the 80-acre man, and it is a well-known fact that in the real producing parts of the country an 80-acre farm is such an exception that it is almost a curiosity; so when we ask for this increase to $25,000 we are asking only for that which will serve the purposes for which the act was originally intended.

If the House does not see fit to adopt my amendment at this time, I sincerely hope that when the chairman of the Banking Committee brings out his separate bill providing for a larger maximum, which he assures me he will do, that favorable action may be had. For the consideration of Members of the House I wish to print in connection with my remarks a letter that I received from D. P. Hogan, president of the Federal Farm Land Bank of Omaha, together with a concrete case illustrating the handicap of an Iowa farmer occasioned by this inadequate $10,000 maximum. I commend this letter to the serious attention of the Members of the House:

THE FEDERAL LAND BANK OF OMAHA,
Omaha, Nebr., July 19, 1919.

Hon. M. O. McLAUGHLIN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR Mr. McLAUGHLIN: The Federal Farm Loan Board has in its two annual reports recommended an amendment to the Federal farm-loan act, providing for an increase in the maximum loan limit to one borrower from $10,000 to $25,000. The need of such an increase is, I am sure, apparent to you. You are familiar with farming conditions throughout our district, composed of Iowa, South Dakota, Nebraska, and Wyoming.

In order to give a practical example of the necessity for this increased loan limit I have in the inclosed typewritten pages written the true story of a friend of mine, whom I have called William Collins, which is typical of thousands of other farmers in Iowa, Nebraska, and South Dakota.

While this sketch describes a corn-belt farmer, our investigations show that in order to carry on a reasonably profitable ranch or mixed farming proposition in western or northwestern Nebraska a large amount of capital is required also.

I think many people are of the opinion that because corn-belt lands are selling at high prices, most if not all corn-belt farmers are rich. You and I know that most farmers are struggling hard to pay for the farms upon which they live.

I wish you would give this article careful consideration, and after you have read it write and tell me what you think of it. I think the present law works a rank injustice in obliging men like Mr. Collins to pay this $2,026.31 into the pockets of stockholders of joint-stock land banks, instead of being allowed to make their loans through the Federal Land Bank of Omaha.

I think some Congressmen fail to distinguish between Federal land banks, which return all profits to borrowers and furnish borrowers with loans at actual cost, and joint-stock land banks, in which all profits are paid to outside stockholders.

Hoping you will give this matter consideration and help to secure an amendment providing for an increase in the loan limit to at least $25,000, I remain, Yours, very truly, D. P. HOGAN, President.

WILLIAM COLLINS, A FARMER OF ADAIR COUNTY, IOWA, WISHES INFORMATION—HE CAN NOT UNDERSTAND WHY HE IS NOT ALLOWED TO SAVE $2,026.31 BY MAKING HIS LOAN THROUGH THE FARMERS' BANK—THE FEDERAL LAND BANK OF OMAHA.

[By D. P. Hogan, president of the Federal Land Bank of Omaha.]

Mr. William Collins is a farmer living in Adair County, Iowa. I knew him 20 years ago as a farm hand, and he attracted my attention on account of his honesty and industry. He was not yet 21 years of age at that time, but had saved enough from his wages to buy a team and a set of harness. I loaned him enough to buy another span of horses, some farm machinery, a little start in brood sows, a couple of cows, seed corn, horse feed, and some household furniture and asked the merchant to give him credit for such groceries and work clothes as he would need until he grew a crop.

He set to work with right good will. His sister kept house for him and he had splendid prospects for a good crop, when on the 25th day of July his entire crop was utterly destroyed by a hailstorm that devastated that locality. He had just cut a couple of rounds of his oat crop. The rest along with the growing corn and hay was beaten into the ground.

The next day he came to town thoroughly discouraged; told me he was worse off than nothing, that his property would not bring what he owed, but that he would turn everything over to me to pay as far as it would go and then go to work again as a farm hand and earn enough to pay the balance.

I told him to brace up, go back to the farm, make the best of it, keep his stuff, and prepare for another year. I loaned him enough more money to purchase several young cows and their milk paid for his living for another year.

The next year was a good one, prices were good and he got on his feet again. The teacher of the nearest school boarded with him and his sister. Before another year he and the school teacher were married. They were both thrifty, industrious, and economical. They worked hard and saved every dollar possible, doing without everything except the barest necessities, but they were happy and cheerful, taking pleasure in their work, in their growing children, and in watching the growth of the fund they were saving to purchase a farm home of their own.

William went to the fields early and worked late, cheered on by his helpful wife, who had most of the chores done when he returned from the fields in the evening and helped him milk the cows when the flies ceased to pester them after supper. She was also fond of chickens and raised several hundred every year, and in that way added to the fund with which to buy their farm.

After several years they managed to accumulate sufficient money to make a payment on 160 acres of land, the seller of the land taking a mortgage back for about three-fourths of the purchase price. They continued to work hard and live very modestly, not even buying a Ford until two years ago, though many of their neighbors had cars, and a car would have been a great convenience to them to drive to town in the evenings after work, go to church, visit the neighbors occasionally and their home folks, who lived 20 miles away.

It was necessary to spend considerable money draining the farm, and they were anxious to reduce the mortgage, so they did without many things they wished. They now have a family of four boys and two girls, the two oldest boys being old enough to work in the fields and each do almost a man's work during the farming season. The other two boys will soon be able to work on the farm.

Mr. Collins desires to keep his family with him, and when the children are old enough to provide farms for them. Even now there is hardly enough work for himself and two boys on the 160-acre farm. Unless he buys more land he realizes that the boys will soon leave home and seek employment either as farm hands or otherwise.

A farm of 80 acres, adjoining his 160 is for sale at $200 per acres. He thinks the price is high, but it is close by, is a good farm, and is worth more to him than land farther away. He thinks he will never be able to buy it any cheaper.

He has made inquiries to see if he could secure the necessary $16,000 with which to purchase the farm. Still having $4,000 remaining unpaid on the original 160 acres, he would require $20,000 on the 240 acres. Upon inquiry of the nearest secretary-treasurer of a National Farm Loan Association, he was told that the law limits loans to not more than $10,000 to one borrower, and for that reason he could not be accommodated by the Federal land bank of Omaha.

He made inquiries elsewhere and found the best he could do was a loan of $20,000 on the amortization plan at 6 per cent per annum, from a joint-stock land bank, operating under the Federal Farm Loan System, or a loan from another institution engaged in the farm-loan business at 6 per cent per annum with an added commission. Joint-stock land banks are allowed to loan any amount to any person for any purpose, while Federal land banks may only loan to actual farmers operating the land and are limited to $10,000 to one borrower.

Before deciding upon what was best to do Mr. Collins had his wife, who was a school-teacher, figure out the difference in the cost to them at the end of 10 years on a loan of $20,000 at 6 per cent from a joint-stock land bank and a loan of the same amount, if he could secure that amount, from the Federal Land Bank of Omaha at 5½ per cent.

After figuring the matter over, Mrs. Collins reported to him that there was an annual difference of $100 the first year, and this difference would decrease slightly annually during the 10 years on account of the amortization payments. She figured the total difference, counting compound interest on the amount saved annually, would amount at the end of 10 years to $1,216.19 in favor of the Federal land-bank loan.

She was told that the Federal Land Bank of Omaha was now making net earnings at the rate of 12 per cent per annum, which belonged to borrowers, which would provide an additional saving of $810.12, making a total saving of $2,026.31 under the Federal farm-loan plan.

Now, Mr. Collins can not understand why he is obliged to pay this $2,026.31 to another farm-loan institution, when he could save that amount by making a loan with the Federal Land Bank of Omaha.

He has a boy now 11 years of age, and he and Mrs. Collins think it would be a nice thing to save this $2,026.31 to start this boy for himself when he becomes 21 years old; or, if the boy was otherwise provided for, it would be a nice dowry for one of their daughters, now 9 years of age, when she becomes 18 and possibly soon after marries some farmer boy in the neighborhood.

Upon investigation Mr. Collins has found that both joint-stock land banks and Federal land banks obtain funds for loans by the same tax-free bonds. He has learned that all stock in Federal land banks belong to borrowers, and that all net earnings go to them, while in joint-stock land banks all profits go to private investors.

He inquires quite naturally what becomes of the $2,026.31. He reaches the conclusion that if he is not allowed to save this $2,026.31, it will go into the pockets of the stockholders of other farm-loan concerns. He has been told that the Federal Farm Loan System was established for the benefit of farmers like himself. He can not help but believe that in his case it works to the benefit of the stockholders of joint-stock land banks.

This is a very important matter to a man like Mr. Collins, who with his family works hard, denies himself many conveniences, and desires to provide for his family and see them started out in life under more favorable circumstances than was he himself.

The United States census shows that there are many thousands of farmers in the Omaha Federal land-bank district situated the same as is Mr. Collins. This $2,026.31 that he is caused to lose may be multiplied many times to show the losses to actual farmers by reason of this provision limiting maximum loans to $10,000.

Farmers in the Omaha Federal land-bank district are unorganized. Other institutions engaged in the farm-loan business are well organized. They are permitted to and are now furnishing Members of Congress with a full and complete statement of the case from their standpoint.

I am not a politician and do not wish to use objectionable political methods to place this matter before Congress. All that I wish is that Congress be fully informed. I do not think the average Congressman knows that the Federal farm-loan act as it stands on the statute books to-day works such great injustice to the actual farmer who is operating his own farm.

I can not believe that if the Members of Congress knew the exact state of affairs they would for a minute tolerate the present law, whereby a worthy farmer like Mr. Collins is discriminated against in the interests of stockholders of joint-stock land banks, which enjoy the tax-free features of the Federal farm-loan act.

I am confident that Federal land banks would not be accused of pernicious political activity if they collaborated in laying before Congress evidence that farmers operating the most profitable and productive farm units are refused the opportunity of obtaining loans at lower rates through Federal land banks.

This farm of Mr. Collins is a typical corn-belt farm. Farm lands in the corn belt are now worth upwards of $200 per acre. The present loan limit of $10,000 will only benefit the man who owns an 80-acre farm. Unquestionable statistics prepared by agricultural experts prove what every practical banker and farmer knows—that an 80-acre farm in the corn belt under the present conditions can not be operated at a reasonable profit.

Is it right that the thousands of worthy farmers like Mr. Collins, operating their own farms, working hard through good conditions and bad in order to provide homes for their children, should be refused loans through Federal land banks at 5½ per cent and be obliged to obtain loans through joint-stock land banks or other farm-mortgage institutions at 6 per cent and more?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], a member of the committee.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kansas who has asked for recognition is a member of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Kansas at the present time.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will not prevail. The purpose and object of this whole act is that men of small means, small farmers, may secure a loan at a reasonable rate of interest. It is not the purpose of this bill to furnish money in order to let rich men increase their holdings and become large landowners. The amount that can be loaned under this act was purposely put at $10,000 in order to help the small farmer and not to encourage the purchase of large amounts of land. Now, I come from an agricultural district, and my ambition is to faithfully serve those interests, but it is not to the best interest of either the real farmer of my district or of this Nation to encourage either speculation in land or the purchase of land by men who are acquiring large tracts, for such men generally become landlords. What this Nation needs is home owners and not renters. A loan up to $10,000, which is the limit allowed in the present law, will take care of the requirement of any farmer who needs the help of the Government in getting money at reasonable rates of interest. Men who have property on which to borrow more than that can take care of themselves.

The average farm loan in my State is but $3,132. The average loan made in the State of the gentleman who has just spoken, in Oklahoma, is $1,680. That being a fact, and for the reasons I have just given, the committee was very much opposed to increasing the amount of loans that could be made to $25,000. This matter was taken up before the committee, and after being carefully considered it was unanimously decided it would not be raised above $10,000, and I do hope that the members of the committee will not increase that amount.

Mr. TINCHER. What, if any, objection was there to raising it?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Simply because it allows men to go out and mortgage their holdings and buy a large amount of land. It defeats the purpose of the act, which was to accommodate the small borrower.

Mr. TINCHER. But it takes more money to buy a farm now than when this bill was enacted into law. Does not the gentleman know that in his State the law is evaded now, and they are making loans where a man makes a loan of $10,000 and his wife makes a loan of $10,000?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I do not know it, and I do not think the gentleman knows it.

Mr. TINCHER. Well, I do.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. And would not the increase of this to $25,000 assist many men that are now renters in making a small payment and buying a farm on the easy-payment plan by Federal loan?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. It will not help a renter any, because he does not borrow $25,000 to buy a farm.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. Suppose he had $3,000 to pay down, and could borrow $20,000?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Whenever a renter has $3,000 and borrows $20,000, he is hopelessly swamped at the start.

Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa. They are doing it in Iowa.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. They can not do it under this law.

Mr. TINCHER. Does the gentleman want to say that you can buy a farm but you can not buy a good farm?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I do not want to say anything of the kind, but I do not want to say to the renter, "We will furnish you enough money so that you can never pay the interest and will finally be foreclosed and lose what you have," and we do not want to say to the rich man, "We will furnish you money to buy the land and prevent the tenants from becoming home owners." This is a bill to help the small farmer, the small borrower, and there should not be an amendment brought in here to enable a man to borrow $25,000 in this way.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Then it is the idea to keep the small farmer always a small farmer, under this bill?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. My idea is that the best thing we can have in this land of ours is a lot of small landowners.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Is it not a fact that under this bill you have to have $25,000 of actual capital, an equity of $25,000, before you can borrow $25,000?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. That is true; only the very well to do could borrow over $10,000.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. If that is true, we had better loan them all the money.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I can not agree with my colleague. The purpose of this act was to enable the small farmer to borrow for his needs, not for purposes of speculation, and to help him to so borrow at reasonable rates of interest and save him high commissions; he alone is the one who needs help, for the rich farmer or speculator has credit which enables him to borrow readily and secure fair rates. I hope this amendment will be defeated.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, there are so many arguments against this amendment that it is useless in five minutes to cover them all, and so let me center my attention upon one that has not been emphasized.

There never was a time in the history of the United States when it was more dangerous and more unwise to expand facilities for credit. All those who understandingly discuss the drop in the purchasing power of money—for by speaking of it thus its equivalent, the high cost of living, can be more intelligently explained—all those who understandingly discuss the drop in the purchasing power of money say that one of the great causes, and perhaps the greatest of all the causes, of our troubles to-day is the expansion of credit. This began long before the war. It had been encouraged by a course of legislation extending over years, and notably by the creation of the Federal reserve bank system. To the enormous growth of the credit structure has been in great measure due the increase in the cost of living, or, in other words, the drop in the purchasing power of money.

To-day's newspapers report the President of the United States as saying at Minneapolis what he had previously said in this room—that there is a relation between the delay in action upon the peace treaty and the cost of living. Sir, my warrant in addressing myself to this subject is that I have been the chairman of two commissions on the cost of living, one of which sat nine years ago. I cite it simply to recall that nine years ago, long before the war, the fall in the purchasing power of money had led various States, as it led the Senate of the United States, to take up this subject and to inquire as to the reasons. It was then shown that the basic fundamental cause at work has been the inflation of the currency, for the greater part of which consists of instruments of credit.

As a result we to-day see in every corner of the land symptoms of coming disaster. We see the speculative spirit invading every home. We see the people indulging in wild extravagance. We see refusal to work. We see all the indications of approaching crisis. At such a time no man can be true to the best interest of his country if he rashly commits himself to any proposal that will help speculation, that will still further inflate the bubble, that will increase the calamity sure to come when the bubble bursts.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in 27 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I reserve two minutes to myself.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I think it might be well for the committee to get down to fundamentals on this proposition. Let us see what was the justification for the farm-loan act. It was not the mere furnishing of a Federal agency to accommodate the citizens generally throughout the country. The only justification for the farm-loan act was this: The farmers of the country who have small farms and want small loans under the conditions that prevailed before we enacted the law were without any facility to get their credits at a reasonable rate. Then in order to help, not them primarily but to safeguard the economic welfare of the country and to promote the increased production of foodstuffs, we said, "We will set up a Federal agency to mobilize these small-farm credits of the Nation that now have no facility by private financiering or private loan companies."

That was the justification for the enactment of that legislation. Those of us who were here when the act was originally passed know that $10,000 was regarded by everyone who had studied the philosophy of the question as being too high, but we were "held up" and had to agree to $10,000.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to a question right there on that matter of $10,000?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. A moment ago in the debate I heard some one say that under the act as it is now a loan had been made for $10,000 to a man owning a farm, and also a loan of $10,000 had been made to his wife.

Mr. WINGO. I do not know about that; but if I did know that, I would not think I had discharged my duty until I had gone to the Farm Loan Board and had advised them of that subterfuge.

Mr. SNYDER. There is nothing in the original act to prevent that?

Mr. WINGO. There is nothing in the original act to prevent it, but undoubtedly that is a subterfuge. Under the present existing system a man who gets a loan of $25,000 must have a farm plant worth near $75,000, because we limit the loans to 50 per cent of the value of the land and 20 per cent of the improvements. When you figure out a farm that would be entitled to a $25,000 loan, you would find it would be based on a plant worth in many cases $60,000 to $75,000.

I ask what justification is there for the Federal Government to set up a Federal paternalistic agency to assist the man who has a farm worth $75,000? Can he not stand alone? What public interest is subserved by putting a governmental agency to work in helping a man who is in that position?

The truth is that in Nebraska, except one portion of it, and in Kansas, Illinois, Iowa, and in Indiana they said when the original act was passed, "We are not interested in this legislation, because we have already full facilities for financing loans at a low rate." In Iowa and Kansas and Illinois millions of dollars are loaned on farms by insurance companies and private loan companies at a low rate. But the fact is that the insurance companies and private loaning companies have been confining their loans to what they call "cream loans," and left the small man without a market at a fair rate for his loans, and that is the reason why we enacted the farm-loan act. The man who has a farm upon which he is entitled to a loan of $25,000 can go to a private agency and get them to make a loan at the same rate that the farm-loan bank makes him. If the gentleman says it is not true of a farmer that he knows, I will put him in touch with an institution which I know will give him a loan on his $50,000 farm. There is land speculation in Iowa and in every other State of this Union. Why, I recently read a statement where a man has made $87,000 by buying and selling his farm several times over. If you make this a Federal paternalistic scheme and go into competition with the private loaning companies of the country, you can not answer the legitimate criticisms that can be made of it. [Applause.] Let us keep the system for the benefit of the men who can not get loans at a reasonable rate because their loans are too small to be handled by the private companies, and let the independent, large landowner, who is able to care for himself and needs no Federal aid in order to survive, depend upon private sources which are ample and reasonable to finance his legitimate needs. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I am not in favor of debauching the farm-loan act in behalf of the big borrower of the country. If I were to selfishly consider merely the interest of some of my good friends in my own district, I would be in favor not merely of increasing the maximum loan from $10,000 to $25,000, but I would be in favor of raising it to $100,000, because I have in my district some very large landowners who own even as much as 200,000 acres of land, and who have little farms scattered over their holdings, who in the stress of times would be glad to borrow $100,000 from this Government. I am ready to look after their interests when the time comes under a proper bill that is meant to take care of their interests. But I am not ready and am not willing, even though it is to the interest of some of the big landowners in my district who are my friends and constituents, and who helped to send me here, to debauch this bill and this measure, which was passed in behalf of and in the interest alone of the farmers of our land—the men who have had trouble in the past in getting credit and in getting loans.

Take a man who needs over $10,000 in a loan and he is ready to go out of the farming business. It is to the detriment of a man to farm in the ordinary sense of the term if he has to borrow more than $10,000. Why, what does $10,000 represent in the way of a farm? It means 200 acres of land mortgaged to the extent of $50 an acre. Is not $50 an acre enough money for this Government to loan on 200 acres of land? Is not 200 acres of land enough land for any farmer on God's green earth to attempt to cultivate, and cultivate properly, and do it to the best interest of himself, his family, and his Nation? If this amendment is passed, the large landowners all over the country will bring themselves within the provisions of the act and each borrow the maximum of $25,000, thus flooding the money market with such loans, and it would not be very long until it would be impossible for a small farmer who frequently needs help and credit most of all to get a loan or to borrow any money at all, and the purposes of this farm-loan act would be thwarted. It was passed for the benefit of the needy farmers. We must jealously protect it in their behalf. The good farmer is the intensive farmer, and is not a land speculator. I sincerely hope that the amendment will be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, the Farm Loan Board have had called to their attention the fact that in some cases loans have been made to various members of the same family in excess of the $10,000 limit as a total. In so far as is possible they have stopped that practice entirely, so that it does not need longer to be considered.

I do not agree with some gentlemen who have spoken as to the object of this legislation. The object of this legislation primarily was the reduction of the interest on farm loans. It has had that effect. A secondary result which was desired and which has been secured has been the equalization of loans throughout the United States in so far as the interest rate was concerned. That result has been largely achieved.

The total effect of the operation of this law has been in every way beneficent. Gentlemen say it was intended alone for the small farmer. I do not agree with that statement. It is principally for the benefit of the small farmer, because he has needed the benefit more than the large farmer, but it was for the large farmer as well, and the prosperous farmer as well. Do you intend here to-day to put a handicap upon the successful farmers of the United States? Do you intend to put a handicap on the farmers in the State of Iowa who have raised the average price of their lands to $200 an acre? The average farm in Iowa is 157 acres. It means that one-half of the farms in Iowa are larger than 157 acres. It means that one-half of the farms in Iowa are smaller than that. Do you intend to put a handicap upon those who have larger farms? Is that the object of this legislation? It seems to me you can not properly do so.

The average 160-acre farm in Iowa to-day is worth $32,000. Are you going to say that because it has such large value you are going to put a handicap on the man who owns it and who by his energy and industry has made it successful and has made his business successful? It is as important for him to have a cheap rate of interest as it is for the smaller man. And, gentlemen of the committee, is it wise for us to establish two standards of interest, one smaller than the other? Is it best for us to say, "If you desire a loan of over $10,000, you must pay a larger rate of interest for it than the man who desires a smaller loan?" Certainly there is no economic justice in that argument. It occurs to me that we ought to take consideration of the fact that since this farm-loan act was passed there has been a great increase in the value of the best farm lands of the United States. Certainly we should not do anything here that would take away from those men the desire to make farming prosperous in the United States. To reduce the rate of interest helps the production of the United States, whether it is on large farms or on small farms.

I desire to say this much more also: The men who derive the most from an acre of ground in the United States are not the men who own the smallest farms in the United States. They are the men who own farms that on the average are greater than 160 acres of land, the men who by the employment of capital can secure the necessary help and the necessary machinery to make every acre of land productive to its utmost capacity. Intensive farming is as practicable on a large farm in the United States as it is upon a small farm, and the people who buy the farmers' products are benefited in a like ratio.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TOWNER. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman thinks there ought not to be a limit below $25,000. Now, why put any limit at all upon the amount of the loan if it is merely for the purpose of reducing the interest rate to the farmer who farms his own land?

Mr. TOWNER. I think that argument can hardly be regarded of very great weight. We are trying here to establish a standard that will apply reasonably and fairly to farming conditions in the United States. I think that is carried out by the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN].

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message in writing from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, was received, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On August 31, 1919:

H. R. 8076. An act authorizing the county of Montgomery, Tenn., to construct a bridge across the Cumberland River within 7 miles of Clarksville, Tenn.; and

H. R. 8117. An act for the construction of a bridge across the Susquehanna River at or near Falls, Wyoming County, Pa.

On September 3, 1919:

H. R. 7594. An act relating to the creation of the office of general of the armies of the United States.

AMENDMENTS TO FEDERAL LOAN ACT.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, so far as this amendment is concerned, it would not materially affect my district, because the land there is not so high in price, and I think a limit of $10,000 is high enough to meet the wants of the farmers in my district. But I really see no serious objection to adopting this amendment. Some gentlemen seem to have the idea that these are Government loans, and therefore should not help those who are well to do. These are not Government loans. The farmers, the borrowers themselves, furnish the capital for all of these loans. It is true that originally the Government gave these banks $750,000 temporary capital, but already that is being paid back. In a few years the Government of the United States will not have one single dollar invested in the capital of these banks. The borrowers furnish the entire capital, and all the Government has done is to permit them to organize these banks, to pass a law creating these banks.

Now there is and could be but one valid objection to increasing the amount of these loans. The number of loans which the Federal land bank can make depends upon the sale of bonds. Temporarily the Government bought a large block of those bonds, but it is not and will not be the policy of the Government to buy those bonds. So that the number of loans and the amount of loans which the bank makes will depend upon its ability to sell these bonds on the money markets of the Nation. Evidently if the loans are large you can accommodate a less number of men. That is the only real objection. It does not injure the $10,000 borrower at all for some other man to borrow $25,000. In fact, it will decrease his rate of interest, if anything, because the overhead charges are levied upon the entire outstanding loans, and it is to the interest of every borrower to have those outstanding loans as large in amount as possible, because the more loans there are the less percentage will have to be levied upon each man to pay the administrative expenses. I think that States like Iowa and Nebraska, and some other States, where lands are high have a good appeal to make to this Congress.

Coming from a State where loans are small, I shall not object to having those loans increased so as to make it useful where places are of high value.

Mr. KINKAID. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. I will.

Mr. KINKAID. Will the gentleman state the maximum loan of the joint-stock land bank? Is there any?

Mr. MORGAN. My memory is that there is no limit.

Mr. KINKAID. No; why should there be with the Federal farm-loan banks.

Mr. PLATT. I will say there is no limit in law, but by regulation they are allowed to loan only $50,000.

Mr. KINKAID. That is the statement I wanted to make.

Mr. MORGAN. The Federal land bank ought to be able to compete with the joint-stock land bank. If I had my way, I would wipe out the joint-stock bank. I never thought that they should be created. We ought to give the Federal land banks, which are owned by the borrowers, which are cooperative institutions, the right so that they can compete in business and do business in competition with the joint-stock bank, which are money-making institutions organized for profit, and all the profit goes to the stockholders of those banks, whereas the profit of the Federal land banks go back to the borrowers, not that the Government or any private capitalist gets one cent of those profits, and I see no reason why we could not to some extent enlarge these loans.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not know what reason prompted the average Member of the House when we voted to enact the Federal farm-loan act. According to my notion, when we approached the passage of that bill we approached it from an entirely different angle from that from which we approach ordinary legislation. I think everybody who has had occasion to observe recognizes that the owned home is the foundation upon which government rests. [Applause.] There is a limit upon the land that is suitable for agricultural homes, and there is a limit upon cheap credit. Now I submit to you as statesmen who love your country, do you not look with apprehension upon the drift of this country toward absentee landlordism and large individual ownerships of farm lands? I say to you, gentlemen, that instead of doing something to help the man who has three or four hundred acres to get this cheap money to buy a piece of land which some poor man might otherwise get, I would like to see a legislative policy which would make it difficult for him to do it. I warn you to-day, gentlemen, that if you pass this amendment and embark upon a legislative policy like this, the day will come when you will have to do something radical to undo that which you to-day begin. [Applause.] I live in a country where land is high. I live in a country where landlordism is on the increase. In my State over 52 per cent of the farmers do not own their land. The chief importance of this is not due to the fact that it is a matter of primary concern to the tenant, though that fact makes it important. It is its vital concern to the great State of Texas as a government which makes it so important. The very foundation upon which its structure rests is involved. I urge you, gentlemen, that the Federal farm-loan act is not legislation enacted primarily to help man make more money; it is legislation enacted primarily to build stronger the foundation upon which the Government rests. [Applause.] And when you amend that act so as to aid a man with 200 acres of land, in competition with some man who is not so well fixed, who is trying to buy a little home for himself, you violate the whole philosophy and purpose of the act. You propose by this amendment to help that man with private credit behind him, who has two or three hundred acres of land—you propose to loan him $25,000 to go into the market for more land. What chance has the little fellow got under such a legislative policy in competition? Gentlemen, you are legislating to-day not for the man in Nebraska who owns a farm there and wants to buy more land, not for the man in Dallas County, Tex., where land is worth $200 or $300 an acre, and who could use $25,000 cheap money to buy more land, but you are legislating to-day to help that man who desires to own a home in which to raise his children; we are legislating to-day to help improve conditions in the United States; we are legislating not out of consideration for individuals, but because of concern for our Nation, which to-day is becoming weakened—the very foundations upon which it rests is becoming weakened by loss of its owned homes. Let us strike out this amendment, and let us help to build beneath the structure of our Government a foundation of owned homes, rather than to help the man who already has a home to deprive some other man of the right to have a home. Build beneath any form of government the foundation of owned homes and its citizens will guard and guide it through any crisis which may befall. This is the chief duty of our statesmen, and should be the chief concern of our citizens. [Applause.]

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that it is necessary for me to use any further time after you have listened to the excellent speech of my friend from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS]. I just want to say that this is a question which the committee will take up by itself and consider somewhat further. Of course, we ought not to increase the limit to $25,000. This Federal farm-loan system is a system subsidized by the Government, which furnishes the initial capital, pays all the appraisers and registrars, pays the whole expense of safeguarding and supervising, and there is no reason why we should extend it to reach the rich landowners. Now, the average loan is less than $3,000, showing that the very people we intended to benefit are being benefited. There is no reason why we should extend it and add to the speculation in land which is now in progress in several States of the Middle West.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That section 20 of said act be amended by striking out $25 and $50 in line 2 of paragraph 1, and also by inserting after $1,000 the words "and such larger denominations as the Federal Farm Loan Board may authorize," so that the paragraph as amended will read:

"SEC. 20. That bonds provided for in this act shall be issued in denominations of $100, $500, $1,000, and such larger denominations as the Federal Farm Loan Board may authorize; they shall run for specified minimum and maximum periods, subject to payment and retirement, at the option of the land bank, at any time after five years from the date of their issue. They shall have interest coupons attached, payable semiannually, and shall be issued in series of not less than $50,000, the amount and terms to be fixed by the Federal Farm Loan Board. They shall bear a rate of interest not to exceed 5 per centum per annum."

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 10, after the word "of" insert the following, "$25, $50."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a suggestion? His amendment is but a negative of the proposal he seeks to amend. I do not want to make the point of order. I know what the gentleman wants to do, he wants to move to strike out section 5. His proposal as read will restore the existing law and therefore it would be out of order, because it is the negative of the pending amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, if that is the parliamentary situation——

Mr. WINGO. I do not want to shut the gentleman off.

Mr. MORGAN (continuing). Then I will withdraw the amendment and ask to strike out section 5.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MORGAN: Page 7, line 4, strike out all of section 5.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, section 20 of the original act starts out in this way:

Bonds provided for in this act shall be issued in denominations of $25, $50, $100, $500, and $1,000—

And so forth.

Now, this proposal is to strike out the provision which authorizes the issuing of bonds of denominations of $25 and $50. That is the change that is made.

Now, I interrogated the chairman of the committee when he was discussing this amendment, and I have read the report. Apparently the only excuses they give are, first, that but few of these bonds of small denominations have been sold; that there is no demand for bonds of small denominations; and, second, they say that to issue bonds of small denomination will encourage inflation, and therefore they have decided it will be best to strike out that provision and permit no bonds to be issued of denominations under $100.

Now, we ought not to change an original act until experience has demonstrated that it should be changed. This is a new law. These are new institutions, untried in this country. In constructing the original act Congress followed largely the institutions of Europe. Now, the times have been abnormal. Before these banks had hardly got started the war came. The war monopolized the money market, so to speak, and these banks have not had a fair chance yet to develop so that we can ascertain just what they can do. Now, this I know, and every man who has studied the history of European institutions knows it, that in those countries these bonds are purchased, and universally they are issued in small denominations, the idea being to have them so that men of small means can purchase them.

Now, after all, what is the problem our Federal land bank must solve in the future? It is largely a question of securing a market for these bonds. They have been in operation now three years. Two hundred and thirty-eight million dollars of loans have been made. The Government furnished a market and purchased $80,000,000 of those bonds, I think. The American public does not yet understand these bonds. So far they have been relying on banks and moneyed institutions as a market for the purchase of the bonds. And I fear that this amendment is made in the interest of the banks. I am afraid that the object in keeping their denomination up to $100 is——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield? I understood the gentleman to say that the average loan was $3,000. Can the gentleman give the committee any information as to the initial cost to the borrower of such a loan as that?

Mr. MORGAN. That is foreign to the subject that I am trying to impress upon the House. I do not think I could, offhand, answer the question. But the question is, Will we amend to-day this original act, untried as it has been, and say that these banks shall not issue bonds in denominations under $100? What good can come from that? What purpose is to be served? The fact is that these banks must go out and educate the American public to buy these bonds.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Is it not true that these bonds were so popular that the Farm Loan Board had to withhold them from the market in order to keep them from being taken in preference to the Government bonds?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know whether that is true or not. I do know that the Secretary of the Treasury practically required that they should cease to sell bonds, because he said that in time of war the whole money market and credit power of the Nation should be put into that war, and he did not want to be embarrassed with the sale of these bonds.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. These bonds were popular because they were exempt from taxation, while the Government bonds were not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. MORGAN. May I have three minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

Mr. PLATT. I shall not object to three minutes, but there is no use of debating this proposition, inasmuch as it is so simple. I shall object to any further extension.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MORGAN. It may be a very simple proposition and not debatable, and I think so myself. For that reason I can not understand why the committee should bring in such a bill. I asked the chairman if the Secretary of the Treasury had been called upon to make the recommendation upon this point, and he said not that he knew of. And why should we make a material and important amendment of this kind that goes to the very foundation of this loan system without some advice from the Secretary of the Treasury or without some thorough investigation? We have nothing but theories to lead us into this. What does this mean? It simply means that you are taking from these banks an avenue by which they may sell bonds. You are taking away from them part of the credit which they have under this. Why? Because a man must have $100 before he can buy a bond, and so the $50 man and the $25 man can not be an investor in these bonds. I say you are destroying the fundamental principle on which this act was built, namely, that these bonds should become of universal circulation, so to speak; that they should be purchased by men and women all over this land. And it was not the idea that banking institutions should constitute the chief market for these bonds, but that they should be sold to the public generally, and the real problem of those banks in the future is to secure the market for the bonds; and we are restricting the market if we pass this amendment. Therefore, I appeal to every man who is in sympathy with this to vote against this amendment. It can accomplish no good purpose; it may accomplish a bad purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. MORGAN. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks for a division.

The committee divided; and the Chairman announced that 15 gentlemen had risen in the affirmative.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and three gentlemen are present, a quorum.

The committee was dividing when the gentleman from Oklahoma demanded a quorum. The Chair will order the vote taken again. Those in favor of the amendment will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Fifteen gentlemen have risen in the affirmative. The "ayes" will be seated and the "noes" will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Fifty-eight gentlemen have risen in the negative. On this vote the ayes are 15 and the noes are 58, and the amendment is rejected.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I regret not knowing this bill was going to be considered to-day. It was only reported five days ago. Had I known that the Banking and Currency Committee was considering amendments to the farm-loan act, I would have availed myself of the opportunity of going before the committee and offering certain other amendments. I shall not now have the opportunity of doing so.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I will be glad to.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman was a former member of the Banking and Currency Committee?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes; I was when the original farm-loan act was prepared, reported, and passed.

Mr. PLATT. There will probably be other opportunities.

Mr. HASTINGS. I hope there will be other opportunities. I am glad to have that assurance from the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT], chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee. I did not arise to discuss the amendments before the House. I do not regard them of very great importance and do not believe that they will materially strengthen the farm-loan act in any particular.

I now want to take occasion to point out what I regard as the weakness of the farm-loan act. I think the act is a great piece of constructive legislation. The Banking and Currency Committee, of which I was a member at the time the act was passed, gave much thoughtful consideration to the provisions of the same. It was approved July 17, 1916. I stated to the committee then that the greatest trouble with the administering of the law would be found in the compulsory organization of local loan associations. I endeavored to get the committee to insert an amendment providing for the appointment of local representatives of the farm land banks throughout the country, through whom applications could be made for loans under the act. I presented such an amendment to the House when it was in the Committee of the Whole considering the original farm-loan act, but it was not adopted.

I am impressed with the necessity for such an amendment and hope that the Banking and Currency Committee will at an early date give earnest consideration to the matter. It will do away with the organization of local loan associations and permit local agents or representatives to be appointed, authorized to receive and forward all applications for loans. If this were done it would greatly popularize the act and would make it, as it was originally intended, one of the greatest pieces of legislation enacted by the Sixty-fourth Congress. Since its passage we have been largely engaged in passing war measures and have not been able to secure amendments to the act or give them the consideration they merit. Before the passage of the act I pointed out, as I do now: First, that the organization of local loan associations is unnecessary, and that the appointment of a local agent to perform functions similar to the work now done by the secretary of the local loan associations in advising farmers how to apply for loans, how to prepare their papers, and how to do all necessary things with reference to making an application, will better serve the interests of the farmers desiring to borrow money; second, the appointment of local agents would do away with the interminable delays now experienced.

Delay in securing favorable action upon loans is the chief drawback to the success of this splendid law. If local agents were appointed who are familiar with the law and familiar with the requirements of the farm-land banks served by them, they could expedite action very much upon all applications for loans. When an application for a loan was then presented to an agent, he would see that it was made out in the proper form, that the note, mortgage, and all accompanying papers met the requirements of the farm-land bank, and that an abstract accompanied the papers. If anything were omitted he would be able to satisfactorily explain the matter to the applicant, so that when the application went forward everything would be complete and in correct form.

In my judgment the disappointment experienced in the administering of this law is due to the failure to adopt this or a similar amendment. The local loan associations serve no useful or helpful purpose. In many counties through the United States there are no local associations. Hence an applicant has no opportunity to apply for a loan. When a number of farmers get together to organize an association they are not familiar with the necessary details as to how the organization should be perfected, which necessitates much correspondence and many meetings by them. All this results in long delays.

The statistics in my State show that it took from three to six months to secure loans from the farm-land banks. This is inexcusable and will, of course, nullify all the good effects of the act. No one who wants to buy a farm or who wants to secure a loan can afford to wait in a state of uncertainty for such a length of time. The owner of a farm and a prospective purchaser meet and agree upon a price. The prospective purchaser explains to the owner of the farm that he purposes getting a part of the money through the farm-land bank, but the owner of the land, knowing how uncertain it is about getting the money and the delays encountered, will not enter into a contract. The purchaser, rather than lose the trade, pays from 2 to 3 per cent additional interest to a local loan agent.

If this farm-loan act is to be made a success, and it should and can be, all causes of delay must be eliminated. Intelligent agents, who in a few moments could look over the papers, would forward them to the farm-land banks of the respective districts, have the abstracts examined within a day or two after receipt, and notify the local appraisers, so that the farmers making the applications could be advised within a week or 10 days whether or not the loans would be allowed.

The farmers constitute one of the greatest producing classes in the United States. Every one of them ought to be encouraged to own his land. It is the ambition of every tenant to own his farm. If this legislation were perfected it would enable each honest, hard-working farmer to acquire a home. It can be done by borrowing 50 per cent of the appraised value of the land and 20 per cent of the appraised value of the permanent insured improvements. Any farmer with the reputation of being economical, honest, and hard working should be able by means of this act to acquire a home by making a first mortgage to the farm-land bank and giving the money to the owner of the land and by making a second mortgage to secure the balance of the purchase price. Hundreds of thousands of tenant farmers should secure homes in this way and be able to pay for them. The first mortgage would be on long time, and the loan could be paid on easy payments. Every payment would reduce the principal and make both mortgages better security.

There are approximately 6,500,000 farmers in the United States. If every one owned his land, he would have better improvements and his place would be beautified. He would see that every foot of land is placed in cultivation and cultivated in the crops that are best adapted to his particular soil. The improvements would be kept in good repair. He would raise more stock and poultry. His land would be kept up by a rotation of crops and by the use of fertilizers, making his farm more productive and greatly increasing the quantity of grain and other things produced. The farmer would be able to live better and easier, and a home would make him more contented. The man who owns his home is deeply interested in churches, schools, and good roads, and he stands for law enforcement. He usually convicts, when he is on a jury, where the evidence shows the defendant is guilty.

I want to see this act popularized in every way. Its advantages have not been appreciated in my State. Everybody knows that it is to the interest of the farmer to borrow money upon long terms, payable in amortized payments, rather than secure it upon short loans and pay a larger rate of interest. By securing a loan under this act the farmer pays the principal along with the interest in such small amounts that he really does not know he is paying the principal. Under this act 1 per cent is added to the interest to pay off the principal. There is absolutely no chance for the Government to lose if the law is honestly and intelligently administered. With an intelligent agent, an expert in the examination of titles, and an honest, intelligent appraiser there is no chance for a loss to the Government. The Government loans only 50 per cent of the appraised value of the land and 20 per cent of the appraised value of the insured permanent improvements, and each year the security is greater as the loan is paid. In addition, it must be remembered that every farmer who owns his land, by taking proper care of it, fertilizing and rotating the crops, makes the land more valuable and the security better. There is no chance for the Government to lose.

All that the Government is doing under this law is to extend its credit. In return we have in prospect a very much larger number of farmers throughout the country owning their lands. We see beautiful houses, well-kept yards, gardens filled with vegetables, plenty of stock and poultry, and the farms cultivated in crops best adapted to the soil. We see a happy, contented, prosperous people. We see production greatly increased throughout the country, as all tillable soil will be cultivated. All this must add to the prosperity of the people everywhere. As the farming class of people are made more prosperous, bank deposits will be added to. The farmers will trade more with the merchants and give more employment to labor. They will raise more and better stock. This condition of prosperity can be brought about by an amendment to this act that will avoid delays in securing loans.

I am going to be a little personal in the matter. I recently made inquiry of the farm-land bank serving my district and found that local associations have been organized in only three of the eight counties. Of course, loans are only made to the members of these organizations. The farmers complain about the interminable delays and prefer to pay a larger rate of interest upon loans rather than to experience the delays and uncertainties of making application to the farm-land bank. Let us do away with these delays. The chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee has assured me that another opportunity will be offered to present amendments. I want to press upon all proper occasions the importance of this matter. I was reared in the Indian Territory—now Oklahoma—where the people have experienced many delays in administering Indian affairs. They are unwilling to have these delays occur when making application for loans.

The enactment of the farm-loan act has been of great advantage to farmers throughout the country in securing reduced rates of interest. Since the passage of the act they have been able to get more liberal terms from companies loaning money. I think that I am safe in saying the interest on such loans in my State has been reduced 2 or 3 per cent. The farmers have been given the option of paying the loans in whole or in part upon any interest-bearing period. The law ought to be amended and administered so as to enable the farmers to secure favorable action upon applications for loans with the least possible delay, so as to give every tenant farmer a chance to own his home. If this is done it will increase the prosperity of the country and greatly develop it, as well as strengthen our citizenship. It will give employment to untold thousands. The farm-land banks can lend money at a lower rate of interest than any private company, because of the exemption from taxation privileges extended to the bonds. Their bonds are as safe as Government bonds. They are well secured and carry a greater tax exemption than Government bonds. The land banks therefore can secure an unlimited amount of money to supply the needs of all farmers.

If an amendment, such as I have suggested, were adopted and local agents appointed and delays in securing loans avoided, I assure the House and the country that it would popularize the farm-loan act such as nothing else can do. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 74, noes 0.

Accordingly the motion was agreed to.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9065) to amend sections 3, 8, 10, 12, 20, and 21 of the act approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm-loan act, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. PLATT. I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put the amendments in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 108, noes 7.

Accordingly the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. PLATT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair declines to recognize the gentleman, and lays before the House a message from the President of the United States.

WIRE AND WIRELESS COMMUNICATION CONFERENCE (S. DOC. NO. 88).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which, with the accompanying document, was ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In view of the provision contained in the deficiency act approved March 4, 1913, that "hereafter the Executive shall not extend or accept any invitation to participate in any international congress, conference, or like event without first having specific authority of law to do so," I transmit herewith for the consideration of the Congress and for its determination whether it will authorize the extension of the invitation and the appropriation necessary to defray the expenses incident thereto, a report from the Secretary of State with reference to the proposed international conference to be held in Washington during October next, or at such later date as may be convenient to the powers concerned, to consider all international aspects of communication by land telegraphs, cables, and wireless telegraphy, and to make recommendations to the powers concerned with a view to providing the entire world with adequate facilities of this nature on a fair and equitable basis.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
10 September, 1919.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have spoken on the bill to amend the Federal farm-loan act may have permission to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that all who have spoken on the bill under consideration to-day may have the right to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PLATT. I ask unanimous consent that H. R. 6806, which is No. 32 on the House Calendar, lie on the table, an exactly similar bill having passed the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that H. R. 6806 lie on the table. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, when a Member of the House seeks to ascertain proper information from the Chair, and in a respectful manner rises in his place and addresses the Chair, stating that he desires to make a parliamentary inquiry, is or is not the Member entitled to recognition by the Chair?

The SPEAKER. He is not. It is entirely in the discretion of the Chair whether he will recognize a Member for a parliamentary inquiry. The Chair recognizes that at certain times it is for the advantage of the business of the House that a Member should be recognized for a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BLANTON. I only wanted to know the ruling of the Speaker on the matter.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Has it been agreed that the House shall meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. It has.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

An act (S. 2472) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 1 minute p. m.) the House adjourned until Thursday, September 11, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting supplemental estimate of appropriation for the purchase of a site for a post office at Mount Olive, N. C. (H. Doc. No. 246); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Interior submitting supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the General Land Office for protecting public lands, timber, etc., from forest fires, fiscal year 1920 (H. Doc. No. 247); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. ELLSWORTH, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9091) granting the consent of Congress to the county of Hennepin to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Minnesota River, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 301), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas, from the Committee on the Territories, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8953) to authorize the incorporated town of Ketchikan, Alaska, to issue bonds for the construction and equipment of schools therein, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 304), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. DALLINGER, from the Committee on Education, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6870) to provide for a library information service in the Bureau of Education, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 302), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. SELLS, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. By Mr. STINESS: Petition of Sidney F. Hoar Camp No. 4, United Spanish War Veterans, of Providence, R. I., indorsing H. R. 2, to pension soldiers of the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, and the China relief expedition; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WHITE of Maine: Petition of citizens and merchants of Auburn, Me., protesting against the so-called Siegel bill; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, September 11, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we know that every line of human activity leads to Thy throne. Not only the great but the small things of life count with Thee. Thou dost not only take notice of the uprise and downfall of nations but of the hearts of men. Thou dost discern their secret thoughts. We pray that this day we may be kept by Thy grace in perfect conformity to Thy will, that we may do that which is pleasing in Thy sight, and work out Thy divine plan for us as individuals and as representatives of the Nation, and for the Nation as well. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

AFFAIRS IN MEXICO (S. DOC. NO. 89).

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Acting Secretary of State transmitting a translation of a communication from the United Press of Guadalajara, Mexico, in regard to the relations existing between Mexico and this country. The communication and accompanying paper will be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The communication is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, September 10, 1919.

The VICE PRESIDENT,
United States Senate.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the information of the Senate, a translation of a communication, dated August 16, 1919, from the United Press of Guadalajara, Mexico, in regard to the relations existing between Mexico and this country. The American consul at Guadalajara was requested by the organization mentioned to forward this translation to the Senate of the United States.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,

WILLIAM PHILLIPS,
Acting Secretary of State.

(Inclosure: Translation from the United Press of Guadalajara, Mexico, dated August 16, 1919.)

AMERICAN CONSULAR SERVICE, GUADALAJARA, MEXICO.

[Translation.]

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE AMERICAN UNION,
Washington, D. C., United States of America:

At this time, when the American Senate is studying the Mexican question with a view to give a decision in the delicate international situation which has come up, this body desires to bring to the mind of the representatives of the Union a message of conciliation and calmness. The interventionist tendency, inspired mainly in material reasons, is a menace for the two countries and a serious danger to Pan American solidarity and balance. In the name of the ideals of justice and right postulated by all the free countries and subscribed to in the international peace conference, we beg to ask that your institution, in this decisive hour, proceed with that equity worthy of the people who have fought so much for democracy and liberty. The intellectual body which we represent hopes for a moderate and friendly action from that honorable body, and deposits in the American Senate its confidence for a high and righteous attitude which may solve, peacefully, the international crisis we are facing, and which may bring back, definitely, the cordial friendship that must exist between our two Nations.

Unity, fraternity, and justice.

Guadalajara, Mexico, August 16, 1919.

THE UNITED PRESS OF GUADALAJARA,
(Signed) J. M. M. SOTOMAYOR, President.
(Signed) ADOLFO HERNANDEZ MARIN, Secretary.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 9065. An act to amend sections 3, 8, 10, 12, 20, and 21 of the act approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm-loan act; and

H. J. Res. 87. Joint resolution authorizing national banks to subscribe to the United War Work Campaign.

HOUSE BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

The following bill and joint resolution were each read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

H. R. 9065. An act to amend sections 3, 8, 10, 12, 20, and 21 of the act approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm-loan act; and

H. J. Res. 87. Joint resolution authorizing national banks to subscribe to the United War Work Campaign.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 2945) regulating the height of buildings that may be erected on land confronting Meridian Hill Park on the south, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 178) thereon.

Mr. PAGE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2251) for the appointment of Lieut. Thomas White to the permanent Dental Corps of the Navy, submitted an adverse report (No. 177) thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BALL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, submitted a report (No. 179), accompanied by a bill (S. 2992), to create a rent commission in the District of Columbia.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, as in open executive session, I present, on behalf of the members of the minority of the Committee on Foreign Relations, their views on the pending treaty, which I ask may be treated in the same manner as the majority report was treated.

Mr. LODGE. I asked to have the majority report printed in the RECORD. I did not have it read.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will ask to have it printed in the RECORD.

Mr. LODGE. And also the same number printed as of the majority report.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The views of the minority, this day submitted by Mr. HITCHCOCK, are as follows:

"[Senate Report No. 176, Part II, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session.]

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

"Mr. HITCHCOCK, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, submitted the following views of the minority:

"The undersigned members of the Foreign Relations Committee unite in urging the early ratification of the pending treaty of peace without amendments and without reservations.

"We deplore the long and unnecessary delay to which the treaty has been subjected while locked up in the committee, whose majority decisions and recommendations were from the start a foregone conclusion. They could have been made in July as well as in September and would have been the same.

"The industrial world is in ferment, the financial word in doubt, and commerce halts while this great delay in the peace settlement has been caused by the majority of a committee known to be out of harmony with the majority of the Senate and the majority of the people. This is government by obstruction as well as by a minority.

"Our export trade already shows the undeniable effects of delay and doubt in treaty ratification and peace settlement. For the first seven months following the armistice our exports averaged almost seven hundred millions per month, but in July they fell to $570,000,000. Europe undoubtedly wants our products, but can only take them in full quantity if our financial institutions provide the credit to bridge over the period necessary to restore European industry to productiveness. This private credit can not and will not be furnished as long as the peace settlement is in doubt. Public credit has heretofore carried this great balance of trade. Since the armistice was signed our Government has advanced to European Governments nearly $2,500,000,000, which was almost enough to cover the balance of trade during the eight months' period.

"Our Government, however, has about reached the end of its authority given by Congress and will advance but little more. From now on, if we are to keep up our commerce with Europe, private enterprise must furnish the credit to cover the trade balance till European industries get started and are able to pay us with their goods. Peace settlement delays and doubts paralyze this revival. If uncertainty continues, depression is inevitable.

"The claim by the majority of this committee on page 3 of their report that we have exported over $11,000,000 worth of goods to Germany since the armistice and without a peace settlement is do doubt true. To other countries during the same period we exported over five thousand million dollars' worth. What was exported to Germany, as stated by the majority report, was practically nothing. It is only 14 cents' worth of American products for each person in Germany in seven months, or 2 cents per person per month, yet the majority report boasts of it as evidence of trade revival in spite of treaty delay. The same statesmen gravely assure us that their figures prove that it is a mere delusion to say we can not trade with Germany till a peace settlement is made. Two cents per month per capita is hardly trading with Germany.

"Referring to the action of the majority of the committee, we unite in opposing and condemning the recommendations both as to textual amendments and as to proposed reservations. As far as the proposed textual amendments are concerned, we see no reason to discuss their character at length. In our opinion they have no merit, but whether they be good, bad, or indifferent their adoption by the Senate can have no possible effect except to defeat the participation of the United States in the treaty. None of them could by any possibility be accepted even by the great nations associated with the United States in the war, and none of them could by any possibility be dictated to Germany. To adopt any one of them, therefore, is equivalent to rejecting the treaty.

"The suggestion on page 4 of the majority report that the peace conference is still in session in Paris and could consider any textual amendments to the treaty made by the Senate, and that German representatives could be brought to Paris for that purpose, indicates a total misconception of the situation. The peace conference has acted finally upon this treaty. Great Britain has ratified it, France is about to do so, and with the action of one other power it will in all human probability be in actual operation even before the Senate of the United States reaches a decision. Moreover, the peace conference possesses no further power to 'bring German representatives to Paris.' The power of compulsion has been exhausted. Germany was told where to sign and when to sign and when to ratify, and Germany has closed the chapter by signing and by ratifying. Germany can not be compelled to do anything more or different with regard to this treaty by being confronted with an amended treaty, whether once a month, day, or week. There must be a finality to ultimata in a treaty by compulsion. If an amended treaty is not signed by Germany, then it is in none of its parts binding on her.

"To adopt an amendment or to reject the treaty means that the United States will sacrifice all of the concessions secured from Germany by a dictated peace. While these concessions are not so large as those which other nations associated with us secure in reparations, they are nevertheless of tremendous importance and could only be secured under a dictated peace. Among the concessions which the United States would sacrifice by the adoption of any amendment or the rejection of the treaty may be included the following:

"First. Germany's acknowledgment of responsibility for the war and her promise to make restitution for damages resulting from it.

"Second. Germany's promise to us in the treaty that she will not impose higher or other customs duties or charges on our goods than those charged to the most favored nation and will not prohibit or restrict or discriminate against imports directly or indirectly from our country.

"Third. Germany's promise to us in the treaty that she will make no discrimination in German ports on shipping bearing our flag and that our shipping in German ports will be given as favorable treatment as German ships receive.

"Fourth. That for six months after the treaty goes into effect no customs duty will be levied against imports from the United States except the lowest duties that were in force for the first six months of 1914.

"Fifth. Germany's agreement with us that the United States shall have the privilege of reviving such of the treaties with Germany as were in existence prior to the war as we may alone desire.

"Sixth. Germany's promise to us to restore the property of our citizens seized in Germany or to compensate the owners.

"Seventh. Germany's very important agreement validating all acts by the United States and by the Alien Property Custodian by which we seized and proceeded to liquidate $800,000,000 worth of property in the United States belonging to German citizens.

"Eighth. Germany's agreement that the proceeds of the sale of these properties may be used to compensate our citizens in Germany if Germany fails to do so, or to pay debts which Germany or Germans owe to American citizens, or to pay American prewar claims against Germany for property destroyed and lives taken similar to the losses because of the destruction of the Lusitania.

"Ninth. Germany's agreement that she will compensate her own citizens for property, patents, and other things belonging to them in the United States seized during the war by our Government.

"Tenth. Germany's agreement that no claim can be made against the United States in respect to the use or sale during the war by our Government, or by persons acting for our Government, of any rights in industrial, literary, or artistic property, including patents.

"Eleventh. Germany's agreement that the United States shall retain over 500,000 tons of German shipping seized in American ports which much more than compensate us for shipping lost during the war.

"Twelfth. We would lose our membership on the reparations commission, which will be the most powerful international body ever created and which will have enormous control over the trade and commerce of Germany with the rest of the world for years to come. It not only supervises the use of German economic resources and the payment of reparations, but it can restrict or expand Germany's imports and distribute much of her desirable exports, including dyes. In no way can the United States assure itself against discrimination in German imports and financial policies unless we have a member upon this great reparations commission.

"These are some, but by no means all, of the valuable concessions which the United States would inevitably sacrifice by failing to ratify the treaty. This failure would be just as complete if we adopt an amendment to it as if we rejected the treaty absolutely. In either event, we would find ourselves at the end of the war, it is true, but without any peace or terms of peace with Germany. We would have abandoned our disgusted associates and we would be reduced to the necessity of seeking a negotiated peace with an angry Germany on such terms as she would be willing to accord.

"We are, therefore, without any qualification against amendments.

"We are aware that the claim has been set up that one of the proposed amendments which relates only to the league of nations does not require the assent of Germany. This is based on the fact that Germany is not yet a member of the league of nations and may not be for several years. The answer is, however, that the league covenant is a part of the treaty, and the league which is mentioned in many places in the treaty has much to do with German affairs, even though Germany is not a member. Germany, in agreeing to the treaty, has assented to the provisions of the covenant, and one of the provisions is that it can only be amended by the action of the league, which has not yet started, ratified by all the members of the council, which has not yet organized, as well as by a majority of the members of the assembly. It is obvious, therefore, if it is to be amended in any other way, Germany's assent will be just as necessary as to any other article of the treaty.

"RESERVATIONS.

"The reservations proposed by the majority of this committee are of such a character as at once betray their authorship. They are the work of Senators organized for the purpose of destroying the league and, if possible, defeating this treaty. Their phraseology is such as make this purpose plain. They are in no sense interpretative reservations to be used to make clear language in the treaty that might be considered doubtful, but they are so framed as to receive the support of Senators who desire the defeat of the treaty. While masquerading in the guise of reservations they are in fact alterations of the treaty. They have all the vices of amendments and the additional vice of pretending to be what they are not. Presented as parts of the resolution to ratify the treaty, they would in fact, if adopted, result in its defeat. All of them apply to the league of nations section of the treaty. Those who oppose the league of nations realize that it is invincible on a square fight and they hope to destroy it by this indirection.

"The league of nations has stood the test of world-wide criticism and unlimited attack. It stands to-day as the only hope for world peace. After all the assaults of many months its purposes and provisions stand out clearly defined, unaffected by criticism and unyielding to attack.

"THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

"The league of nations proposes to organize the nations of the world for peace whereas they have always heretofore been organized for war. It proposes to establish the rule of international justice in place of force. It proposes to make a war of conquest impossible by uniting all nations against the offender.

"It is the first international arrangement ever made by which small and weak nations are given the organized strength of the world for protection.

"It is a covenant between many nations by which each agrees not to do certain things which in the past have produced wars and to do many things which have been found to preserve the peace.

"It is a working plan for the gradual reduction of armament by all members simultaneously in proper proportion and by agreement.

"It sets up arbitration as a friendly method of adjusting disputes and inquiry when arbitration is not agreed to. In both cases it provides a cooling-off period of nine months during which the differences may be adjusted.

"It preserves the territorial integrity and political independence of each member and leaves to each the exercise of its sovereign rights as a nation.

"It will save the world from wars and preparations for wars. It will reduce armies and navies and taxes.

"It will help to remove the discontent with government in all countries by making government beneficient and devoting its revenues to constructive rather than to destructive purposes.

"It is the only plan proposed to redeem the world from war, pestilence, and famine. The only one by which a stricken world can be redeemed from the disasters of the late war and the dangers of impending international chaos. Those who dally and delay as they seek with miscroscopes to find some petty flaw in its structure have nothing themselves to propose. They have appealed to every prejudice and resorted to every desperate method of attack to destroy this great international effort to establish peace, but they suggest nothing in its place.

"They denounce the public demand for energetic action as 'clamor.' They rail at the President who with the representatives of many other nations has devoted months of hard work to a great constructive effort to settle the terms and reorganize the world for peace. Finally, unable to stem the tide of public demand for the league of nations they resort to so-called reservations in the hope that they can destroy by indirection what they have found unassailable by direct attack.

"We renew our recommendation that the work of the peace conference be confirmed, the will of the people fulfilled, and the peace of the world advanced by the ratification of this treaty—'the best hope of the world'—even if like all human instrumentalities it be not divinely perfect in every detail.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN:

A bill (S. 2987) granting a pension to George H. Fox; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SPENCER:

A bill (S. 2988) granting an increase of pension to John J. Hogan; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. ROBINSON:

A bill (S. 2989) for the relief of Walter I. Whitty (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. TOWNSEND:

A bill (S. 2990) granting an increase of pension to William H. Savage (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 2991) granting an increase of pension to John J. Scheitler (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

COUNCIL AND ASSEMBLY OF LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I introduce a bill to provide for the election of the representatives of the United States on the council and the assembly of the league of nations. I was undetermined as to which of six committees named it should go, but on reflection it seems to me that it should go to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The bill (S. 2986) to provide for the election of the representatives of the United States on the council and the assembly of the league of nations, and for other purposes, was read the first time by its title.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the proposed bill provides that the President shall nominate, and by and with the advice of the Senate shall appoint, the representative of the United States on the council of the league of nations and shall nominate, and by and with the advice of the Senate appoint, the delegates on the assembly of the league of nations, and that these appointees shall serve, unless withdrawn, until March 4, 1921.

The bill further provides that the electors chosen at the presidential elections hereafter shall also, immediately after they have balloted in their respective States for President and Vice President, proceed to ballot for one representative of the United States on the council of the league of nations, and then, after having taken those ballots, that they shall proceed to vote for the representatives on the assembly of the league of nations, and that in every instance the person receiving the highest number of votes shall be declared elected; but in case two or more persons shall have an equal number of votes, then the House of Representatives shall immediately elect, in such manner as it shall see fit, the representatives of the United States.

I have no pride of expression in the bill, but I ought to inform the Senate that I gave the bill three weeks of careful thought and have had the assistance of two experts.

Senators, of course, know that such a bill must become a law simultaneously with the ratification of the peace treaty—in whatsoever form the peace treaty shall be ratified—because we ought at least to support the President far enough to give him the authority to nominate the delegates, and I assume that every Senator here will agree that if we enter the league at all we should have delegates in the league.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I did not hear the first statement of the Senator from Arizona, but from what he later said I take it that it is a bill to regulate the manner of the selection of our representatives in the council and in the assembly.

Mr. ASHURST. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am glad the Senator has taken such care in the preparation of the bill. I myself introduced a bill several days ago carrying out the same idea, but I had not given it the attention so far as the details of the bill are concerned that I know the Senator has given to it. I agree with him that something along those lines ought to be done, and it ought to be done promptly.

Mr. ASHURST. The experts I consulted told me they had read the Senator's bill, and while in some respects they disagreed with it, it had the germs of some very fine ideas and suggestions.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Apparently it had exactly the same ideas expressed in the Senator's bill, but the details in his bill are carried out much better.

Mr. ASHURST. I regret that my proposed bill is so long, but it is impossible to set up machinery for elections by the Electoral College unless certain suitable verbiage is employed.

Now, there is one question of law. May the Congress of the United States impose on these electors this duty of electing the American delegates? In other words, has Congress the power under the Constitution to say to the electors that they may or shall vote for these representatives? As to the power of Congress to lay this duty on the electors there can be no doubt. The electors are purely State officials, and by decisions of many courts the electors are held to be analogous to the legislatures when they sat to elect United States Senators, and the courts have therefore held that the electors who are State officials may perform this duty, but they may refuse if they see fit. We could not compel the electors to sit. We could not by any writ known to our laws compel the electors to ballot for President and for Vice President. Likewise we could pass no law that would require the electors to perform this function.

Let me remind the Senate that when the selective-service law was challenged it was held by the Supreme Court of the United States that it was too obvious even for discussion that Congress could lay duties upon certain State officials which the State officials could perform.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask the Senator whether the bill provides any limitation upon the powers of the American member of the council?

Mr. ASHURST. None whatever, except that he may be removed or impeached just the same as may any civil officer of the United States.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does not the Senator think it would be wise to place some limitation on his power or at least require a submission to the Government at Washington of certain questions which the council might be called upon to consider?

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator for raising that question. The truth is I was pressed so hard for time with reference to the legal question in the bill that I did not go into that field. I felt that the Foreign Relations Committee ought to suggest such amendment thereto. I have dealt simply with the legal phases and with the task of setting up the machinery of the election. The terms of the delegates are coterminous with that of the President and expire on the 4th of March, 1921, and every four years thereafter. Their compensation is $20,000 per annum and 5 cents per mile from their home to the seat of the league and back.

Mr. JONES of Washington. May I state to the Senator that in the bill I introduced I had a provision in substance providing that the representatives should not give their consent to any proposition that involved the use of the military or naval forces of the United States without first submitting the matter and getting action by Congress? Is there any provision of that sort in the Senator's bill?

Mr. ASHURST. I think the Senator's suggestion is good, but that is now the law, and no treaty that could possibly be made could take the power from Congress to declare war. It would be impossible to make such a treaty. I felt that it was surplusage, but I am glad to have the suggestion made.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That could not be if the treaty should be ratified as it is?

Mr. ASHURST. Oh, no.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Under the treaty our representatives in the council and in the assembly could give their consent to such action without waiting for action by Congress. That is the reason why I thought, in line with the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], we ought to put something in the legislation requiring them before consenting to such important things to submit them to Congress. Of course, we know they could not declare war, but they could give their consent to a proposition that would practically compel Congress to declare war or subject our country to great humiliation.

Mr. ASHURST. I have no objection to such an amendment, but it is so axiomatic, so clear, and so positive that none of our representatives abroad could embroil us in war without submitting it to Congress that I did not even think it necessary to put it in. Congress alone declares war.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to ask the Senator another question. I had a provision in the bill I introduced that the United States will withdraw from the league in two years unless all the other members of the league within that time shall have abolished by due and regular legislative authority the policy of conscription for the maintenance of their armies during times of peace.

Mr. ASHURST. A wise suggestion; but it is a field into which I did not go because it is surplusage. Every Senator here knows that Congress can abrogate a treaty whenever it sees fit. Congress abrogates a treaty whenever it wants to do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill, having been read the first time, will lie on the table.

NEUTRALIZATION OF TRANSPORTATION IN CHINA.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 183), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, requested to send to the Senate a copy of the report made by Mr. Paul Whitham on "Neutralization of transportation in China."

FOREIGN CREDITS.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 184), which was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Whereas the credits established by the Secretary of the Treasury in favor of foreign Governments at the close of business September 2, 1919, had reached a total of $9,684,272,567.84, divided as follows:

Belgium	$343,445,000.00
Cuba	10,000,000.00
Czechoslovakia	55,330,000.00
France	3,047,974,777.24
Great Britain	4,316,000,000.00
Greece	48,236,629.05
Italy	1,618,775,945.99
Liberia	5,000,000.00
Roumania	25,000,000.00
Russia	187,729,750.00
Serbia	26,780,465.56

and

Whereas it is anticipated by the Treasury Department that further credits will be required for the purpose of enabling certain of these governments to meet their commitments already made in this country in connection with the prosecution of the war; and

Whereas the President in a recent address expressed the opinion that an estimate of four or five billions as the additional sum which the United States will be called upon to advance for the rehabilitation of credit and industry on the other side of the water is a reasonable and conservative estimate; and

Whereas in the opinion of the Senate the rivalry of nations in the increase of armaments is a most prolific cause of war, and a continuance of such rivalry at the present time is totally subversive of the principles and theories upon which the Senate is urged to ratify the league covenant and the treaty of peace, and therefore such increases of armament should not be added or made possible by loans of the resources or credit of the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that no further advances of the money or credit of the United States should be made to any foreign government except upon satisfactory evidence that no part of such advances, and no part of the funds of the government soliciting them, is being used, or to be used, for the increase of armaments or for any military purpose aside from a reasonable and publicly declared provision for security against internal violence and disorder or for carrying out the military obligations incurred in the war against Germany and her allies.

AGREEMENT BETWEEN GREAT BRITAIN AND PERSIA (S. DOC. NO. 90).

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD, and also as a Senate document, the agreement between His Britannic Majesty's Government and the Persian Government. A portion of it has been printed in the record of the hearings of the Foreign Relations Committee. It is not very easily accessible. It contains also the agreements relating to the loans to be made to Persia and correspondence between the British representative and His Highness Vossug-ed-Dowleh, all of which I think it would be well to have in a convenient form for the consideration of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"AGREEMENT BETWEEN HIS BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT AND THE PERSIAN GOVERNMENT, SIGNED AT TEHERAN, AUGUST 9, 1919.

"NO. 1.—AGREEMENT BETWEEN THE GOVERNMENTS OF GREAT BRITAIN AND PERSIA.

"Preamble.—In virtue of the close ties of friendship which have existed between the two Governments in the past, and in the conviction that it is in the essential and mutual interests of both in future that these ties should be cemented, and that the progress and prosperity of Persia should be promoted to the utmost, it is hereby agreed between the Persian Government on the one hand and His Britannic Majesty's minister, acting on behalf of his Government, on the other, as follows:

"1. The British Government reiterate, in the most categorical manner, the undertakings which they have repeatedly given in the past to respect absolutely the independence and integrity of Persia.

"2. The British Government will supply, at the cost of the Persian Government, the services of whatever expert advisers may, after consultation between the two Governments, be considered necessary for the several departments of the Persian administration. These advisers shall be engaged on contracts and endowed with adequate powers, the nature of which shall be the matter of agreement between the Persian Government and the advisers.

"3. The British Government will supply, at the cost of the Persian Government, such officers and such munitions and equipment of modern type as may be adjudged necessary by a joint commission of military experts, British and Persian, which shall assemble forthwith for the purpose of estimating the needs of Persia in respect of the formation of a uniform force which the Persian Government proposes to create for the establishment and preservation of order in the country and on its frontiers.

"4. For the purpose of financing the reforms indicated in clauses 2 and 3 of this agreement, the British Government offer to provide or arrange a substantial loan for the Persian Government, for which adequate security shall be sought by the two Governments in consultation in the revenues of the customs or other sources of income at the disposal of the Persian Government. Pending the completion of negotiations for such a loan the British Government will supply on account of it such funds as may be necessary for initiating the said reforms.

"5. The British Government fully recognizing the urgent need which exists for the improvement of communications in Persia, with a view both to the extension of trade and the prevention of famine, are prepared to cooperate with the Persian Government for the encouragement of Anglo-Persian enterprise in this direction, both by means of railway construction and other forms of transport, subject always to the examination of the problems by experts and to agreement between the two Governments as to the particular projects which may be most necessary, practicable, and profitable.

"6. The two Governments agree to the appointment forthwith of a joint committee of experts for the examination and revision of the existing customs tariff with a view to its reconstruction on a basis calculated to accord with the legitimate interests of the country and to promote its prosperity.

"Signed at Teheran, August 9, 1919.

"NO. 2.—AGREEMENT RELATING TO LOAN OF £2,000,000, AT 7 PER CENT, REDEEMABLE IN 20 YEARS.

"Preamble: Contract between the British Government and the Persian Government with reference to an agreement concluded this day between the said Governments. It is agreed as follows:

"ARTICLE 1. The British Government grant a loan of £2,000,000 sterling to the Persian Government, to be paid to the Persian Government as required in such installments and at such dates as may be indicated by the Persian Government after the British financial adviser shall have taken up the duties of his office at Teheran, as provided for in the aforesaid agreement.

"ART. 2. The Persian Government undertakes to pay interest monthly at the rate of 7 per cent per annum upon sums advanced in accordance with article 1 up to March 20, 1921, and thereafter to pay monthly such amount as will suffice to liquidate the principal sum and interest thereon at 7 per cent per annum in 20 years.

"ART. 3. All the revenues and customs receipts assigned in virtue of the contract of May 8, 1911 (see No. 3), for the repayment of the loan of £1,250,000, are assigned for the repayment of the present loan with continuity of all conditions stipulated in the said contract and with priority over all debts other than the 1911 loan and subsequent advances made by the British Government. In case of insufficiency of the receipts indicated above, the Persian Government undertakes to make good the necessary sums from other resources, and for this purpose the Persian Government hereby assigns to the service of the present loan, and of the other advances above mentioned, in priority and with continuity of conditions stipulated in the aforesaid contract, the customs receipts of all other regions, in so far as these receipts are or shall be at its disposal.

"ART. 4. The Persian Government will have the right of repayment of the present loan at any date out of the proceeds of any British loan which it may contract for.

"Signed at Teheran, August 9, 1919.

"NO. 3.—ARTICLE 5 OF CONTRACT BETWEEN THE PERSIAN GOVERNMENT AND THE IMPERIAL BANK OF PERSIA RELATING TO THE PERSIAN GOVERNMENT 5 PER CENT LOAN OF £1,250,000 OF MAY 8, 1911. (INCLUDED FOR REFERENCE.)

"5. The Imperial Government of Persia specially assigns to the service of the loan, and as a first charge thereon, subject only to prior charges amounting to £15,714 1s. 10d. per annum for three years, and £30,278 12s. 7d. per annum from the year 1913 to the year 1928. The full net customs receipts of every description which the Government now is, or at any time hereafter may be, entitled to collect and receive at all ports or places in the Persian Gulf, including Bushire, Bunder Abbas, Lingah, Mohammerah, and Ahwaz, which receipts are hereby made payable to the bank, and the Imperial Government of Persia hereby engages forthwith after receipt thereof to pay to the bank all such customs receipts as aforesaid without deduction other than for actual expenses of administration of the customs of the said ports disbursed prior to the date of such payment.

"(a) The Imperial Government of Persia undertakes that throughout the continuance of the loan all sums collected by the customs administration shall be paid to the bank at the ports of collection, or at its nearest branch, week by week, for meeting the prior charges referred to above and for the service of the loan, and an account of such receipts shall be submitted to the Persian Government by the bank at the end of each month.

"(b) The bank shall, out of the moneys so collected, pay the prior charges, above mentioned, and the interest and sinking fund of the loan, and shall hold the surplus at the disposal of the Imperial Government of Persia.

"(c) The bank undertakes, out of the moneys so received, to pay on behalf of the Imperial Government of Persia the half-yearly coupon in London, and supervise the working of the sinking fund and service of the loan free of charges connected with the same.

"(d) In the event of the customs receipts of the above-mentioned ports for any three months falling short of the amount required for the prior charges and the service of the loan, either for interest or amortization, the Imperial Government of Persia binds itself to make good such deficiency from other sources of Government revenue, and, further, should receipts from these sources fall below the amount required, as above, the Persian Government hereby assigns for this purpose the revenue derived from the receipts of the telegraphs—this assignment to constitute a second charge on the said telegraph receipts up to the year 1928, after which the telegraph receipts will be free.

"NO. 4.—SIR P. COX TO HIS HIGHNESS VOSSUG-ED-DOWLEH.

"BRITISH LEGATION,
"Teheran, August 9, 1919.

"YOUR HIGHNESS: I trust your highness has been able, during your successful direction of affairs of the Persian State, to convince yourself that His Britannic Majesty's Government have always endeavored to support to the utmost the efforts of your highness's cabinet on the one hand to restore order and security in the interior of the country and on the other to maintain a policy of close cooperation between the Persian and British Governments.

"As further evidence of the good will by which the cabinet of London is inspired, I am now authorized to inform your highness that, in the event of the agreement regarding projects of reforms which your Government contemplates introducing in Persia being concluded, His Britannic Majesty's Government will be prepared in due course to cooperate with the Persian Government with a view to the realization of the following desiderata:

"1. The revision of the treaties actually in force between the two powers.

"2. The claim of Persia to compensation for material damage suffered at the hands of other belligerents.

"3. The rectification of the frontier of Persia at the points where it is agreed upon by the parties to be justifiable.

"The precise manner, time, and means to be chosen for pursuing these aims shall be discussed, as soon as practicable, by the two Governments.

"I have, etc.,

"P. Z. COX.

"NO. 5.—SIR P. COX TO HIS HIGHNESS VOSSUG-ED-DOWLEH.

"BRITISH LEGATION,
"Teheran, August 9, 1919.

"YOUR HIGHNESS: With reference to the second desideratum indicated in my previous letter of to-day's date, it is understood and agreed between the two Governments reciprocally that on the one hand His Majesty's Government will not claim from the Government of His Majesty the Shah the cost of the maintenance of British troops which His Majesty's Government were obliged to send to Persia owing to Persia's want of power to defend her neutrality, and that on the other hand the Persian Government will not claim from the British Government an indemnity for any damage which may have been caused by the said troops during their presence in Persian territory.

"It is to be understood, however, that this agreement of the two parties does not in any way affect the claims of individuals and private institutions, which will be dealt with independently.

"A note from your highness informing me that you accept this position on behalf of the Persian Government will suffice to record the agreement of the two Governments on this subject.

"I have, etc.,

CITY POLICE AND LABOR UNIONS.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I desire to read a few headlines from an article in the Washington Post of this morning in relation to the results of the strike of the Policemen's Union in Boston now in existence. I read:

Kill three in Boston riot—Two men and boy dead; troops use machine guns—Many others are wounded—Woman shot in arm and aged policeman badly beaten up—Cavalrymen hit by bottles in Scollay Square disturbances—Guardsmen forced to fire on mob in South Boston—Threat of labor unions to join police in sympathetic strike causes alarm.

Then follows an Associated Press article which describes the looting, robbery, and criminality of nearly every kind which is now in full sway in Boston. Alongside of that article the Post prints another article advocating the unionization of the police forces of the country. Looking now to the column which contains the index to to-day's issue of the Post, the first item which I read is "Police get aid of Wilson." The next item is "Fatal rioting in Boston." I ask that the portion of the article which I have marked be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Thursday, Sept. 11, 1919.]

[By the Associated Press.]

BOSTON, September 10.

Two men and a boy were killed to-night in turbulent riots growing out of the police strike. There were numerous injuries of a minor nature to members of mobs, police officers, and State guardsmen.

The most serious disturbances were in the vicinity of Scollay Square and South Boston. Cavalrymen charged the crowds, and a machine gun was used, one man being killed and several wounded by its fire. At a late hour the mob was still uncontrolled.

Property damage was slight compared to that inflicted by the wild rampage of hoodlums last night.

FEAR SYMPATHETIC STRIKES.

One of the most serious elements in the complicated outlook was the possibility of sympathetic strikes by labor unions which have declared their support of the policemen's union. Like the patrolmen's organization, most of these unions are affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. The State branch of the federation, at its annual convention in Greenfield to-day, instructed all Boston unions to vote to-morrow night on the question of action to back up the policemen.

Scollay Square was thronged all day and well into the night. The crowd early became riotous and cavalrymen were sent to disperse it.

WOMAN WOUNDED IN ARM.

The mob surged in and out of the square. Shots were fired and an unidentified man was killed. A woman was wounded in the arm, a middle-aged volunteer policeman was so badly beaten up that he was removed to a hospital and three cavalrymen were hit over the head by bottles and other missiles, and also were given hospital treatment. After Infantry reinforcements arrived the square was finally cleared.

The South Boston district, which was so turbulent last night, was considered one of the worst danger spots, and a large force of troops was thrown in there early in the night. For some time they held in check the mobs of polyglot residents of the peninsula section, but late at night conditions were so menacing that a machine-gun crew was rushed over aid them.

STONES HURLED AT SOLDIERS.

So fierce was the resistance of the angry crowd to the efforts of the guardsmen to preserve some sort of order that guns were leveled and the machine gun was put in position. All sorts of missiles were hurled at the guardsmen. A shower of stones so endangered the soldiers that that the machine-gun crew was ordered to fire. One man was killed and several were wounded.

Windows were broken in different parts of the city but there was little looting.

FIVE THOUSAND TROOPS HOLD STREETS.

Boston was under military rule to-night. After 24 hours of lawlessness such as the city has never before experienced, a sense of security was afforded an outraged public by the appearance in the streets of 5,000 soldiers under orders to restore order and protect life and property at any cost.

A troop of State Guard Cavalry, dashing at full sped in company front with drawn sabers, cleared Scollay and Adams Squares to-night of thousands who had jammed those places since early to-day. Both squares had been the scenes of intermittent rioting and when the Cavalry approached a small group of loyal police officers were maintaining a semblance of order with the greatest difficulty.

BAYONETS DRIVE GAMBLERS.

Gangs of gamblers who have infested Avery Street between Washington and Tremont since last night were driven out at the point of the bayonet by a company of State guardsmen to-night. There were 15 dice games in progress, with about 2,000 participants and spectators, when the troops arrived. At double-quick time the soldiers drove the crowd before them and then stationed guards, closing the street.

Fifty-three members of the Metropolitan police force who have been on emergency duty during the strike and who were ordered to patrol Scollay Square, to-night refused and were immediately suspended. They marched in a body to headquarters of the policemen's union and took out applications for membership.

MAYOR ASKS FOR MORE TROOPS.

It was noon to-day when Mayor Peters assumed control of what was left of the police department and called upon the commander of the Tenth Regiment of the State Guard to assist him in preserving order. At the same time he asked Gov. Coolidge for additional troops from outside the city. The governor immediately called out the Fourth Brigade, comprising men from cities and towns in the metropolitan district, and this evening he ordered out the Fourteenth Infantry from the Cape and the Twentieth Infantry from western Massachusetts. Boston also furnished a motor transport corps, a troop of cavalry, and an ambulance company.

GOVERNOR REBUKES MAYOR.

A wave of public indignation against the city and State officials followed the excesses of last night, when the city virtually was abandoned to hoodlums. From the governor's office came an implied rebuke in the statement that the governor had been ready for two days to meet a request for assistance from the mayor. Mayor Peters in a statement accused the governor of trying to place upon him a responsibility that rested with Police Commissioner Curtis, an appointee of the governor. The mayor said Curtis had assured him that the aid of the State Guard was not needed, and that he (the mayor) had no authority to call for troops until disturbances had actually occurred.

Scarcely a district in the city failed this morning to show evidences of lawlessness.

In some instances trucks were backed up to stores whose windows had been smashed and deliberately loaded with loot. Numberless persons were robbed. Dice games for varying stakes were boldly opened in the streets and on Boston Common, where professional gamblers found men with money. One man on the Common had just pocketed gains of $200 when he was knocked in the head and his "roll" taken. Other crimes of a revolting nature were committed. Unprotected women were brutally assaulted.

CRITICISMS START FIGHTS.

Criticism of the police and of the city officials, who were accused of not acting promptly and firmly, led to frequent fist fights, in which many joined. The nerves of the people seemed to be on edge, and it didn't take much provocation to start a row.

The municipal courts had all the business to which they could attend. Many persons were given sentences of six months for rioting or because loot was found upon them.

Secret-service men who watched the railroad stations carefully to-day said that crooks were coming into the city by every train. One officer said that he recognized a criminal whom he had not seen for five years, and that a large number of the crooks were "old timers."

Mr. MYERS. Without reading the article in its entirety, it having been put into the RECORD of yesterday, I quote some headlines from the Evening Star, of this city, of last evening. The headlines which I read are the headlines to the Star's Associated Press dispatch about the looting and crime in Boston, growing out of the policemen's strike. I read as follows:

[From the Evening Star, Washington, D. C., Wednesday, Sept. 10, 1919.]

State guards called to suppress disorder due to police strike—Boston authorities unable to stem the tide of lawlessness—Looting of stores goes on unchecked—Scenes approaching anarchy frequently observed in the important business districts.

Some other headlines in the body of the article are: "City abandoned to hoodlums"; "Destruction in downtown Boston"; "Attacks on women frequent"; "Walkout signal for rowdyism"; "Three men shot, one stabbed"; "Volunteers on beats hooted." Some excerpts from the article are:

Lawlessness was rampant in Boston to-day. Without adequate police protection private citizens were left to their own resources to protect their lives and property.

Since the police struck at 5.45 o'clock yesterday afternoon there has been no organized police power able to cope with the situation, that last night approached anarchy and to-day appeared to grow more serious as the inadequacy of the makeshift arrangements intended to preserve public order became obvious to the criminally inclined.

Last night the city was virtually abandoned to the hoodlum and the criminal.

Downtown Boston presented a sad picture this morning. The systematic looting has ceased apparently with the coming of daylight, but evidences of last night's lawlessness were plentiful. On Washington Street near School Street the whole glass front of a haberdashery had been smashed. Around the corner, on School Street, Walton's Café looked as if it had been struck by a cyclone. All 10 of the Walton Cafés in the city, where there is a strike on, were looted.

Attacks on women throughout the night were frequent and atrocious. In numerous parts of the city there were villainous assaults. The vicious element suffered the most, but according to reports no woman was safe in the little-frequented districts or where the streets were not brilliantly illuminated.

Rowdyism started almost with the walkout of the patrolmen last night. Thousands of persons gathered about the police stations before 6 p. m., and when the officers emerged in civilian clothes or without insignia or equipment they were greeted with cheers and jeers, and at some stations youths with grudges against certain officers threw mud, sticks, and stones. These crowds were dispersed by superior officers and loyal patrolmen.

In South Boston rowdyism and looting started early and continued through the night. Windows in whole blocks of stores were broken and their contents scattered. Those who could not get near the windows were able to buy rare bargains in wearing apparel and cheap jewelry from others who were overstocked.

Threats that the street car, telephone, and lighting systems will be tied up if necessary to force matters for the police have been made, and the possibilities of the resulting situation were described as appalling by many to-day.

Mr. President, there you have the results of unionization of police forces. There is a sample. I think no argument against it other than these newspaper articles is needed. I think it is apparent that if anything is done to stop the unionization of the police force of the District of Columbia it must be done by Congress. I have appeared before the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred my joint resolution to prevent the payment of salaries to any policemen of the District of Columbia who remain in a union which is affiliated with a superior body of organized labor. I have appeared before the committee and urged prompt and favorable action on my joint resolution, and that is all I can do. The next step must be taken by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

I have no more interest in this matter than has any other Senator; I am not a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia; but there has been considerable talk on the floor of the Senate and in the cloakrooms of the Senate about the dangers that confront us from threatened unionization of police forces. It appeared to me that somebody should undertake to start action against those dangers, and I took it upon myself to do so. Unless Congress interferes it is evident that within a short time the police force of the District of Columbia will be unionized and affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. If that be permitted to take place, I predict that in 60 days the police force of every city and town in the United States of 5,000 population and upwards will be unionized and affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. When that step is complete, I predict that the next step will be the unionization of the Army and Navy of this country.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. MYERS. I yield to the Senator from Colorado with pleasure.

Mr. THOMAS. I presume the Senator from Montana saw the telegram in the morning paper from Mr. Tumulty, representing the President, the effect of which is to turn the police force of the District over to the American Federation of Labor?

Mr. MYERS. I did, and I have just remarked, which the Senator probably did not hear, because he was otherwise engrossed, that it is evident if anything is to be done to prevent the police force of the District of Columbia from being unionized and affiliated with the American Federation of Labor it must be done by Congress; and I think it is time for the Committee on the District of Columbia and Congress to act.

As I was saying when interrupted, when the police forces of this country are unionized, which I predict will be inside of 60 days, unless something is done by some branch of the Government to stop it, the next step will be to unionize the Army and Navy. It would be no more inconsistent in principle with the genius of our institutions for the Army or Navy to be unionized than for the police forces of the country to be unionized; I can see no difference whatever. The police forces of the country have no more right to be unionized and to put themselves under a superior body of organized labor than has the Army.

When the police forces of the country and the Army of the country are unionized, the next thing will be a soviet form of government for this Nation. Unless something be done to stem the tide, I predict that within two years we will have a soviet form of government here. The Democratic and Republican Parties are busily engaged now in scheming to carry the next presidential election, but if things keep on going the way they are now going we may have a soviet government in this country before the next presidential election.

I believe that an ominous condition of affairs confronts our country. The workers in the steel industry have already called a strike for the 22d of this month. I believe that it will soon be followed by a nation-wide strike of the railroad employees of the country and then by a nation-wide strike of the coal miners' unions of the country. I do not believe that the conference which is to be called here in October between the leaders of labor and capital will prevent those occurrences, unless every demand of the railroad workers and the coal miners be granted. I believe the railroad employees and coal miners will not compromise one iota. I believe that some of the more radical of their leaders and agitators are purposely making demands which they know can not be granted, in order to bring on nation-wide railroad and coal miners' strikes at the beginning of winter, in order that the people of this country may be confronted with freezing and starving conditions. Then, with the police forces of the country unionized and the Army probably by that time unionized, it takes no stretch of the imagination to realize what may become of this country before next spring. Therefore, I believe Congress should act, and act promptly.

I am not unfriendly to organized labor within its legitimate sphere and so long as it confines itself within the bounds of reason; but I am not in favor of a government of labor unions, for labor unions, by labor unions, to which the District of Columbia appears to be rapidly drifting. In fact, the whole country seems to be headed that way.

To my mind it is no more improbable that the Army will be unionized in the near future than that the police force will be, I have always regarded the policemen of this country as being as intelligent and as faithful and sensible and loyal as its soldiers. I do not believe that all of the policemen of this country have been struck by an identical thought at the same psychological moment and that they simultaneously and voluntarily decided to unionize. There are efforts on foot now, I understand, to unionize the police forces of 50 cities of this country. I do not believe that, in a psychological moment or wave of psychic thought, that idea occurred to the police forces of all those cities at the same time. I believe somebody else is back of this movement and putting the policemen up to it. I believe that they have had it put into their heads by some other influence, and the same influence, if it succeeds in unionizing the police forces of the entire country, is very likely to undertake to inject the same ideas into the Army of the country. The time to stop the movement is now.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. HARDING obtained the floor.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HARDING. I do.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gronna	Lodge	Sheppard
Ball	Hale	McCumber	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Harding	McKellar	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Harris	McLean	Smoot

Mr. GERRY. The senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] are absent from the Senate on official business. I wish also to announce that the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] are detained from the Senate on public business, and that the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY] is detained on business of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

THE LEAGUE COVENANT.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, if it were not for seeming indifference in an hour of imperiled nationality, I believe I should be content to rest my expression on the pending treaty wholly to the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations. I say this with propriety, I think, because I had no part in its writing, though I was a participant in the conclusions reached. My judgment is that it is one of the American documents well worthy of preservation.

Mr. President, every day of discussion, presidential utterances included, and every hour of study combine to persuade me that the league of nations venture in the form in which the covenant has been negotiated is one of peril to the Republic. To accept it unaltered would be a betrayal of America. It is not for me to consider constitutional inhibitions. There is probably nothing to prevent a nation undertaking self-destruction by indirection or otherwise if the treaty-making powers are in accord about the desirability of such a course. Nor is it for me to discuss the finer points involved in international law and diplomatic niceties, because once the league is established it becomes the maker of international law and diplomacy ends in league autocracy.

Such impressions as I wish to offer are the very simple ones of an American who is jealous of the Republic's nationality and fears paralysis in that internationality which is the league's loftiest aim. Submerged nationality and supreme internationality are more to be expected than the proclaimed permanency of peace, which first caught the sympathy and support of a peace-loving world.

Mr. President, I know the natural aspirations of civilized humanity and share them. I know how the heart of the world, torn and bleeding and anguished and palpitant in the cataclysmal war, throbs in hunger for assured tranquillity. I pity him who has not felt the yearnings within his own breast. No real American is so bereft of feeling. There is no monopoly of the love of peace, and there is no exclusiveness in concern for humanity's sake. Neither is there a limited circle of those who act in patriotic devotion nor restricted groups in loving our common country. I say these perfectly obvious things because it is time to clear up some mistaken impressions. The proponents of the Wilsonian league of nations have no more claim to an exclusive desire for the peace of our country and the world than the opponents of this league have exclusive claim to patriotic devotion to our own Nation. And the considerable numbers who are grieving that there is involved in the treaty-making power a portion of the Senate which is impelled by partisan bias ought to revise their judgment, because it is as unfair and uncomplimentary to one side as the other and challenges the wisdom of popular government. However, if disagreement with the Executive, now that the war is won, is to invite the charge of narrow partisanship, I welcome it and am content to let it go at that.

It was the truth, last year, two years ago, three and four years ago, the people of this country were heedlessly and overwhelmingly for a league of nations, or a society of nations, or a world court, or some international association which should develop a fraternity of action among civilized peoples and save humanity not only from the sorrows and sufferings like those which came with the war now ended, but from the involvements of which we are not yet emerged. Many leaders of the party represented on this side of the Chamber were conspicuous in its advocacy, and thousands less notable joined the chorus. Among the latter I joined in writing a favoring declaration in the platform of the Republican Party in Ohio, which I think fairly voiced the aspirations of the people of that State. In the popular thought was the wish to abolish war and promote peace and make justice supreme, and it was believed that the world, war wearied and drenched with the blood of millions of devoted nationalists, would be ready for the committal. Our people were thinking of the thing desired, and never pondered the method or the cost of its making. Nobody stopped to think of the involvements then. We are only learning them now.

It would have been well to have counseled with one another before the covenant was fashioned. The people voted such a preference most emphatically last November. Most people thought there would be counseling, and it ought to have been done. When the armistice brought humanity's greatest sigh of relief since fellowship engirdled the earth, it was the common thought that sympathy would inspire and justice would impel and safety would demand some created agency of the conscience of the world that should contribute to the furtherance of peace and maintained tranquillity. But the immediate task was the settlement of the war suspended by the armistice. The manifest yearning was for recovery from madness and destruction and waste and disorder, and the instincts of self-preservation called for speedy restoration. No one doubted that the measureless cost and unspeakable suffering would awaken the consciences of nations to take stock of their relationships and readjust them to guard against recurrent horrors. But the pressing call was for peace, peace among the belligerent powers, peace for convalescence, peace for deliberation, peace for that understanding which is the first essential in undertaking a world-wide covenant which mankind had never effected heretofore.

No one can doubt the advantageous position of this Republic when the armistice was signed. We had proven our unselfishness. We alone had not won the war, but our entrance into the conflict in April, 1917, saved the waning morale of allied nations which bore the brunt of German attack, and our first expeditionary forces in the summer of 1917 revived the drooping spirits of the fighting forces of France and England, and in 1918 the sons of this Republic turned the sweeping tide of battle backward. It is not unseemly to say our forces were an absolutely essential factor in the winning, though our 2,000,000 of fighting and irresistible Americans were only a partial expression of our resources and our resolution that Germany and her allies must be brought to terms. It is a glorious record which calls for no recital here. I am trying only to call to mind our advantageous position—the gratitude of the powers with whom we were associated, the belated realization and respect of the Central Powers, the tardy awakening of Germany, who learned the lesson that Americans could and would fight, and the world's understanding of our unselfishness in the defense of our national rights.

The loftiness of our position was correctly and creditably appraised, notwithstanding the excessive proclamation of democracy and humanity. The latter was mainly for home consumption. It may be taken as one of the inevitable things in popular government, it was distinctly a symptom of our neglect of the American spirit. Those who stop to analyze know, of course, that if the German assault had been aimed at the world's democracy—our defense of democracy ought to have answered with every American gun when Belgium was invaded. And the same analytical thought must have persuaded the thinking American that if it was our duty to make war for humanity's sake, duty called loudly above the horrified exclamation of the world when the Lusitania was sunk without pity for dying humanity on her unsuspecting decks. I am not indulging in belated complaint, because I knew the tremendous seriousness of plunging the Republic in war, and I knew then our unreadiness of spirit for such a committal. The point I am aiming at is to clarify our purpose in entering the war in order to emphasize our favorable position when it came to an end. The everlasting truth is that we were lashed by German ruthlessness to a defense of our national rights, and we did defend them, until Germany's power for ruthlessness has been destroyed beyond recovery for generations to come. We defended only our rights, and we know now, if we did not realize before, that the nation which does not defend its national rights does not deserve to survive. We did not ask more, except to help in righteous restoration, and the world correctly appraised the unselfishness which marked our efforts.

It was a very simple course to have taken. Ours was a commanding voice in the adjustments of peace, willingly and gladly heeded. It was ours to pass judgment on the terms of peace and speed their conclusion. I must confess, Senators, I could find no fault with the President going to the peace table. The world had never seen before such an opportunity for service, and I thought it fitting that the first citizen of the Republic should go and utter the unbiased advice of America amid the embitterments and prejudices that had grown out of twenty centuries of European conflict. I do not share the criticism that he invited no Members of this body, which must approve every treaty to which the Republic is committed. I do complain that in this most extraordinary and unparalleled wreck in the wake of world-wide war he consented to counsel and advise with none who have sworn duties to perform, and devoted, essentially alone, his talents and his supreme influence to reformations and restitutions, and the establishments of governments and the realizations of ambitions and the fulfillment of dreams which human struggles and battling peoples and heroic sacrifices have not effected since the world began, and never will be realized until that millennial day that marks the beginning of heaven on earth. The situation presented intensely practical problems, and he clung mainly to lofty theories.

Sometimes I think a very capable writer of history is very much spoiled for the making of it. I can recall now my reverent regard for Julius Cæsar when I struggled with his recital of the wars in Gaul. It required a wider reading before I realized that the great commoner of that day was making history and recording it for the effect it might and did have south of the Rubicon. It is easy to understand the perfectly natural and laudable ambition to do the superlative thing which history is waiting to record, which superlative thing was in the historian's mind, but it needed penetrating vision to meet the pressing, practical problems which were awaiting solution, by very practical men.

One can conceive the idealist who is blind to the bald realities of secret covenants and selfish bartering incident to the alliances wrought amid the anxieties and necessities of so stupendous a war. Nations were battling for their very existence, and they made pledges with little reckoning of the future. It was assumed our Government knew the details, but the assumption was a mistaken one. The President frankly said he did not know. Merely fighting in our own defense, it was excusable for us not to know, for we should have given to our utmost of lives and treasure regardless of the aftermath. But in joining the struggle professedly for democracy's sake, we ought to have had some forecast of democracy's fate in the pregnant aftermath. More, to meddle effectively in the affairs of the world, we ought to have known the world's promises. Herein lies the weakness of our whole part at the peace table.

The war had its inception in German ambition, expanded domain, if not world domination, all conceived in drunkenness with power. It was met in self-defense—righteous self-defense—but there was inevitable consideration of the spoils of victory. They became the inspiration and consideration of alliances, and there were understandings, written and unwritten. We should be blind not to recognize the necessity and naturalness of it. The pity is that we did not recognize the evident truth and speak with the confident voice of justice, and hold ourselves aloof from any committal which savored of unrighteousness. If Europe, in the stress of war or out of it, will barter in territories and peoples, we can not hinder, but we need not approve and surely we must not guarantee.

Whether the President knew the details of negotiated selfishness while the war was raging, it was inevitable that he soon learned when he made his triumphant landing on the friendly soil of France. It was not then too late to hold aloof. We were seeking only peace. We sought no territory, no mandatory, no reparation—nothing was asked. Our unselfishness was genuine, to the everlasting honor of this Republic. But the glory of the league of nations—an appealing conception—filled the American commission's vision, while distinctly American interests—aye, sacred American interests—were ignored and forgotten in a new and consuming concern for the world.

Empires and sovereign States, autocratic, imperial, or democratic, had fought and sacrificed and bargained and covenanted—and we had fought with them—and they craved peace and we craved peace. But they wanted annexations and extensions and creations, and they wanted this Republic, with its resources—with its wealth of men and materials—to guarantee the changes they had wrought, and wanted the United States of America in their unselfishness to guarantee in perpetuity the selfishness of the Old World.

They had nothing to offer us but the phantasmal thing, taking the elusory shape of the image of peace, a promise deeply appealing to the aspirations of ourselves and the world, for tranquillity and the banishment of war. And we bargained for it, and then they fashioned it into a reality, suited to serve Europe and the Orient as the seal of righteousness on all to which the allied powers had agreed.

Mr. President, I grant the worthiness, the loftiness of the ideal when we look above and beyond the immorality which it cloaks. One must concede the good which is aimed at. No one who is sincere can question the desirability of closer fraternity among the nations of the earth. No thoughtful citizen of any country will dispute the need of the clarification and codification of international law. Such a thing might have saved us from involvement in the European war, unless Germany was madly determined to effect her own destruction.

International arbitration and a world court for justiciable disputes appeal to all who think justice is sustained in reason rather than in armed dispute. The establishment of an agency for the revelation of the moral judgment of the world can never be amiss. These things might well have come out of the combined consciences of the nations awakened to new ideals amid the sufferings of war, and they will yet come. But it does not require a supergovernment to effect them, nor the surrender of nationality and independence of action to sanction them.

It is my deliberate conviction that the league of nations covenant, as negotiated at Paris and signed at Versailles, either creates a supergovernment of the nations which enter it or it will prove the colossal disappointment of the ages. Though it would be vastly more serious as the former, I can not believe this Republic ought to sanction it in either case. Why proclaim a promise that will embitter the world's disappointment?

Let us note, first, the probability of disappointment. Does it effect disarmament? The member nations decide for themselves the necessary size of their armed forces, which are not to be increased except with the league's approval. Of course there is to be studied recommendation for reduction, but any two powers in concerted action may reject the entire program. Who has heard of a proposal to diminish the great British Navy, which holds Great Britain undisputed mistress of the world's seas? Few will question Great Britain's wisdom in her well-known attitude. Surely no British subject will question it. She has an empire to defend and a commerce to guard, without which England's glory is at an end.

Only a few days ago the cabled news told us that France will maintain a larger army than that Republic possessed when she entered the World War. Doubtless France's security demands it, in spite of the negotiated alliance which calls the United States and Great Britain to her aid in case of a renewed German assault. We know little about Japan, but we do know that Japan may fix her own limitations as to army and navy, "taking into account geographical conditions and national safety," until under this treaty we give our sons and our resources to the enforcement of international agreements by common action under articles 8 and 10.

Is disarmament looming as a hope realized? Look for an instant at home. With the league confidently expected, with all its blessings of peace, limited only by "interpretations," we are contemplating an army of a half a million, seven times our previous establishment in peace, and the men, in Congress or out, who would cut our program for an expanded navy are few and far between. More, the man who would suggest it would be unmindful of our security. Verily, he who sees world disarmament in this league covenant has a faith which surpasses understanding.

Will nations arbitrate their differences under the league covenant? They will if both parties to the dispute are agreed, and they can do that without it. Under the covenant one party may decline, then the council takes the case, and we have recently come to know the recommendations of the council constitute its judgment only as to a "moral" obligation.

We have heard much lately about "moral" obligations. When a thing is covenanted it is difficult for me to distinguish between moral and legal obligation. For this Republic either or both ought to be solemnly binding. The nation which ignores either is losing the conscience which is essential to self-respect and respect among nations. It was Germany's contempt for a "scrap of paper" that made her an outcast in the eyes of the civilized world.

There has been a curious conflict of meaning in the use of the word "moral." When Senators, speaking in this Chamber in defense of the league covenant, found opposition developing to the powers conveyed in article 10, they hastened to say the council's call to war, armed or economic, in defense of any member was not binding—"only a moral obligation." I have heard the term quoted again and again and in the recorded conference between members of the Foreign Relations Committee and the President it was declared by the President that we were not bound to go to war on recommendation of the council, that there was "only a moral obligation," on which we should have to pass judgment for ourselves. Later on, in the record of the meeting, the President emphatically declared a moral obligation the most binding of all. Let every man make the distinction that he prefers. A contract is a contract, a covenant is a covenant, and if this Republic does not mean to do as it promises, it has no business to make the promise.

There is no language in the covenant more plain than article 10. Either it means what it says, and obligates the member nations to go to war in defense of a member nation, or it means nothing at all. If it leaves any member nation free to exercise its own judgment as to the merits of any attack, it does not guarantee the territorial integrity or peace of any nation. It is worse than phantom; it is the mirage that lures nations thirsting for peace to the very desert of cruel destruction. The pity of it is that no reservation will cure the ill. Without the power which is clearly expressed, "the league is a rope of sand," as the Senator from Connecticut described it, and with the power established, as it must be to make the league effective, we have surrendered our own freedom of action to a council whose members will represent the prejudices, ambitions, hatreds, and jealousies of the Old World, or to the assembly, where we are outvoted 6 to 1 by Great Britain and her colonies, and we still remain a party to the racial, geographical, and inherited enmities of Europe and the Orient.

Many have written me, and Senators have spoken and the President has argued, that we are no longer isolated from the Old World, that we have a duty to humanity, and we can not escape our manifest duty to world civilization. It is urged that we struck down the barriers when we sent the sons of the Republic to war, and there can be no withdrawal now. One can not dispute our ever-widening influence; none would narrow it. It began when we unsheathed the sword literally in behalf of humanity for the first time in the world. That was when we went to war to liberate Cuba and expanded to the Philippines. It is easy to recall the outcry against imperialism then by the very adherents of world sponsorship to-day—aye, by those who only three years ago would have furled the flag there, and promise it now, after our contribution to one defenseless people's progress unmatched in all history.

Ours is truly an expanded influence and a world interest, but there is yet for us a splendid isolation. The sons of America, 2,000,000 of them, crossed the seas in spite of submarine ruthlessness and every danger Germany could devise, and 2,000,000 more were ready, and 5,000,000 more would have prepared if needed, and they heroically fought and effectively taught arrogant Germany to respect American rights and left a wholesome impress on the remainder of the world. The soldiers have in the main returned, and, having accomplished our righteous purpose, it was vastly more easy to have severed our involvement than it was to bring the boys home and turn to the pursuits of peace again. The people of this Republic were not concerned with governing the universe. Their interests, their hearts, their hopes, their ambitions, their weal or woe—all of these are in the United States of America. We wanted nothing abroad but respect for our just rights, and that we mean to have, in peace or war, no matter who threatens.

It would have been so easy, if our commission had thought of America first, to have said to the allied powers, "Look here, friends and allies—yes, and to enemies as well—we came over and helped you bring an outlaw to terms, because he trespassed our rights beyond endurance. He is humbled now, and it is yours to restore order and make a just and abiding peace. We want peace, and we want to go to work and replace the waste of war. We will advise, if we can and you wish it, but we are asking nothing, and we will go back home and see to our own affairs. We do not mean to mix in again, unless some bully in making a row infringes our rights and murders our citizens and destroys our lawful property. In that event we will be forced to come back, but we will come more promptly the next time." That would have left a good impression, and we would have been at peace, and so would Europe, months ago.

Mr. President, the first official of our Government is touring the country to invite the people of the Republic, the great mass whose heart is ever right in ultimate decision, to the support of this untouchable and unamendable and supposedly sacred document. He visited the capital of the State which I have the honor to represent, and was received with the respect becoming his great office, and was applauded, as often happens to appealing speech, of which he is the master. He has spoken and is speaking elsewhere, and the people of our State are reading, in common with the reading people of America. I am not finding fault with the tour, even if it is not wholly purposed to promote the league covenant. One may not assume that it involves a feeling of the political pulse of the country, but if it is, if it is to test popular feeling about putting the Presidency permanently in the hands of one equipped to direct the world aright and at the same time merge this Republic in a supergovernment of the world, my partisan prejudices would be rejoicing. But the President told the reverent people of Ohio that he had only to report to them—in a broad sense, the people—and it so happens that I, too, as insignificant as my position is, relatively, have to report to the same people, and I want them to have not only the truth but all the truth; not only fine generalities but illuminating details.

Mr. President, the treaty is being expounded by its chief author to the people with vastly more freedom of utterance than this body has known, notwithstanding our solemn responsibility in making it a binding covenant on the part of this Republic.

Perhaps it does not matter, because we have before us the treaty itself, and we know what it says, though we do not have all the collateral covenants and do not know all to which we are pledged or to what ratification commits us. Yet we have had the advantage, or disadvantage, if you prefer, of hearing also from others of the peace commission, from experts who drafted many of its articles, and alas, we have heard from many who spoke for those who pleaded for their rights at Paris and who declared they were not heard, no matter what is said now about this being the first consecration of international conscience to the rights of helpless peoples and small nations.

Let me digress for a moment to suggest some of my own impressions gathered during the hearings granted to the American representatives of the aspiring peoples of Europe and Asia and Egypt, whose aspirations and long-deferred hopes of liberty and nationality are alleged to have been safeguarded in this supercreation of humanity. It was futile, of course, for a Senate committee to assume to answer prayers or comply with protest, for our function is not one of negotiation. However, there were citizens crying to be heard, after a denial at the fount of justice in Europe, and we listened. They begged amendment or rejection to save their liberties or to preserve their nationalities or to maintain their homogeneous peoples. Spokesmen for China cried out against the rape of the first great democracy of the Orient, and the plea was eloquent with recited sacrifices and noble assistance in the winning of the war. We uttered our chagrin that the spokesmen for the American conscience—aye, for the "conscience of civilization"—had sanctioned the confessed immorality of the Shantung award to satisfy a secret covenant against which we righteously proclaimed, and we did all we can do to right the wrong.

We heard the Americans speaking for their kinsmen of Greece, our allies in war, protesting the award of Thrace and its Greek peoples to Bulgaria who fought for German domination. We listened to those who were Croats or Slovenes or Serbs utter their despair over "the rectifications of history" under territorial awards arrived at for Jugo-Slavia, and Americans of Italian origin or ancestry presented the appeals of Italians for unsevered relationship from the motherland. More, Americans who originated in Egypt, with its traditions and ancient civilization, begged that we shall not sanction their transfer from Turkey and Germany to Great Britain, but save them their inherited freedom and their right to becoming aspirations. Hungarians prayed for restored enfranchisement amid the racial inspiration of the Magyars; and the irrepressible advocates of Irish freedom made the plea before the Senate committee which could not be heard at Paris. I have not named them all, but enough to reveal the utter futility, the hopeless impracticability of this Republic attempting to right the cumulative wrongs of history and satisfy the perfectly natural ambitions and aspirations of races and peoples. One can not wave the wand of democracy, even of excessively proclaimed American democracy, and do for Poland in a day or a year or a generation what centuries of sacrifice and warfare and self-determination have not done.

Does any thinking man stop to measure the colossal and endless involvement before which the sublimest unselfishness and most confident altruism must falter? Contemplate for a moment only the mandatory for Armenia. It is very appealing to portray the woes, the outrages, the massacres, the awakening hopes of Armenia, and visualize the doubts and distresses and sacrificed lives while "the Senate waits." I know the appeal that touches the heart of Christian America in its concern and sympathy for Armenia. It easily may be made to seem as if the sympathetic Son of God had turned to the Omnipotent Father to send this twentieth-century defender of the New Testament to succor those stricken believers in the great Trinity. But the big, warning truth is little proclaimed. Our Armies—sons of this Republic, the youths from American homes—are wanted there. Armenia calls and Great Britain is urging, insisting. A hundred thousand soldiers are needed. More American soldiers for Armenia than we heretofore maintained under the flag in any of the years of peace. Answer the call, and we station this American Army at the gateway between Orient and Occident, to become involved in every conflict in the Old World, and our splendid isolation becomes a memory and our boasted peace a mockery. This is not the way to peace. This is the avenue to unending war.

Mr. President, I am not insensible to the sufferings of Armenia, nor am I deaf to the wails forced by the cruelties of barbarity wherever our ideals of civilization are not maintained. But I am thinking of America first. Safety, as well as charity, begins at home. Selfishness? No. It is self-preservation. Measureless as our resources are, large as our man power is, and chivalrous as our purposes may be, we are not strong enough to assume sponsorship for all the oppressed of the world. No people, no nation is strong enough for such a supreme responsibility. We in America have the Republic to preserve. And in this very program of meddlesome assumption, in some instances bordering on presumption, we are endangering our own Republic. It is not alone the abandonment of security, so much warned against by the founding fathers, which suggests alarm. I am thinking of divided citizenship at home that must attend our attempted reorganization of the world.

Turn back for a moment to the appealing citizens who appeared before the Foreign Relations Committee in prayer or protest. They fairly represented a large proportion of American citizenship. We have no racial entity in this Republic. We are polyglot of tongue, which generations will not wholly change. The involvement in the World War found us divided in spirit. The founding fathers were eager to share their freedom and speed development of our incalculable resources, and they asked the world to come, and the world did come—the oppressed, the adventurous, the industrious; but there was neglected consecration of citizenship.

In the travail of war the American soul was born, and we have preached and practiced Americanization ever since, and we mean to go on and make this Republic American in fact as well as in name. No republic can endure half loyal and half disloyal; no citizenship is of permanent value whose heart is not in America. I had thought the war worth all it cost, in spite of its unutterable expenditure in lives and treasure, to have found ourselves. It was an inspiration to find the adopted sons of the Republic consecrated to the common cause. Yet, sirs, the unhappy aftermath is resurrecting the old lines of divided citizenship. We are restoring hyphenism under internationalism.

One can not complain at the revealment, but I am lamenting the cause. It is all directly traceable to our assumption of world sponsorship. One can little blame the American of Italian origin for being concerned about the affairs of those bound by ties of blood, or find fault with the American of Greek origin for deep feelings about the fate of those of kin in Thrace, or criticize the American son of the old sod who finds in his heart an undying echo of the Irish cry for freedom. Instead of effacing the native interest, instead of merging the inherited soul in exclusive Americanism, we have already embarked on a program that awakens every racial pride, every Old World prejudice, every inherited aspiration, and are rending the concord of American spirit which once promised to be the great compensation for all our sacrifices. This is no idle fancy. Justice, only simple justice, and liberty, God's own bequest of liberty, were on every lip, and there was no perfunctory utterance among those who appealed to the Senate through our committee. There was deep feeling no words could belie and that sincerity for which men die, and as I listened I deplored the eloquence of speech unperformed, which leads hope to flame high, then die in disappointment. And, sirs, I doubly deplored the proposals and pretenses that open anew the cleavage in the consecration of our adopted American citizenship.

Senators, it is a great thing to be eloquent and persuasive in speech, but it is also a very dangerous thing. I mean to be quite as respectful as I am sincere when I say that our present involvement and our further entanglement and most of the world's restlessness and revolution and threatened revolution are largely traceable to prewar utterances and war-time pronouncements. Once before in this Chamber I challenged some of the statements as to why we went to war. I speak of it again now, because the President told the people of my State that our soldiers were "drafted for the very purpose of ending war," and this league as negotiated is the only thing that will do it. It does not seem to have occurred to anyone that we might appeal to the pride of the peoples of the earth. Still more recently a very eminent authority has proclaimed all opponents of the covenant as "contemptible quitters if they do not see the game through."

Mr. President, I turned to the RECORD of Congress for that fateful 6th of April, 1917, when this body voted the declaration of war against Germany. It had occurred to me that perhaps the resolution itself would give the official reason for going to war as Congress would prefer history to record it. I turned to the preamble to the official declaration, and there is given the reason in the simplest language that words can express:

> Whereas the Imperial German Government has committed repeated acts of war against the Government and the people of the United States of America, therefore be it resolved,

And so forth.

There is the whole story. Nothing there especially proclaiming democracy or humanity, because both had been fighting, sacrificing, and dying for more than two and a half years and we neither saw nor heard.

Let me clarify by further quotation from the President. I omit the official proclamation of neutrality in August of 1914, but want to reveal the conscience of America as spoken by him in the following January, when Belgium was devastated, and France was bleeding, and Britain was sacrificing her volunteer defenders. I quote from a speech made at Indianapolis, scene of the more recent admonition to "put up or shut up." Search the quotation for democracy, humanity, "the end of all war," or "the rectified wrongs of history":

Only America at peace! Among all the great powers of the world only America saving her power for her own people. Do you not think it likely that the world will some time turn to America and say, "You were right and we were wrong. You kept your head when we lost ours."—The President, Indianapolis, January 8, 1915.

More than three months passed, and still the conscience of the Republic was unchanged. I quote from the New York speech of the Chief Executive, delivered on April 20, 1915:

I am interested in neutrality because there is something so much greater to do than fight; there is a distinction waiting for this Nation that no nation ever got. That is the distinction of absolute self-control and self-mastery.

Let us, as an act of courtesy, pass the Philadelphia address, delivered three days after the Lusitania sinking, when humanity's cry was muffled by the ocean's depths and democracy was too shocked to speak. In December we still "stood apart, studiously neutral—it was our manifest duty." Thus the President spoke. But it is especially interesting to quote from an address delivered at Des Moines, Iowa, on February 1, 1916, at the same place where the "quitters" were so recently gibbeted:

There are actually men in America who are preaching war, who are preaching the duty of the United States to do what it never would before—seek entanglements in the controversies which have arisen on the other side of the water—abandon its habitual and traditional policy and deliberately engage in the conflict which is engulfing the rest of the world. I do not know what the standards of citizenship of these gentlemen may be. I only know that I for one can not subscribe to those standards.

It was an unspeakable thing to abandon our "habitual and traditional policy" and seek entanglements in Old World controversies then, when actual conflict was threatening our very safety, but "only the selfishness or ignorance or a spirit of Bolshevism" is debating it now. Surely the American people will not compare without understanding.

We went to war precisely for the reason uttered in the preamble which I quoted, forced to action by the conscience and self-respect of the American people. Perhaps the people were greater than their Government in conscience and self-respect, but they were not great enough to overcome the costly months of delay. But once we were committed it was unalterable. "Quitters" in Congress? They were trampled deep beneath the forward march. Congress submerged itself, abdicated, to give limitless power to the Commander in Chief. No finer surrender of power is recorded in history, no lawful dictatorship offers parallel in the story of free government. I am not complaining, I am commending! It was necessary to speed the winning.

"Quitters" among the people? Not one among the millions of patriotic Americans. We pledged all we had, our wealth, our lives, our sacred honor. It was the committal unalterable. Germany was making war on us, and had to be brought to terms. Let me record it for all time—the unquitting resolution of these United States. Suppose poor, weak but proud and brave Serbia had been trampled to earth and utterly destroyed; suppose brave, heroic Belgium had been driven wholly into the sea and none but her enslaved people remained to cherish the story of her opening guns of defense; suppose Italy, resolute and courageous, in spite of her difficulties, had been brought to terms; suppose Russia in her betrayal had joined her German masters and sought to destroy the world's civilization as she did her own; suppose noble, heroic, self-sacrificing, respiritualized France had been brought to her knees, wounded unto death; suppose determined, fearless, and powerful Great Britain had been starved and brought to terms as the Central Powers had planned; suppose all these disasters had attended, then, even then, this Republic would have gone on and on and on until Germany was brought to terms, because without established American rights there could be no American Nation, and we had rather perish than fail to maintain them.

No, Senators, there were no "quitters" after the task was once assumed. We finished in triumph. An arrogant, offending military Germany is no more. That job was well done. But after it was done, having no concern for Europe's affairs, seeking nothing of territory, nothing of reparation—and getting none, let it be said—the sons of the Republic wanted to come home, and the people of the United States wanted them home, and it was in the great heart of the Republic to turn to the restoration, reestablish our normal pursuits, and make the earliest recovery possible from the ravages and extravagances and wastes and sorrows of war.

That is not a "quitter's" program. That was distinctly and becomingly the American policy, the wish of highest American devotion. We had never entered any alliances. The treaty speaks again and again of the "principal allied and associated powers." We were the "associated power," because when Germany committed her acts of war against us, we joined the warfare of the Allies against her and made common cause against the common enemy. We had no compacts, no covenants, no secret arrangements. Alas! We did not even know the secret agreements the Allies had. It would have little mattered, perhaps, had we not proclaimed overmuch against secret agreements and proposed a new birth for all the world.

We did cooperate. We fought under French command, and our soldiers were comrades to French, to Italian, to Belgian, and to British, because we were battling for the defeat of a common enemy. We paid our own way to the last farthing. We gave of treasure without reckoning, and Americans died not as allies but as Americans. That was the one supreme consolation in every hero's last living thought. Crusaders seeking a human relationship that God himself has not wrought? No! They were heroic defenders of these United States.

It may be recorded, Senators, that America finished the task for which her sons were sent to Europe, and the unfinished work which is now alleged is an afterthought, to which America was never committed, about which our people were never consulted, concerning which our very peace commissioners were not advised. No one questions the lofty aims of President Wilson, no one would hinder consistent endeavor for all desirable attainment. No one opposes because the American participation is exclusively Wilsonian or because the covenant is of British conception. It is the covenant itself and the effect of our committal which calls for consideration.

It is appropriate, however, to dispel some of the illusions about it being the expressed hope and guaranteed security of small nations and struggling peoples. They had no voice in its making. Their protests were stifled at the moment of its adoption. Eye witnesses to the submission of this superconcept to the peace commissioners testify that this "covenant is a perversion of what men who really favored a league of nations intended and wished for." I quote Mr. Frank P. Walsh, once its ardent supporter, now protesting its adoption. When Mr. Walsh appeared before our committee he was asked if the assembled peace commissioners, representing nations, great or small, expressed any surprise when the covenant was presented. Mr. Walsh replied:

Oh, it was very marked. They jumped up all over the place to make protests. Man after man got up. You know there was an awful censorship upon this whole business.

There was no debate. It was the offering of the Big Four, the autocracy of peace, not submitted to debate by the commissioners signing, and is now too sacred for modification by this body which must speak for America. I believe it designed to establish supergovernment, and no explanation nor apology has altered my opinion. It may consider any question affecting the affairs of the world, and the council's decision is a binding thing, else language has no dependable meaning. Supergovernment was the great dream, and the very essentials of supergovernment were incorporated. If one believes in surrendered nationality, if one prefers world citizenship to American citizenship, which I delight to boast, the covenant is ideal. But it ends democracy instead of promoting it, and it means international autocracy for all who accept it without specific reservations.

The authority, as written, is limitless. Any national sovereignty may be invaded. The authority which can prevent war can make it, and it will. The President has said the council may even consider internal controversies which threaten world peace, and he holds out the promise that the league will correct the injustices of the peace commission which created it. If that does not mean the assumption of power to extend to limitless authority, the promise is not sincere. On the other hand, it means abandoned self-determination for every member nation, and unending interference and invited conflict with nations outside the autocratic circle.

No one has made the venture to estimate our possible obligations. Only last Saturday the cable told us how a member of the French Chamber of Deputies had advocated that the league of nations should assume a proportion of the French war debt. It does not matter that we renounced all reparation ourselves, it does not matter that we expended without measure, it nevertheless appears that in the new idealism there is a "touch" of the practical. Europe is calling for our soldiers and we are sending, though our task was ended last November. Europe wants our sponsorship, to enforce the new alignments, and wants our treasure to lighten her own burdens. Involvement piles upon involvement and responsibility upon responsibility, until independence of action fades into precious memory and nationality becomes a lost inheritance.

Senators, no one in all the land has greater pride than I feel in having this Nation and our people exert a becoming influence on the progressive march of civilization. We can not hope to remain utterly aloof, and would not choose a complete isolation if such a course were possible. We are the exemplars of representative democracy, and have seemingly developed the most dependable popular government in the world. We know that no pure democracy ever survived, and we know that republics have failed before. We ought to and do realize that the fundamentals of the United States are not of new discovery, and we are yet but a child among the nations in point of years, though our achievement would glorify centuries of development. My point is that civilization is not exclusively ours, or justice solely an American conception, or righteousness wholly a new world development. We are committed to them all, and we are the best exemplars of unselfishness in the world.

Our merits are appraised and our weaknesses are known. We have power and wealth and conscience; we do have lofty sentiments and high ideals. We would have ours the best example of national righteousness in all the world, and influence the world according to the confidence and respect we command. We do not need Europe or Asia to define our moral obligations, we do not need the Old World to quicken the American conscience. The obligations to civilization are not designated by men, they are written by the hand of divinity which records the onward march. No league, no council of any league, no assembly of any league can ever appeal to the American conscience as will the voice of intelligent and deliberate public opinion. Aye, and if we proclaim democracy to the world, we must not crush it at its hearthstone.

Must we have this particular covenant to save us from European broils and Old World conflicts, as the President asserts? In a hundred years of American development and growing influence no war involved us, though 126 wars are recorded in that period. We were not involved in 1898; we went because conscience was impelling. I quite agree that Germany might have preferred to respect our rights than to involve us in the late World War if she had believed we would answer affront with armed defense, but the President was too busy then keeping us out of war to utter a vigorous American warning. Germany held us in a contempt which one militant American voice in authority might have dissolved, but we delayed until 2,000,000 fighting sons of the Republic shot Germany to respectful understanding.

We have settled it for all time, league or no league, peace or no peace, war or no war, the rights of this Nation and the rights of our citizens must and will be respected at home or abroad, on land or sea, everywhere an American may go on a lawful and righteous mission under the shining sun. To adopt any other policy, to call an international council to destroy the American spirit, would rend the life of the Republic. It may be very old-fashioned, sirs, it may be reactionary, it may be shocking to pacifist and dreamer alike, but I choose for our own people, a hundred millions or more, the right to search the American conscience and prescribe our own obligations to ourselves and the world's civilization.

Let us pause for a moment to note the tendency of the propagandists of the hour and the proponents of the league. There is a drive to nationalize industry, to denationalize governments, and internationalize the world. All are contrary to everything that made us what we are, all stamp failure on all we have wrought, and propose paralysis instead of the virile activity which sped us on to achievement.

Nationalism was the vital force that turned the dearly wrought freedom of the Republic to a living, impelling power. Nationalism inspired, assured, upbuilded. In nationalism was centered all the hopes, all the confidence, all the aspirations of a developing people. Nationalism has turned the retreating processions of the earth to the onward march to accomplishment, and has been the very shield of democracy wherever its banners were unfurled. Why, Senators, nationality was the hope of every appealing delegation which came to our committee in the name of democracy. It was nationality that conceived the emergence of new nations and the revival of old ones out of the ashes of consuming warfare. Nationality is the call of the heart of liberated peoples, and the dream of those to whom freedom becomes an undying cause. It was the guiding light, the song, the prayer, the consummation for our own people, although we were never assured indissoluble union until the Civil War was fought. Can any red-blooded American consent now, when we have come to understand its priceless value, to merge our nationality into internationality, merely because brotherhood and fraternity and fellowship and peace are soothing and appealing terms?

Oh, sirs, I know it is denied. I can understand the indignant denial. I will not challenge its sincerity. It would be very disheartening to believe that any American in official position, or who donned the garb of an armed defender, knowingly assents to surrendered nationality. I may be wrong, but I elect to take no chances. If this league as negotiated can do all that its proponents have promised, it can tighten its grip on the destiny of nations and make our inspiring nationality only a memory. Extravagant utterance? Well, establish the council without strong reservations protecting our freedom of action, and establish the assembly with its powers unhindered by reservations, and no man can foresee the exercise of authority by the league of great powers, against whom small nations will protest in vain. Suppose it proves all that is claimed in discouraging war, which many honestly doubt. Let me say in passing that an able and experienced officer of the Army, stalwart in his Americanism and his love of country, whose devotion has been proven again and again, and who not only fought in the late war but is a student of European affairs, said to me not a month ago: "Senator, as a military man I ought to favor this league because it means war after war and constant activity in the work for which I am trained. But I pray in my American heart you will never commit us to it, because I can see involvements and regrets unending."

But suppose it makes for the promised peace, I still prefer, and the great majority of Americans still prefer, to be the keepers of our national conscience and let Europe pass upon its moral obligations while we righteously meet our own.

Only the other day the President called upon the opponents of this league to "put up or shut up." Among opponents he classes reservationists as well as those who would destroy it all. A good many people have been "putting up" in this country. Perhaps they have a right to speak. But in modified terms the President is uttering that very familiar demand, "If you won't have this, what have you to offer?" It is the well-known call for constructive proposals in place of obstructive discussion. There are times when obstruction justifies the call for something constructive. But this situation, Senators, calls for action preservative. When some one proposes an impossible thing, it is not fit challenge to demand a constructive substitute. The preservation of American safety is the main thing. A safeguarded inheritance is infinitely better than the wasted riches of nationality.

Nobody is going to "shut up." Democracy does not demand such a surrender. Men in this body have a sworn duty to perform, no less important to ratification than presidential authority is to negotiation. A Senator may be as jealous of his constitutional duty as the President is jealous of an international concoction, especially if we cling to the substance as well as the form of representative democracy. The dictatorship was for the war only, and does not abide in the aftermath.

Members of this body are not insensible to the criticism of their actions, official criticism, and the complaints of constituents. There are expressions of approval, too. Men have not been blind to the unusual mail from home; they have appraised letters inspired, letters perfunctory, letters from the heart, letters urging support, letters breathing deep alarm. I have heard the charge of partisanship and the threat of destroyed party and the prophecy of individual political ignominy. But I record it now, because it ought to be recorded: The soul of this discussion is splendidly patriotic. It is not confined to one side of the Chamber nor to one side of the pending issue. I yield the belief in sincerity even to those who do not grant it. More, the radical, unalterable opponents of the league and the treaty have rendered a real service to this country. I do not agree to all they urge in opposition, but I credit them with the awakening of America, without which the Republic might have been unconsciously betrayed.

To what conclusion am I leading? Speaking for myself alone, voicing no faction, no group, no party, I do not see how any Senator can decide upon his final vote till the disputed amendments and proposed reservations shall have the stamp of the decision of a Senate majority. I can never vote to ratify without safeguards. I am not yet persuaded to cast a ratifying vote without amendments. I have listened to the committee's earnest discussions. I bear witness that there was no fixed program of action in advance. I have sought to retain a fairly open mind, withholding unalterable utterance in the face of the charge of wabbling indecision.

I mean to vote for the amendments proposed by the committee. They ought to be accepted. If the President is correct in declaring the proposed reservations will send the treaty back, then amendments will not unduly delay. Suppose there is delay. Civilized peoples are not supposed to move unthinkingly in creating the surpassing covenant of all the ages. This is an epoch-making treaty, no matter what its terms prescribe.

America need not fear the ill will of our allied covenanters. Their need for our cooperation is not so critical as when the German armies were battering the western battle fronts, but Europe needs us infinitely more than we need Europe. The aftermath is little less difficult than the problems of war itself. We can carry the banners of America to the new Elysium, even though we have to furl them before we enter.

It is well to do any job right. It is imperative to do a mighty job right, especially when it involves the fate of all civilization. If the world is to start all over, it ought to start with the square deal. The treaty has not written it; the square deal was reserved for informal promises not uttered in the supreme document. Though we performed a great service in armed battling for preserved civilization, we have yet a greater service to render to the same civilization by making the covenant of peace everlastingly righteous.

All fair men realize the embarrassment incident to the Shantung award. Perhaps we can not change it. No one believes we mean to go to war to restore to China what Germany looted and Japan traded for. But we need not be a party to an international immorality that challenges our every utterance about lofty purposes and the reign of justice. I want it recorded, for all the world to read, that America esteems her unarmed friend no less than she respects her armed associate.

If reservations are to send the German treaty and league covenant back, we ought to amend fully, we ought to write into the text the things which America is thinking. There has been inclination to yield some points rather than necessitate prolonged delay. We now know there are to be reservations, unmistakable reservations, else there will be no treaty. They must speak in clearest terms. The covenant is unthinkable without them. These reservations must be strong and unmistakable. I could no more support "mild reservations" than I could sanction mild Americanism. These reservations come of a purpose to protect America first, and still save a framework on which to build intelligent cooperation. These reservations come of a desire to offer opportunity for a clearing house for the consciences of peoples. These reservations declare that we hold for ourselves the right to maintain our own peace, and are willing to encourage Europe's effort toward the great desideratum. But in these reservations there must be no surrender of the basic things on which this Nation was builded to the present-day height of world eminence.

Without the amendments we shall be remiss in uttering the conscience of the Republic; without any reservations we shall be recreant to duty. This is not the universal thought. There is dispute about it being the majority thought of the American millions, but I believe it will become the deliberate judgment of America.

If such a course delays reconstruction, let reconstruction wait. It awaited the long negotiation at Paris, it waited amid barter, it can await correction where the blunder was made. You have heard the call of finance, voicing its impatience. Let finance recall that fundamental Americanism transcends its importance for to-day and the morrow, too. Industry calls for normal conditions of formal peace. Let industry remember that nationalism is its fostering influence, and internationalism means to merge its interests with the industries of the world. Momentous achievements are not wrought in impatience.

Out of the ferment, the turmoil, the debts, and echoing sorrows; out of the appalling waste and far-reaching disorder; out of the threats against orderly government and the assaults on our present-day civilization, I think I can see the opening way for America. We must preserve the inheritance and hold sensitive the conscience which has guided our national life. We must cling to just government and hold to intelligent and deliberate public opinion as shield and buckler to representative democracy. We must hold to civil liberty, no matter who assails or in what garb he appears, and we must hold equal opportunity and the reward of merit no less vital to a living Republic than liberty itself.

We do not need and we do not mean to live within and for ourselves alone, but we do mean to hold our ideals safe from foreign incursion. We have commanded respect and confidence, commanded them in friendship and the associations of peace, commanded them in the conflicts and comradeships of war. It is easily possible to hold the world's high estimate through righteous relationships. If our ideals of civilization are the best in the world, and I proudly believe that they are, then we ought to send the American torch bearers leading on to fulfillment. America aided in saving civilization; Americans will not fail civilization in the deliberate advancements of peace. We are willing to give, but we resent demands.

I do not believe, Senators, that it is going "to break the heart of the world" to make this covenant right, or at least free from perils which would endanger our own independence. But it were better to witness this rhetorical tragedy than destroy the soul of this great Republic.

It is a very alluring thing, Mr. President, to do what the world has never done before. No republic has permanently survived. They have flashed, illumined, and advanced the world, and faded or crumbled. I want to be a contributor to the abiding Republic. None of us to-day can be sure that it shall abide for generations to come, but we may hold it unshaken for our day, and pass it on to the next generation preserved in its integrity. This is the unending call of duty to men of every civilization; it is distinctly the American call to duty to every man who believes we have come the nearest to dependable popular government the world has yet witnessed.

Let us have an America walking erect, unafraid, concerned about its rights and ready to defend them, proud of its citizens and committed to defend them, and sure of its ideals and strong to support them. We are a hundred millions and more to-day, and if the miracle of the first century of national life may be repeated in the second the millions of to-day will be the myriads of the future. I like to think, sirs, that out of the discovered soul of this Republic and through our preservative actions in this supreme moment of human progress we shall hold the word American the proudest boast of citizenship in all the world. [Applause in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has a word to say to the Senate of the United States. The Senate has a rule and placed the enforcement of it on the Chair to maintain order in the galleries. The occupants of the galleries pay no more attention to this rule than if it were a last year's bird's nest. There is no way for the Chair to enforce the rule except to clear the galleries, and I am going to put it up to the Committee on Rules of the Senate as to whether they want to have the rule enforced. If they do not, well and good. If they do, the next time a violation of the rule occurs I shall clear the galleries, provided the Senate will stand back of me.

CONTROL OF FOOD PRODUCTS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 8624.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill H. R. 8624, an act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, last week I proposed an amendment to a bill then pending, which amendment was the soldiers' settlement bill for soldiers settling on public lands and other lands in the United States. In the course of my discussion I referred to the fact that various sums of money had been expended upon the arid and irrigable lands of the West. I took occasion to say that the money was being repaid to the United States Government. That statement was not challenged on the floor of the Senate, but it has been challenged elsewhere. I did not at that time have a statement as to the exact amount of money that has been advanced from the reclamation fund, nor did I myself know the exact sums that have been repaid by the people who are cultivating the reclaimed lands. For instance, the reclamation law was signed, I believe, on the 17th of June, 1902, therefore it is not 20 years old. Since the day the bill was signed $154,127,905 has been expended in the arid and irrigable West, and of that expenditure over $35,000,000 has been repaid to the Government, or nearly 20 per cent.

I have a statement from Mr. Davis, the Director of the Reclamation Service, signed yesterday, which contains full data showing the amounts of money expended on the various reclamation projects in the United States, showing all the credits and repayments and the amount of the net investment that the Government now has in the projects. I ask unanimous consent to incorporate this tabular statement in the RECORD, together with a letter from the director, because it contains definite and valuable information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BECKHAM in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES RECLAMATION SERVICE,
Washington, D. C., September 10, 1919.

Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In accordance with telephone request from your office I am sending herewith a tabulation of investments in Government reclamation projects up to the close of the past fiscal year. This shows in each case the total investment of the United States and the reimbursement and other credits against these investments and the net investment on that date.

These are the figures you want, as I understand it, but there is a word of caution in connection with any such statistics. The operations involved in the construction and management of large irrigation projects are so varied that it is difficult or impossible to express all of the financial facts in a few simple terms. For example, the figures given for total investments include actual cash disbursements from the reclamation fund, appropriations for "increase of compensation," and other special appropriations, such as that of a million dollars for the Elephant Butte Dam by the act of March 4, 1907, for judgments of the Court of Claims, etc. This also includes the agreed value of machinery, equipment, materials, etc., transferred from one project to another, in which case we make book credits and debits of appropriate amounts. For all projects such transfers amount to upward of $7,300,000 in the inclosed statement.

Similarly the column of reimbursements and credits includes the other side of such transfer entries, as well as actual cash collections for construction charges, operation and maintenance repayments, water rentals, and miscellaneous items for the sale of electricity, abandoned equipment, etc.

At the bottom of the table you will notice a number of other items added to bring the figures in agreement with our book totals. The "secondary projects" include the great number of possibilities that have been surveyed and examined more or less completely, in addition to the projects actually undertaken. For example, in Arizona this includes the San Carlos, San Pedro, Sentinel, and other propositions that will occur to you.

Jackson Lake, in Wyoming, we converted into a reservoir for one of our constructed projects. Later the storage was enlarged mainly for the benefit of private projects in the same drainage basin, and the companies thus interested deposited in advance the funds used in this later construction. These were deposited to the credit of the reclamation fund and disbursed in the usual manner. The account has not been finally closed out, and there is a small balance remaining to the credit of these companies, which accounts for the item marked "deduct" in tabulation.

The item of general expense includes headquarters offices at Washington and Denver, legal services, and many other items which can not readily be allocated to particular projects except in bulk from time to time on the basis of expenditures or other similar criterion.

This is the largest item included under the head of "Transfers" already mentioned.

The item entitled "Indian projects" represents expenditures from the reclamation fund reimbursed by the Indian Bureau.

I hope the inclosed tabulation and this explanation will give you what you want. If not, and I can give you any further information, please let me know.

Very truly, yours, A. P. DAVIS, Director.

[1] Deduct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, that is a very important amendment, and I believe we ought to have a quorum here. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. NEWBERRY. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] is detained in a conference committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I notice in the RECORD that on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday I was reported as absent and no explanation was made. I was absent from the city on those days upon official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-one Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

Mr. HARRISON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. The committee amendments have not yet been voted on. Is it in order first to vote on committee amendments or on individual amendments?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There was no order made first to take up committee amendments.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask unanimous consent that we may first proceed to the consideration of Senate committee amendments?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is an amendment pending, which has been offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], the Chair is informed. That amendment is now before the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. Could we not change the order by unanimous consent and vote on Senate committee amendments before we vote on individual amendments?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma himself is not now present.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask that before it is voted on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma be stated, so that we may understand what we shall be voting on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Mr. OWEN proposes, on page 4, after line 22, to insert as a separate paragraph the following:

That this section, with the interpretation of the term "necessaries," as set forth in the act approved August 10, 1917, shall not cease to be in effect upon the cessation of the existing state of war between the United States and Germany.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I ask that the language which this amendment affects be also read.

The SECRETARY. Section 2 of the bill reads as follows:

SEC. 2. That section 4 of the act entited "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"That it is hereby made unlawful for any person willfully to destroy any necessaries for the purpose of enhancing the price or restricting the supply thereof; knowingly to commit waste or willfully to permit preventable deterioration of any necessaries in or in connection with their production, manufacture, or distribution; to hoard, as defined in section 6 of this act, any necessaries; to monopolize or attempt to monopolize, either locally or generally, any necessaries; to engage in any discriminatory and unfair or any deceptive or wasteful practice or device, or to make any unjust or unreasonable rate or charge in handling or dealing in or with any necessaries."

On page 3, line 15, after the word "necessaries," the committee propose to insert:

Or to exact unreasonable and excessive prices for the lease, sublease, rent, or subrent of any dwelling house, dwelling rooms, or apartments, either furnished or unfurnished, in the District of Columbia;

The section further reads:

for any necessaries, or to aid or abet the doing of any act made unlawful by this section. Any person violating any of the provisions of this section upon conviction thereof shall be fined not exceeding $5,000 or be imprisoned for not more than two years, or both: Provided, That this section shall not apply to any farmer, gardener, horticulturist, vineyardist, planter, ranchman, dairyman, stockman, or other agriculturist, with respect to the farm products produced or raised upon land owned, leased, or cultivated by him: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to forbid or make unlawful collective bargaining by any cooperative association or other association of farmers, dairymen, gardeners, or other producers of farm products with respect to the farm products produced or raised by its members upon land owned, leased, or cultivated by them.

On page 4, line 15, after the word "them," the committee propose to insert:

And provided further, That to make unjust or unreasonable a rate or charge in handling or dealing in or with any necessaries, except where there has been a conspiracy, combination, or arrangement with reference to prices, such rate or charge must be in excess of the rate or charge fixed by a fair-price committee, and the Department of Justice is authorized to provide for the appointment of fair-price committees.

Mr. OWEN offers an amendment, following section 2, which reads as follows:

That this section, with the interpretation of the term "necessaries," as set forth in the act approved August 10, 1917, shall not cease to be in effect upon the cessation of the existing state of war between the United States and Germany.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I believe I ought to say that I feel that if this amendment is adopted I, as one Member of this body, can not vote for the bill.

I had believed, Mr. President, that the war was about over; that we were about to get back to normal conditions; and that there would be less interference by the Government in the affairs of honest business. Further than that, I consider that it is an indictment of those who deal in agricultural products to single out that one industry, for this amendment deals, of course, only with "necessaries" as defined in the food-control law, and that law is somewhat limited.

Now, if we are to proceed in the future to place the affairs of the individual under governmental control, let us include all industries; let us not single out the farmer and the producer of food products and say that they have been the only violators of the law; that they are the only men who have been the beneficiaries and have been the profiteers. It is unthinkable to me, Mr. President, at this time, when not only the United States of America is so much disturbed but all the countries of the world are in chaos that we shall enact a permanent law—not a war measure, but a law which shall continue upon the statute books and shall authorize officials of the Government to dictate the economic policy of the producers of the country.

I can hardly believe that the Senate of the United States will undertake to enter upon such a policy as that.

During the war, Mr. President, it was probably necessary to give plenary power and full authority to those in control of the affairs of the Government to say what should or should not be done with reference to profits and with reference to economic questions, but to say that that shall be the permanent law, as the proposed amendment does, seems to me to be unreasonable.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Have we any constitutional authority to legislate in regard to a matter of this kind except during war and for war purposes?

Mr. GRONNA. I should say not.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not think so; I think we have no such power whatsoever.

Mr. GRONNA. I should accept the judgment of the Senator from Tennessee rather than my own on that question.

I do not believe, Mr. President, that even the passage of this bill is going to add very much to the authority of our Government officials; but I am willing, and so stated in the committee and to the press, if the Attorney General insists on this proposed legislation, I am willing that it should be enacted. If he believes that it will aid him in enforcing the law and reaching those who are unduly profiteering, then I am willing it should be passed; but I am not willing to say that for all time to come the great industry of agriculture, the great industry of those who produce clothing, the cotton men of the South, the grain men of the North and West, shall be branded as the only ones who have been making undue profits.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield.

Mr. DIAL. If this proposed act is based upon the theory that it is a war measure—and that is the only ground upon which it can be based—and when peace is declared the act would die, then there would be no constitutional provision to perpetuate the amendment or the idea of the Senator from Oklahoma. If his idea is a good idea it would be well to embrace it in a separate law, if it is legal and constitutional, and not engraft it on this bill, would it not?

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator that I would be unwilling to pass it as a separate measure.

Mr. DIAL. I say, even if it were necessary. I am opposed to it in any event.

Mr. GRONNA. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. Is it not a fact that the Attorney General, when he came before the committee, made no request for the existing law to be extended, and that we gave to him those things that he desired?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; that is absolutely correct.

Mr. President, I have stated, and I again state, that I am perfectly willing to let this measure pass, although I believe that the Attorney General has all the power and all the authority that Congress can possibly give him to enforce the law against profiteering; but, if that be true, there can be no good reason why I should object to this bill.

I wish to be perfectly frank to the Members of the Senate; I do not believe in this legislation; I was not favorable to it in the committee; but when a majority of the committee voted that it should be reported I believed that it was my duty to report it and to support it, although there are some provisions in it which I do not believe I can support. I believe it should be amended; I think that it can be improved; and I am under the impression that the amendments submitted will not meet with any opposition from the Attorney General's office.

Mr. President, I do not wish to delay or further take up the time of the Senate. I only appeal to the Members of this body to vote against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I should like to ask a question for information. I understand the Committee on Agriculture, of which the Senator from North Dakota is chairman, has been holding extended hearings upon certain proposed legislation and have developed some considerable testimony.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes, sir.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is there any testimony before the committee which tends to show the tendency of prices of agricultural products at the present time?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes, sir; we have had a great deal of testimony along that line. Undoubtedly the prices of agricultural products are being very much reduced at the present time.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to read a telegram and ask the Senator whether there is any information along the line indicated and what is the explanation of it. The telegram is addressed to me from Omaha and reads as follows:

[Telegram.]

Universal complaint among farmers regarding decline in value of farm products. Corn has dropped 40 cents per bushel since July 28. During same time supply in terminal elevators has been reduced from over 3,000,000 bushels to about 1,000,000. Supply and demand has nothing to do with present prices, and * * * have taken advantage of Government's campaign to reduce prices and are throwing all the decline on farms. Something should be done to stop these bears from making money at expense of producers. Why not suggest that an investigation be made to find out why price of corn continues to decline and at same time visible supply continues to disappear? The suggestion of an investigation by the Senate will stop these speculators and save millions to producers.

ARTHUR F. MULLEN.

I should like to inquire of the Senator whether the investigations indicate a decline in other agricultural products during the last few months?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; I will say to the Senator that a great many witnesses who appeared before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry have testified that there is a great decline in the price of cattle, the price of hogs, the price of grain, and the price of corn. I believe the telegram read by the Senator fairly presents the facts.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the testimony indicate whether it is the result of any organized effort on the part of any interests, or is it simply the result of the agitation for a reduced cost of living?

Mr. GRONNA. It has been stated by a great number of witnesses that they believe the agitation is the cause of it. Of course, it might be said that the Director of Grain has a tremendous power. I do not know whether there is an embargo on the exportation of grain at the present time or not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That hardly seems to be implied here. This telegram indicates that the visible supply has been reduced.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; that is true.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And yet the price has gone down instead of rising, as it ordinarily would.

Mr. GRONNA. That is true; yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. So I hardly think any embargo could be in force. Can the Senator state whether the testimony before the committee indicates that there has been any decline in the retail price of foodstuffs to correspond with the decline of which the farmers complain as excessive?

Mr. GRONNA. The committee has tried to go into that matter quite thoroughly; but while some of the witnesses have testified that there has been a small decline in the prices to the consumer, I do not think any member of the committee is satisfied that the decline to the consumer is as large as the decline has been to the producer, or, in other words, to the farmer. For instance, the decline in cattle has been between four and five dollars a hundred during the last three weeks. The decline in pork has been very large, at least $4. We have not been able to ascertain whether the consumer is getting the benefit of that reduced price or not. Some of the witnesses have testified, especially some of the butchers and the retail dealers, that they have reduced prices to the public substantially. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that we know that Mr. Barnes stated that he was going to make every effort possible to reduce the price of grain. I am satisfied that he has succeeded. Wheat, for instance, was commanding a premium of from 40 to 60 or 65 cents a bushel.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What does the Senator mean by a premium?

Mr. GRONNA. That is the price paid above the price fixed by the Government. It was selling in all the markets throughout the country at a premium of from 40 to 60 cents a bushel. That premium has been practically wiped out, so that the laws of supply and demand are not functioning so far as the farmer is concerned. There have been a great many farmers before our committee who have complained most bitterly because many of them have bought expensive cattle to feed; they have bought them, as they say, at the request of Government officials, because they wanted to win the war, and they have not been able to dispose of them. They are not even able to dispose of them at the prices which they paid for them. I had a letter yesterday, I think, from a farmer in Virginia, stating that on 200 head of cattle his loss would be at least $5,000. All throughout the country, where the farmers and the stockmen purchased cattle at the going price six months or a year ago, they undoubtedly will be heavy losers.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I shall vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma, principally upon the ground suggested by the Senator from Tennessee. I am unable to discover in the section anything which affects the farmer, and consequently I do not regard it as class legislation from the standpoint of the Senator from North Dakota. The vice of the section, not only as it is proposed to be amended but as it exists in the bill, is its exemption of practically all of the agricultural interests of the country from its operation.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. I am well aware that the farmer is exempted from the provisions of this particular section; but if the prices of the secondary products are reduced it will as a natural sequence follow that the prices must be reduced to the farmer, and that is the reason why I stated it in the way that I did. The farmer will be the only man who possibly can lose, because the man who deals in secondary products may make a larger percentage at a low cost than at a high cost, but ultimately it will react upon the producer.

Mr. THOMAS. I can not agree with the Senator entirely in that statement. Perhaps it is because I do not comprehend the object and the purpose of the section, which makes it unlawful for any person willfully to destroy any necessities for the purpose of enhancing the price or restricting the supply, or knowingly to commit waste, and so forth. If this destruction or waste is committed by the middleman for the purpose of justifying a higher price to the consumer upon the remainder of the product, the loss does not fall upon the farmer, and neither does he gain anything by it. But I am unable to perceive the justice of a law which punishes John Smith, the merchant, for destroying the necessities of life to enhance the price or restrict the supply, but says to the farmer that he can do it if he wants to; and that is virtually the effect of this section, not as it is proposed to amend it, but as it actually is upon the statutes.

We got into the habit some time ago of indulging in class legislation, of which this is a conspicuous instance; and in order to protect the consuming public against the consequences of waste and destruction we enacted this penal statute, but we said that it should not apply to the farmers, either in their individual capacity or among their associations. The exception is the logical deduction, I presume, from the Clayton bill, whose inhibitory clauses very carefully exclude all organizations of labor and of agriculture from its provisions. To attempt to regulate so important a subject as the food supply of a nation by imposing penalties which are not universally applicable is not only to legislate unjustly and unfairly but also to legislate unconstitutionally, and, I may add, needlessly, since if it be desired in the interests of a high and rising market to destroy some proportion of the foodstuffs of the country, if you make an exception at all, the way will be found through the operation of that exception to accomplish the evil that is legislated against.

That circumstance, I think, has been to blame, in some degree at least, for the unsatisfactory operation of the so-called food and fuel supply act enacted when we entered the war. A criminal statute that is not universal is an outrage upon the public. It makes no difference whether such a statute exists in a republic or in an autocracy. The only justification of a criminal statute is its need and its universality, and we can not legislate to exempt institutions and individuals from the operation of our laws and expect to give satisfaction. The system is wrong. It is one of the outgrowths of partisanship, which prompts appeals to certain elements of society in order to secure their political influence and support. It is one of the things against which Gen. Washington warned us in his Farewell Address.

Frequent reference has been made to that address during the discussion of the league of nations, but the reference has been confined to his warning against foreign alliances. Washington warned the country on two occasions in that immortal state paper against certain consequences of party spirit, far more dangerous to the integrity of the union, in my judgment, than a foreign alliance can be, and well exemplified in this sort of legislation.

A middle man or a commission merchant, or even a consumer, does not feel very good to be assured that if he violates a statute he is subject to fine and imprisonment, but that if his neighbor, who is a farmer, violates it, he can do so with impunity. The flagrant and outrageous injustice of such a statute—and I do not care what the particular element is that is exempted from it—need only be stated to be appreciated. So that I am opposed, Mr. President, to the perpetuation of any such statute, I care not how beneficial it otherwise might be.

Equality before the law is a fundamental postulate of republican government. Inequality before the law produces the very conditions which confront the public to-day, for the great majority of the causes which underlie and justify the existing social, political, and industrial ferment is a nonrecognition of the right of every man to be equal before the law. And its beginnings, of course, were in the somewhat distant past, but at present it is exceedingly difficult to enact a general statute on any subject without first ascertaining whom it is going to hurt the most, and then exempting that particular influence.

I do not blame the average man for feeling discontented, and for sometimes voicing that discontent in an unlawful manner, when face to face with such conditions. The strongest indictment that I have heard made against this Government by its opponents is that it has practiced, and continues to practice, class legislation. We have done it for the corporations; we are doing it for classes of individuals; and we may continue to do it, making the exemptions as our political interests or inclinations shall dictate. Let us avoid it wherever we can, and we can do so by declining to incorporate a section like this permanently into the statutes of the country.

Mr. President, this bill, taken as an entirety, does not appeal to me, nor did the bill to which it is a proposed amendment, at the time of its consideration. I am unable, perhaps because of lack of intelligence, to understand how a legislative body can successfully enact a statute against a natural law, and there are natural laws in economics as they are in physics, as immutable, as unavoidable, and as constantly operative. We can not legislate July into January very well, nor enact a statute providing that from any day after the 1st of October next water shall run up hill, nor incorporate a transportation company to operate between the earth and the moon. A Senator introducing such a bill would justly subject himself to the suspicion of lunacy. But we do not hesitate for a moment, when something goes wrong somewhere in the country, to attribute it either to the injurious operation of an existing law or to the absence of a statute which should be enacted with all due expedition. We have encouraged that sort of thing to such an extent that the citizens of the United States all over the Nation instinctively and invariably appeal to Congress for relief whenever confronted by conditions that are unsatisfactory or injurious, well illustrated by a telegram just read into the RECORD by the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. One of his constituents complains that the market price of corn has declined 40 cents a bushel, something which ordinarily would be regarded just now in other parts of the country as decidedly good news, because we can not effectuate a decline in prices unless we reduce the price of the commodities whose units compose the mass of foodstuffs in the country. When I first heard in the reading of the telegram that corn had declined 40 cents, I began to feel pretty good. But it seems that the sender of the telegram is complaining. He wants to know why his commodity is going down, and he is not only dissatisfied, but he says if we will make an investigation it will go up; and I suppose it is in order now to have another investigation to ascertain the causes of this remarkable phenomenon, and by our investigation cure it, so that corn, instead of taking a back seat, will come to the front again, and, of course, bring a certain amount of joy back to the hearts of those who raise it and who own it.

I quite agree that a forced decline in some commodity, artificially produced, and for sinister purposes, should be prevented, provided it can be done. I quite agree that wages and salaries should be very high, and everything that the wages and salaries buy for sustaining life and obtaining comfort should be made very low. I am in favor of it. I believe that if a man wants to jump out of the window he ought to be able to do so without any resulting injury, and, instead of falling, float away gracefully like a machine on the atmosphere. I would like to legislate, if possible, so as to produce that very happy consequence. But how are we going to do it?

We are not confronted with anything new. Years ago, when I was a boy, I heard Wendell Phillips lecture upon The Lost Arts. In that celebrated lecture Mr. Phillips stated that every modern economic, sociologic, and political question had been discussed in Egypt 2,000 years before the birth of Christ.

The other day I saw an extract from an old Greek writer of about the time of Plato. I can not recall his name, but this extract consisted of a dialogue between two men upon the subject of socialism and the division of all property among the sons of men. But for the fact that I knew it was ancient, I could readily have understood that it had been taken bodily from the day before yesterday's New York Call, a daily socialist paper.

Every question which confronts us, Mr. President, has arisen in other lands, and due to precisely the same causes. During the French Revolution, when scarcity of production on the one side and a debased currency on the other caused an enormous rise in the prices of necessities, with its consequent suffering, and the turbulence which always follows in the wake of such conditions, the French Assembly sought to regulate and control the situation by the enactment of decrees. Among others, the assembly decreed death to any man refusing to exchange his goods for the French assignats at their face value. That is pretty severe legislation. It was in one respect better than ours, because nobody was exempted from its operation; it was universal. If anything in the world would make me or you accept worthless money for our goods, it would be the certainty of death if we refused to do it. Yet that statute, Mr. President, proved wholly impotent to accomplish its purpose. A few men and women were guillotined, and that was about its only consequence. It was entirely beyond the power of man to accomplish, because it sought to strike in the face an everlasting, eternal, and unavoidable economic law.

England was faced with the same conditions after the Napoleonic wars, and long before then on more than one occasion the Parliament sought to deal with these insistent problems, which men and women instinctively feel can be remedied by legislation.

I affirm, Mr. President, without the slightest hesitation, that no act of man in any country anywhere has ever been able, except temporarily, to stem the tide of the operation of conditions whose existence is unquestionably manifest.

We know that all the world over, without any exception anywhere, there is at present a terrible conflict between rising prices and the ability to meet them, accompanied by a prosperity—artificial in character, of course—and a consequent luxurious expenditure that seems upon the face of it to be an absolute contrast to such an unfortunate condition. And we are expected, by legislation in America, to correct the operation of these laws here, and by that means produce a condition wholly at variance with and preferable to that which prevails the world over. We can not do it. We can try, of course; and we can succeed as to the profiteer.

Mr. President, the profiteer is like the poor, who, Holy Writ tells us, are always with us. He is not a peculiar conscienceless genus, as we are prone to imagine him. He is the ordinary individual with an opportunity, of which he takes advantage, and however much we may condemn him—and I do condemn him—we have to deal with the fact that he is a product of human nature. We can control him, but we can not suppress him any more than we can suppress the commission of laches or of murder or of any of the other offenses constantly occuring under all forms of government.

I saw a statement yesterday about conditions in France. The circulating medium there has been increased to $7,000,000,000, about three times the amount in circulation when the war began. Prices are three or four times as high for practically everything as they were when the war began. French people are demanding relief from the French Government. There is turbulence in France and suffering, much injustice, and a natural feeling that an all-powerful Government can and must remedy the situation. The increase of the currency in Great Britain is not quite so much, but is more than double the amount in circulation when the war began. That is true, relatively at least, in all the countries of the world. The credit of every country, including the neutral nations, has been necessarily distended by war conditions, which is another factor contributing to what we call high prices, but which in reality means the lowering of the value of the purchasing power of money. We are paying $6,000,000,000 in taxes this year which is $500,000,000 a month, or nearly $17,000,000 per day. That sum is equal to the value of the entire agricultural product of 1913. With the exception of some of the income taxes, the inheritance tax and possibly one or two other forms of tax, this vast sum is passed on to the consumer and is added to the cost of everything that he buys to consume, sometimes with a nice little profit added.

When we consider that that sum, at least to the extent of two-thirds, is added to the otherwise normal prices of all the commodities in which we deal, what wonder that the price which the most ordinary but necessary article now commands when stated in dollars and cents is so appallingly high? How can it be corrected except by the removal or reducing of the causes which are responsible for the situation? If we could reduce the circulating medium of this country to 50 per cent of what it is, if we could contract our inflated credit to some degree and reduce our taxation prices would fall, but with that fall would come a degree of suffering and disaster more appalling than that of which such loud complaint is now made.

Of all the evils that afflict civilized society, the most severe and long-continued result from a deflated currency. Every great panic that has cursed this country has been the direct and dire result of a somewhat suddenly contracted currency circulation. Of course, a different class would suffer then. The wage earner, the man who received a fixed-priced income, whether of salary or of interest, would prosper. Such classes always prosper when money is scarce, and the large portion of the community now suffering when money is plentiful would suffer a great deal more because of that condition. They have always also been accompanied by appeals to the legislative authority for relief, as though legislation were something superhuman and contained some subtle quality about it, self-executing in character, to bring the desired relief.

So, Mr. President, when we come to consider even briefly the merits of the bill, I wish to warn the public that its enactment and subsequent operation will prove disappointing, just as disappointing as the act of which it is amendatory. It will result in some convictions, unquestionably, and ought to. It will result in some investigations that will prove salutary, I hope. But that it will seriously or sensibly affect the general market and business conditions is altogether too much to be expected of it.

We are trying to accomplish the impossible. Any law which assumes to deal with prices, and which does not include every commodity that mankind uses, will operate unjustly and unequally, for there can be such a thing as class legislation as to things as there can be as to persons. When the price of wheat was provided for in the bill of which this is amendatory, I objected to it unless, instead of being confined to wheat, it should be extended to all commodities. I thought, and so did others in the Chamber, that if wheat were held at a fixed price, the substitutes for wheat, because of the increased demand upon them, would at once rise in value or at least in price, and that what was lost by the arbitrary prohibition of the statute regarding one commodity would be compensated for through the opportunity given by the absence of that prohibition upon other commodities, and that is precisely what occurred. We all remember that during the war, when we were paying something like $2 a bushel for wheat, rye and corn and barley and even rice mounted beyond that figure, because there was nothing to restrain the situation and everything to encourage it.

So a fundamental objection to this bill, apart from those to which I have referred very hastily, lies in its failure to include all commodities. There are some Senators who object to the inclusion of wearing apparel, and perhaps to some of the other things that are mentioned here, their objection being that it will decidedly interfere with, if not cripple, the business related to those articles.

However, if we do not exclude them, what happens to those other commodities that are brought within the purview of the law? How shall we answer the complaints of men and women engaged in those pursuits when they accuse us of discriminating against them and in favor of their neighbors, and particularly when they supplement the complaint by the assurance that the bill has done no good?

I do not wish to see the enactment of a bill like this without calling attention before it passes to certain elementary economic facts, which seem to me to be contrary to the purpose sought to be effected by the legislation.

Moreover, the uncertainty of the bill in many respects is subject to criticism. Here is a prohibition against the exaction of unreasonable or excessive prices for leases, subleases, rents, or subrents, of any dwelling house in the District of Columbia. That is a most desirable provision, or perhaps I should say more correctly that the purpose sought to be subserved by the provision is a most necessary and desirable one. Of course, whether the landlords are correct or not in their assumptions and assertions as to the profits which they are realizing, the fact remains that rents in the District are diabolical, and they crowd hardest upon those who are least able to bear it. Legislation, if it can accomplish anything, should certainly there be applied.

What criminal law can be relied upon, the application of which, both as to the law and the facts, must be within the purview of a jury? I do not believe that a legislature has the power—it ought not to have it—to legislate crimes by general language. A man ought to know or, at least, be presumed to know, if he has ordinary intelligence, from the recitals of the statute what he is doing when he commits a crime. An unreasonable rent is a good deal like an unreasonable toothache—some man may bear a toothache that is much more severe than one which some other man could bear—or a reasonable price for a suit of clothes or a reasonable distance. The word, Mr. President, does not admit of specific definition so as to apply and operate equally and justly in all cases. Therefore I do not think, much as this legislation is needed, that we should enact it in this general form of phraseology, under the operation of which John Smith may be guilty to-day of a violation of the statute and John Jones to-morrow, who charges the same price, may be entirely exempt from its operation. That sort of legislation is not congenial to free institutions, and I do not think any reasonable court on earth would enforce it.

My friend the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] makes an effort to correct these general terms of criminal import by the following proviso——

Mr. KENYON. Before the Senator from Colorado gets away from that other proposition, may I ask him a question?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. The question the Senator has been discussing was a troublesome one in the committee.

Mr. THOMAS. I have no doubt of that, and I sympathized with the committee.

Mr. KENYON. They needed the Senator's sympathy. The Sherman Act has now written in it by judicial decision that it must be an "unreasonable restraint of trade." Does the Senator believe that with those words actually written into the statute it would be void as a criminal statute by reason of uncertainty; and if not, what is the difference between unreasonable restraint of trade and reasonable and fair prices?

Mr. THOMAS. Of course the Senator's question tempts one to enter into a rather extended field of discussion. I shall try, however, to avoid the temptation. The Senator knows that I was one who protested very vigorously against legislation by judicial decree effected through the insertion of a word in a statute that Congress deliberately refused to insert in the bill at the time of its enactment; but, answering the Senator as well as I can, I would say that while it is necessary to use general terms like the one he suggests and like the term "unfair competition," through the difficulty of specific recital, they can support and do support the infliction of penalties, but they never should be used for the purpose of indicting and convicting men of felony. I say they never should be; perhaps that is too strong a statement; but they should not be if it can be avoided.

Mr. KENYON. That question was raised in a case with which the Senator is familiar, which is known as the Nash case.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. In 221 Supreme Court Reports, where the contention was that inasmuch as the court had heretofore written into the statute by judicial decree that it must be an unreasonable restraint of trade, consequently the statute is void for uncertainty; and the Supreme Court said no. That is the only comfort I have been able to find in trying to sustain the theory of unreasonable price.

Mr. THOMAS. I hope that the comfort which the Senator obtains will be so substantial that it may be enjoyed also by the victims of the rent system now prevalent in the District of Columbia.

Mr. KENYON. It comforts me enough to be willing to vote for this proposed law only for the time of the war or until peace be declared, which I hope is not far away. If there was any permanent policy proposed, I should not be willing to vote for it.

Mr. THOMAS. I am satisfied of that. I do not think any one, with the possible exception of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], who wants to see a provision of that kind inserted as a part of the permanent statutes of the country, would be willing to vote for it. I certainly should not be.

It has been some time, Mr. President, since I have done much at the bar and a very considerable time since I have engaged in the practice of criminal law; but I have a general recollection that it is a fundamental principle in criminal jurisprudence that a defendant must know of what crime he is accused, and that the crime must be one specified in the statute at the time of and before its commission. If this language has been given by the Supreme Court sufficient potency to meet that requirement, then I am mistaken and it can be enforced.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado pardon me for a moment?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think it has. There is a vast distinction, I think, between illegal conduct defined by the Sherman antitrust law, to which the Supreme Court added the term "unreasonable" and a bill which simply undertakes to define as a crime something which is unreasonable without further description. The feature of the offense under the antitrust act was the illegal combination. There were two elements of the offense—illegal combination, constituting the offense, and conspiracy to restrain trade. The Supreme Court added that it should have an unreasonable effect. But there was a definite act by the defendant with which he must be charged entirely outside of the supplementary feature of unreasonableness.

Mr. THOMAS. But a definite act made contingently indefinite by judicial interpretation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Made contingently indefinite by the Supreme Court's interpretation. I find no case, or at least I recall none, in which the mere charging of an unreasonable profit has ever been made a crime. While the Senator is on this subject, would he mind my calling attention to the decision?

Mr. THOMAS. Not at all.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is the decision of Mr. Justice Brewer in 52 Federal Reporter. In so many words he decided that in order to constitute a crime the act must be one as to which the party is able to know in advance whether or not it is criminal, and he held "the criminality of an act can not depend upon whether a jury may think it reasonable or unreasonable." There must be some definiteness and certainty to sustain the act.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not want to interrupt the Senator. I thought he had finished.

Mr. THOMAS. I shall be very glad to yield to the Senator, for I may speak for 20 minutes yet.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I had rather wait until the Senator is through, as I want to do a little talking myself.

Mr. THOMAS. When interrupted, Mr. President, I was about to refer to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia, which I shall read:

And provided further, That to make unjust or unreasonable a rate or charge in handling or dealing in or with any necessaries, except where there has been a conspiracy, combination, or arrangement with reference to prices, such rate or charge must be in excess of the rate or charge fixed by a fair-price committee, and the Department of Justice is authorized to provide for the appointment of fair-price committees.

Mr. President, I hesitate somewhat about criticizing this proposed amendment because of my respect for the well-known legal ability of the Senator from Georgia; he will no doubt propound this amendment in a very interesting and learned, if not a convincing, way; but, with all due respect to the Senator, I am unable to perceive how this proposed amendment helps the situation, nor can I escape the conclusion that it complicates it very much. It adds another element of uncertainty, certainly another element of circumlocution to the commission of the offense. In order to justify the charge of unreasonable rates the Department of Justice is required to appoint fair-price committees, and then such committees are to fix fair prices which become the standard. If John Smith sells some commodity at a price in excess of that fixed by a roving committee or committees appointed for that purpose by the Department of Justice, he is guilty not of a violation of the statute but of a violation of a decree of an irresponsible committee. Men may be sent to the penitentiary or fined very heavily because, forsooth, they have violated a standard which is set by a committee appointed for that purpose. But the plural is used, and inasmuch as this proposed statute is universal, if it is to be made effective in that way, then the Attorney General must appoint at least one fair-price committee in every State, which would make 48 such committees, and he ought to appoint one fair-price committee in every considerable community in the United States, in which event they would number thousands.

The fair-price committee for the city of New York might fix one price and that for Jersey City, across the river, might fix another; that for the city of Washington might fix one price and that for the city of Baltimore another. Then the violation of the law would very largely depend upon the residence of the offender. What he does unlawfully in Baltimore might be perfectly lawful in Washington, and what he does unlawfully in Washington might be perfectly lawful in New York, and so on.

If that would bring satisfaction and settle a very serious problem confronting the people, well and good; but if, on the other hand, it would multiply the confusion already existing besides introducing another very grave constitutional question, to wit, whether a committee can legislate which has no authority and no legislative power except by delegation so as to subject citizens of the United States to criminal prosecution, I do not think it ought to be done, if it can be done.

A few years ago the courts held that it could not be done. Since then they have recognized the potency of regulations of the Interior Department and have punished men and women for violating them, so I hesitate to express the positive opinion that the proposed amendment is unconstitutional; yet I do believe that there is a distinction between a regulation made by the Secretary of the Interior or other Cabinet officer with reference to some matter within his jurisdiction and regulations made throughout the country and differing in character by committees of the departments appointed for that purpose. The regulation of the Secretary of the Interior upon any subject is general and applies to everybody; the regulation of the price committee of Baltimore applies to that city and may differ entirely or largely from that in other places.

I hesitate, Mr. President, even if I felt this were a legitimate solution of the situation to introduce it as a precedent in the criminal legislation of the country. We have already too many penal statutes. If we continue to legislate upon all of the activities of men, the Department of Justice will be the busiest of all of the departments of the Government. It is very difficult to-day, although it is easier than it was prior to the 1st of last July, for a man to walk with decorum from here to Baltimore without stumbling into half a dozen penal statutes. They are not only before us and behind us, but, like the guns of Balaklava, "they thunder to the right of us and to the left of us." Every time anything happens that is out of the way the Government is asked to pass some more penal statutes, to the end that all citizens may be required to walk more rigidly in the straight and narrow path and to forsake as far as possible those practices which have interfered with the rights of others.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, is the Senator quite sure that they stumble into these criminal statutes going from Washington to Baltimore? I thought it was the other way.

Mr. THOMAS. I said both ways—in front of us and behind us. Of course, the distribution now is not so impartial as it was, but I think it is there just the same.

So, Mr. President, I am unable to give my support to this bill as it now stands. I might occupy the attention of the Senate with regard to some of its details which I have not touched, but the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] wants the floor, and I have already talked almost to the extent of my physical capacity; so I shall surrender the floor after making reference to an incident which was brought into this discussion yesterday by the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. I refer to his criticisms of the items of expenditure with which the Senate has been furnished by the President relating to the work of the peace congress in Paris.

The Senator referred particularly to the item of $150,000 given to Mr. Bernard M. Baruch, who was one of the experts attending the President upon going to Paris last December. I do not claim that the Senator made any charge against Mr. Baruch; he did not, but he certainly can not plead not guilty to innuendoes, which are sometimes perhaps less defensible than direct charges. I hold no brief for Mr. Baruch. I have known him in a business way and socially for a great many years, and I am, therefore, able to bear testimony to his abilities, to his capacity, and to his integrity as a citizen.

It is true, I think, that Mr. Baruch has been engaged, as was stated yesterday, in raising campaign funds for the Democratic Party; and it may be, as the Senator insinuates, that because of that service he was honored with the position which was given to him as a member of that delegation. But, Mr. President, when campaigns come around, and funds are needed to meet the expenses which they necessarily involve, the Democratic Party is not the only party which resorts to men like Mr. Baruch for comfort and financial aid. Indeed, I may say that the distribution of Baruchs between the parties is grossly, and sometimes very unfairly, unequal. In other words, where the Democratic Party has one, it is safe to say that the Republican Party has a half dozen of such gentlemen; and their contributions, while criticized in off years, are welcomed and applauded most heartily when campaigns are on.

Last year I offered upon the floor an amendment to the revenue bill providing for a tax of 100 per cent upon all contributions in excess of $1,000 per man for political purposes. It passed the Senate. I do not know whether the Senator from Nebraska voted for it or not. He probably did. It passed the House, and was then killed in conference. If my recollection serves me right, I was the only man who defended it against the conference report on the floor after it came back. I do not mean to say that if I had had support I would have endeavored to defeat the conference report, because the bill was one of enormous importance; but I do say that if Congress would legislate as it has the power to legislate against this evil, the Democratic Party could stand it, in all probability, a great deal better than the Republican Party.

This $150,000 was allotted to Mr. Baruch for the payment of necessary expenses in the performance of one of the most important duties entailed upon the congress of Versailles. It was his duty, and he performed it well, in conjunction with representatives of other governments, to ascertain, as far as it were possible, the extent and character of the injuries inflicted upon Belgium and France by the German armies, and the ability of the German people to make response in damages, either in money or in kind. When I tell the Senate that out of that sum Mr. Baruch was able to perform his task by the expenditure of but $35,000, not including his own expenses, every cent of which he paid out of his own pocket, I think I may fairly conclude that the record of that gentleman as a patriotic and self-denying citizen in our recent great time of trouble and of crisis will compare at least favorably with that of others occupying important positions in the United States during the period of the German war.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, when Thomas Jefferson, the sage of Monticello, received at his country home a letter from James Monroe submitting to him the proposition made by Canning, then premier of Great Britain, to our minister, Benjamin Rush, then representing us at the Court of St. James, to ward off the Holy Alliance from America, he in substance said:

This proposition confronts my intelligence with the greatest question with which it has been faced since the consideration of our own independence.

We are faced to-day with a greater question than the Monroe doctrine, a greater question than any other except, perhaps, our own independence; so that we may place ourselves in Thomas Jefferson's shoes and repeat substantially what he said.

This is not a time, Mr. President, for idle insolence of opinion. This is not a time for partisanship or littleness. This is not a time when men should give heed to their hates. It is a time when we are considering whether or not the great principle of universal love and justice and mutual honorable treatment can or can not enter into the affairs of the world through some sort of international agreement made by the peoples of the world—not merely by their Governments, but by them—an agreement amounting to an "amphictyonic council" of the civilized world.

In the face of all that, there went out this morning upon the wings of the American press—for I may well compare it to a great eagle, with outspread wings, taking a flight almost beyond any other force in the world—the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, the reputed author of which is the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. Mr. President, the insouciant audacity with which the Senator from Massachusetts posits himself toward any proposition, no matter how world-widely important, and the cool insolence with which he proportions himself toward any other force or any other man or set of men, even men like David Lloyd-George and Clemenceau and Woodrow Wilson, the latchets of whose shoes he seems to have convinced himself that he is thoroughly worthy to untie, was never better illustrated than in this so-called report.

Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts has faced this entire situation in that report, as he has in previous relationships in which he has posited himself toward the question, just as if he were discussing a bill to pave Connecticut Avenue, and certain amendments that the Senate wanted to place upon a House bill that had come to us for that purpose. The soul and the spirit of "the great adventure" seem never to have gone into his consciousness, while he dabbles with the letter of it just as he would dabble with the materials of a pavement for Connecticut Avenue. In his view it is as if all that is necessary is for the Senate to amend the House bill and send it to conference.

Every possible amendment that we may seek to make to this great instrument we can make after we have ratified it, if it is right to make it.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] has boldly and bravely taken the position after much hesitation and vacillation which was originally taken by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], that he wants to beat the treaty; that he does not take any stock in altruism, he does not take any stock in idealism, he does not take any stock in the spirit of Jesus Christ that there may come a time when men may rather be associated together by bonds of love than mutually watching one another with suspicion. He wants "America to work out her own destiny in her own way," regardless of the world. The Senator from Massachusetts did not have the courage to take that position, if he wanted to take it. I do not know whether he did or not; but, at any rate, he offers here amendments which will kill this treaty, if adopted, deader than an out-and-out vote for its dissolution.

Mr. President, I hold before me—and that is the main object of my rising—an article in the New York World of September 11, which is headed "LODGE'S Prussian report," and the editor did well so to denominate it. It breathes the insolence and the brutality of Prussianism all the way through it except that it substitutes for Prussianism, the spirit that "Germany shall rule the world," a hybrid chauvinistic Americanism, expressing the idea that America must have the sole and the final say on every question which relates to her and to the balance of the world. Now, Mr. President, there may be Americanism gone mad, just as well as there was Prussianism gone mad, and we must avoid it. We must hold ourselves as high above it as we are high above the Prussians and remain superior to them as citizens of a free Republic as compared with their docility as slaves to an autocracy. Patriotism! Yes, the grandest feeling in the world; pride in the Government and pride in that flag for all that it emblemizes. But when you begin to make a thing to worship of that flag in itself, as a representative merely of our force and our will, regardless of right and justice, then you have not only disgraced yourself but you have disgraced the flag; you have hauled it down from its high place in the world and you have dragged it in the slime of chauvinism.

Mr. President, when God created this world it is true He set aside the different peoples by lines of demarcation. But He made them, after all, the inhabitants of one earth, and He gave them certain laws, and a man who enters into the consideration of the relation of man to man or of nation to nation with the idea that the standpoint that he ought to take, or that his country ought to take, is one of suspicion and fear and constant watchfulness against suspected treachery, instead of one of entertaining and as far as possible teaching love and confidence amongst the sons and daughters of men, can not in his own nature arise, as Milton expressed it, "to the height of this great argument."

The World calls this committee report "LODGE'S Prussian report." It bristles with Prussianism. He seems to think he is the only "American" in America, or that those who follow him are the only Americans in America. There are some more of us. He is not "the only pebble upon the beach." He is not the only descendant of Abraham, as some Jew reproached another once with pretending to be. This whole comic act of his was displayed to the American public in comic opera before the Senator took his place upon the floor and said, "I am American; I am national, and national I must remain. National I choose to remain."

The cool insolence of the assumption; and yet the opéra bouffe of it, too. Remember the captain in Pinafore, "For I am an Englishman"; and then the gallery chorus sings, "For he is an Englishman."

We are all acquainted with Pinafore.

Song and chorus go on:

In spite of all temptations
To belong to other nations
He remains American.
He might have been a Russian, a Frenchman or a Prussian,
Or Italian;
But in spite of all temptations
To belong to other nations
He remains American.

Some of the balance of us remain American, too, for the simple reason that we were born that way and could not very well have helped it; and for another reason greater than that, because we love the flag, and the Constitution, and the Declaration of Independence, and the civilization and independence and liberty of America.

The cool, diabolical insolence which has been indulged in by more than one man upon the other side of the Senate in saying that those of us who advocate the league of nations and the ratification of this treaty of peace overlook the "independence" and the "sovereignty" of the United States, thereby accusing us of a lack of patriotism because our view gets a little bit beyond our borders and far beyond their power of vision, is resented by me for one as not only uncalled for but absolutely untrue, and known by the men who make the statement to be untrue.

Mr. President, this opéra bouffe Americanism is something we must avoid. Let us not indulge in these little comic opera airs, "I am American; I remain American." There might have been a great temptation to belong to some other nation—I do not know consciously, but I do not believe there could have been in my own case, and I can not imagine any real choice in the case of the gentlemen who talk that way. I say I am as good an American as any of them—a better one. I learned to love America and Americanism, not by staying here at home, but by being thrown abroad, where I learned to criticize and disavow and disapprove of things that were not American, and the longer I stayed the more I loved my own land, although I was the son of a Confederate soldier, who had fought against the Stars and Stripes and for the stars and bars.

Mr. President, I am going to ask unanimous consent to insert this editorial from the New York World of to-day as a whole in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"LODGE'S PRUSSIAN REPORT.

"Senator LODGE'S report as chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations is a masterpiece of misstatement and bad taste. Never before was any treaty reported to the United States Senate in the scolding, undignified, offensive manner in which the Senator from Massachusetts has presented this most important of all treaties.

"Senator LODGE begins by attacking everybody who has complained about the needless delay of the committee in reporting out the treaty of peace. It was a 'wholly artificial' demand, which was 'largely the work of the administration and its newspaper organs,' assisted by 'certain great banking firms which had a direct pecuniary interest in securing an early opportunity to reap the harvest which they expected from the adjustment of the financial obligations of the countries which had been engaged in the war.' 'The third element in the agitation for haste was furnished by the unthinking outcry of many excellent people who desired early action and who for the most part had never read the treaty.' Well-meaning folk, possibly, but fools.

"France, Italy, and Japan have been waiting to see what the Senate would do with the treaty; so why have not 'the distressed mourners over delays in the Senate' also aimed their criticism at these nations as 'an act of even-handed justice in fault-finding'? Moreover, Great Britain has ratified the treaty and there are still industrial disturbances in England pending reconstruction. In the opinion of Senator LODGE, Lloyd-George must have been 'remiss in omitting to suggest that prompt action by the Senate of the United States in adopting the covenant of the league of nations would immediately lower the price of beef.'

"If argument is made that textual changes in the treaty would require the summoning of the peace conference and would mean further delay, Senator LODGE takes pains to insult the conference by remarking that 'the conference would at least be as usefully employed in that consideration as they now are in dividing and sharing southeastern Europe and Asia Minor, in handing the Greeks of Thrace over to our enemy Bulgaria, and in trying to force upon the United States the control of Armenia, Anatolia, and Constantinople through the medium of an American Army.'

"As for the matter of having to submit the amendments to Germany, that is a 'bugbear.' As Senator LODGE sees it, 'no great amount of time need be consumed in bringing German representatives to Paris. The journey is within the power of a moderate amount of human endurance.' That is all this issue, with its opportunities to German diplomacy to drive a wedge between the United States and the Allies, means to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

"OTHERS' RESERVATIONS.

"In the same tone of studied insolence Senator LODGE discusses the amendments themselves and the reservations. 'This covenant of the league of nations is an alliance and not a league.' It makes no difference what this country does; the other nations must submit, regardless of right or justice or fair dealing or anything else. 'The other nations know well that there is no threat of retaliation possible with the United States.' 'The other nations will take us on our own terms, for without us their league is a wreck and all their gains from a victorious peace are imperiled.' 'This is the hour when we can say precisely what we will do and exactly what we will not do.' 'When we are once caught in the meshes of a treaty of alliance or a league of nations composed of 26 other powers our freedom of action is gone.'

"To say that this is the language of Prussianism is to speak incorrectly perhaps, for Prussianism at least adhered to the ordinary courtesies of diplomacy in foreign affairs. It is worse than the language of Prussianism; it is the spirit of Prussianism—arbitrary, mendacious, dictatorial, and insolent.

"No other such offensive document has ever come out of a Committee on Foreign Relations. It is an exploit in counterfeit chauvinism which recalls the worst days of shirt-sleeve diplomacy. It is a parody on patriotism, and to put it forth at this time when the whole world is staggering under the wounds of the most terrible war that was ever fought is to degrade Americanism and smear with the slime of partisanship the glorious records of the American people in this supreme tragedy."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am going to read some parts of this editorial, because it seems to me that I ought to read them. But before I go to that, Mr. President, I saw an indication the other day of this thought that seems to me to be right; that if, as the Senator from Massachusetts says, the covenant of the league of nations "will breed wars instead of stopping them," or having a tendency to do that, then why should the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] or anybody else, including the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], bother himself about reservations? The more the reservations, and the less they are agreed to by other nations, the more occasion there is to breed war from mutually discordant interpretations. A man who was willing to accept this treaty with reservations which merely explain and interpret, if what he says be correct, ought to be able to accept it without them; if they do more than explain and interpret they are a self-confessed false pretense, for "explanation and interpretation" are the open doors of false pretense through which they seek entry.

Here is a part of the language of Senator LODGE. Now permit me to go on and read a part of this editorial. This is the language:

As Senator LODGE sees it, "no great amount of time need be consumed in bringing German representatives to Paris."

Hear the cool sarcasm and insolence of it. If it had been a Prussian, we would have said the brutality of it.

The journey is within the power of a moderate amount of human endurance.

A great people, seventy millions of population, whipped to their knees, received an ultimatum and were told to "sign upon the dotted line," and they signed because they could not do anything else. The Senator from Pennsylvania the other day, not I, spent quite a while of the Senate criticizing the severity of this treaty. I do not think it deserves that criticism, because it is not a bit too severe to go with the German crime. But here comes the Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. KNOX's colleague on the committee, and with cruel insolence, if not brutality, uses this language about this defeated people:

No great amount of time need be consumed in bringing German representatives to Paris. The journey is within the power of a moderate amount of human endurance.

That is humor; it is wit! Noncombatant wit! Call them up every week and give them another ultimatum, until you have given them about a dozen ultimata, and when you have gotten through delivering ultimata of various sorts, if you have found that you have not taken all the flesh that you could from around the Venetian merchant's breast, ask, like Shylock, for more!

Mr. President, I wanted to whip Germany as badly as any man in the world. I wanted to rebuke and forever make to cease to exist in this world her autocracy, her insolence, and her audacity. But there must be a finality even to ultimata, even to treaties extorted by compulsion, and when you have told a fellow that one thing will satisfy you one week you have not a right to go back every next week and tell him that you demand something more and then to add, with cool insolence, that "the labor of the journey" in coming to sign again upon dotted lines will not be "any great test of his physical endurance."

The Senator lightly passed over the necessity of sending back amendments to the text of the treaty to our Allies and associates in the war, though he could not even do that without insolently insulting them, and saying that they would be better occupied doing that than in "dividing Thrace and giving part of it to our enemy Bulgaria instead of our friend Greece." The spirit of insult is oozing out toward everybody in the world with whom we were allied. The Senator from Pennsylvania insulted nearly everybody except Germany. The Senator from Massachusetts has gone him one better and added Germany to the list.

Ah, Mr. President, you and I have a quarrel. You whip me, you whip me to my knees; I agree to quit or, in the other case, I whip you and you agree to quit. But to make me first say one thing and then make me say another, and then make me say a third or a fourth—there must be an end to this thing unless I am unwilling to die for honor's sake.

But suppose, Mr. President, that Germany declined to sign on the dotted line. Suppose there were just enough manhood and courage left in Germany for her to say, "No; I accepted your terms; you have amended the terms; you have made a new treaty out of it, and I decline to sign it." What are you going to do? Are we to start this whole World War over in order to make the opinions of a few Senators of the United States concerning verbal reservations, and comparatively unimportant amendments, the law of the civilized peoples of the world?

Are we to summon our own boys with those of stricken Belgium and devastated France and exhausted England and starved and disease-stricken Serbia once more into the trench lines, not to enforce the treaty which we placed before Germany and had her sign but to enforce new amendments to it to be drawn up by the Senator from Massachusetts, the Senator from Iowa, the Senator from California, the Senator from Washington, and the Senator from Pennsylvania mutually supporting one another—all to save the pride of opinion of each. On second thought I leave the Senator from Pennsylvania out, because he is willing to beat the whole business and be done with it, because in what he asks us to do his course is better than that of the others, not only braver and more manly, but it is better; would do less harm to the world.

Suppose Germany does say "I will not sign"—and, Mr. President, there is such a thing as pressing a proud though a defeated people to the point of where they say "no." Germany is not only the land of Bernhardi and of Ludendorff and of Hindenburg and of this miserable, cowardly Kaiser, who deserted his army and his people in the time of their direst need, but it is the land of Heine, and of Goethe, and of Schiller, and of König, and of that great philosopher, the first apostle of peace, the author of the transcendental philosophy, "Pure Reason," and of a world peace, Emanuel Kant; the land of Von Arndt, and of Lessing, and of Uhland.

Mr. President, why play with fire in a magazine? I am not fool enough to believe that the Senator from Massachusetts was fool enough to believe that he did not know what he was doing. I accuse him—and if I am mistaken I am sorry—of wanting to defeat the league of nations and the treaty of peace, and wanting to do it indirectly if he could not do it directly; and under all the plausible utterances of that report I think I see that intent sticking out between the lines all over this Prussian "report." It seems to me the author was attempting, deliberately and with ulterior motive, to make people—our late associates in war—angry, with intent to force them to defeat the league. Japan has been insulted, the council has been insulted, Germany is politely told that the only thing between her and the utmost degree of humiliation that can be inflicted upon her now, after she is defeated and on her knees and holding up her hands and begging for peace, is "the physical endurance that it takes to go from Berlin to Paris." That is the spirit of this thing, miscalled a committee report.

As I said a moment ago, the Senator has never risen to "the height of this great argument"; he has never seen the soul and the purpose of this great proposition, unexcelled in its world-wide importance. He merely sees the letter. I scorn to discuss, as he does, these little reservations of one sort or another, though I may sink to that depth for expediency's sake at a later date. I am talking now about rising to the height, standing up high where one can see over the valley, viewing a forest instead of picking quarrels with the leaves upon the trees soiled by the dust blown by the winds.

There is another part of this editorial I want to read. The Senator says:

> The covenant of the league of nations is an alliance and not a league.

It was Shakespeare who said that "a rose by any other name would smell as sweet," and a thing that is not a rose could smell just as bad if you gave it another name. Who cares for that little picayunish announcement? Call it a "league," call it an "alliance," call it a "confederation," call it a "concert," anything you please, there is the thing—the league or what not—whose language speaks for itself. It is a great and sublime effort to bring the civilized and free world into concert of action for the preservation of the peace of the world and the protection of the lives and the perpetuation of the civilization and the progress of mankind. If it be urged that it is not a perfect thing and we "can not do it," the answer is, "Well, it is worth the trying." Nothing human was ever born full grown, and "faint heart ne'er won fair ladie."

When they wrote to Thomas Jefferson, men like Patrick Henry and Samuel Adams, the heroes who were the very Samsons in the fight of the Revolution, who opposed the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, and suggested that it would have to be amended, the old sage of Monticello, as he came later to be known, wrote back: "Let us adopt it first and amend it later." The methods of amendment of the league of nations are simpler and easier than the method of amendments to the Constitution of the United States. We have had 18 amendments to that and every one of them, except one, in my opinion, has made it a better instrument. Our ancestors adopted Thomas Jefferson's idea, and the various States said "we must have a bill of rights. You have protected the States and the Nation, but you have not protected the individual against all forms of government. We must have that." What was the consequence? The unanimous adoption of the first 10 amendments, which cured the defects in the Constitution.

Do you suppose "there will be no more cakes and ale because you love them not"? Do you suppose human wisdom is going to stop when this instrument is signed? Do you suppose human wisdom is going to stop and cease to exert its influence in connection with great world affairs when the Members of this Senate expire by the grace of God, even including the Senator from Massachusetts? Was there ever a man born yet in the world that was born a grown man? All of them are born children, and they had to grow up to be men. Was there ever a human instrument or document in the world signed by any set of human beings that did not have to be perfected after those who had drawn it up and submitted it to the world thought they had approached as near perfection as they could? You can not even live by Magna Charta in its original form nor by the Declaration of Independence nor by the old Constitution of the United States, and you have even a little difficulty living by the present one; even it will need more amendments.

Listen to this; does not this sound like Kaiser Wilhelm talking about Germany and a place in the sun and saying, "I must be consulted" and "Germany must be consulted about every important event that takes place on this earth?" This is the language of the Senator in his report:

> The other nations will take us on our own terms, for without us their league is a wreck, and all their gains from a victorious peace are imperiled.

Take us on our own terms or do not take us at all! We do not want to meet you and "reason together in brotherly love," as St. John advised!

We meet together here, dictate the terms of peace and living together on earth by one branch of the Federal Government with an accidental majority. That is not all he said; he added:

> This is the hour when we can say precisely what we will do and exactly what we will not do.

What will the balance of you, France, Great Britain, Belgium, and Italy, "scullions in my kitchen," "base slaves in my household," do against not the will of America but the will of a temporary majority in the United States Senate—arrived at by political logrolling? The World says:

> To say that this is the language of Prussianism is to speak incorrectly perhaps, for Prussianism at least adhered to the ordinary courtesies of diplomacy in foreign affairs.
> It is worse than the language of Prussianism—
> The World says—
> It is the spirit of Prussianism, arbitrary—

And then an adjective which I leave out because it is unparliamentary and ought not to have been inserted, but leaving it out and reading further:

> Dictatorial and insolent. It is a parody upon patriotism—
> Speaking of the report—
> And to put it forth at this time when the whole world is staggering under the wounds of the most terrible war that was ever fought is to degrade Americanism and smear with the slime of partisanship the glorious record of the American people in this supreme tragedy.

Oh, Mr. President, one can not express one's self properly. Does the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], does the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], who is generally so conservative in his language, recall the state of the world that led to this great tragedy? If there were any Americans who wanted their boys killed in Europe, I was not one of them. I was glad to see mine go, because it showed that they were worthy of all their ancestors except myself—for all of them except myself had gone at one time or another to the defense of some flag in which they believed—but it was a dernier resort, it was a choice between two evils, and there was hardly a night during the whole long spell that I did not think of the possibility of the next telegram bringing me news that an almost beardless boy would have to be sent back to the plantation to be buried at the feet of his grandfather. If I felt that way—cynic as I am—how do you suppose tender women felt, how do you suppose sisters and sweethearts and wives felt?

But to come back to this report, by its language it does not make any difference, when we once announce our wills these scullions of ours in Europe have got to obey, and if they do not the whole league will go to pieces, as the Senator from Massachusetts says, and for what little he says it appears that he would not care much or at all if it did.

Give up the hope of peace, even though it be a dream, and go back to the absolute necessity and actual affrontation of horrible war? It is easy to be a critic; it is easy to be verbally smart; it is easy to say little things that will go out and be taken up by the paragraphers in the press; it is easy to rise, as a man here in another wing of this Capitol did the other day, and bravely denounce the President of the United States as "seeking to be a king." It is easy to arraign him as if he were a felon, when the worst that could be said about him by the veriest enemy he ever had, if said with truth, would be that he dreamt a dream and tried to put it on paper, and that "he was not a good dreamer nor a sound one." That is not much of an indictment. I could draw it up in due legal form against our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. His dream has not yet come true "on earth as in heaven."

Are you going to substitute American chauvinism for the flagrant, blind, brutal, and insolent Prussian chauvinism that we have just gotten rid of or that we flatter ourselves that we have gotten rid of by the cost of millions of lives and billions of dollars? I put in that condition because I am not certain that we have gotten rid of it, because if this league of nations fails we have not gotten rid of it.

The Senator from Massachusetts says this is "an alliance and not a league." So be it, if he chooses to use the word, but there will be another alliance unless this league of nations is put into operation and becomes effective, and that will be between Germany and Russia and Japan, with 400,000,000 Chinamen governed and drilled by German and Japanese officers, with German and Japanese discipline. There will be your "yellow peril," sure enough, not mere Japanese and Chinese immigration in America and Canada, but the brutal hordes of Timerlane with big guns, poison gas, and airplanes. Just give them time. Germany never would have gone into this war at all if she had known she had to meet these associated powers which the Senator from Massachusetts now calls an alliance and to which he denies the name of league. But the minute that alliance, or league, or whatever you choose to call it, ceases to exist, she will go to recuperating, as she did after the Napoleonic war, and the sympathies of the Germans, those of German birth in the Tyrol and in Austria will be with her; the Maygars will be ready to strike; the Bulgars will probably be there, too. Turkey, unless the league of nations divides out Turkey among the mandatories of great powers, will be still upon the map. Russia—a broken giant, blind, seeking a way out, stupid, corrupt in its upper classes and ignorant in its lower, fit subjects for German propaganda—will still be upon the map and ready for any alliance which will bring order and food—"order and food" which we can not give her, because the Senator from California and others think it illiberal, if not unholy, for us or Britons to fight Bolshevism outside of our own country.

Japan is in Siberia now. The President has been very much criticized because he wanted to make the force there not exclusively Japanese but international by having some British and some Americans go along. Why? To prevent another excuse for another Shantung incident of "conquest and accomplished fact." Japan will still be in Siberia. What is the man going to do who is not willing to fight for the liberty of the world in an international brotherhood by concert and friendly action, who is not willing to let his boys go to fight for that purpose—what is he going to do when it comes to freeing China and Russia from Japanese and German autocracy? Do you suppose that he can or will rise to the heights of that great argument, either?

Mr. President, I have just referred to the American press as being, perhaps, the greatest force in the world. I read part of an editorial in the New York Times as follows:

"The statesmen with whom Mr. Wilson was in conference at Paris have prepared a plan of such promised effectiveness that it has the world's approval to forestall our entanglement in the broils of Europe by preventing the broils."

This is in criticism of what the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] said about our becoming "embroiled in all the troubles of Europe." The Times continues:

"They substitute their own plan"—

"They" as used there refers to the Senators who want to bring about amendments and reservations—

"They substitute their own plan, which would make great wars as certain as anything can be"—

How make them certain? If in no other way, by going back to the status quo ante bellum, to the condition of things which existed in 1913 and 1914. The Times goes on—

"which would inevitably immerse and entangle us in conflicts of unknown magnitude and unforeseeable outcome. The Versailles treaty organizes one world at peace"—

Mark that. I continue reading—

"the Senate committee would call into being a world divided, always necessarily armed for war, and frequently engaged in war."

Why, Mr. President, we have just two horns of this dilemma: Adopt this league of nations for peace or go back to the condition before this world tragedy; go back to July, 1914, and then have more sense if the old condition is going to last than you had then, and arm yourselves as a nation cap-a-pie, with an Army of a million men upon a war footing and an Army of 4,000,000 or 5,000,000 potentially in reserve ready to be called, with all the Navy and all the munitions that you can summon in the world, then we can stand out with the same degree of reasonable chauvinism and say, "Whatever we say has got to be done," and then we can say it in the pride and insolence of our strength and our armament if we are going to say it at all. "Teddy" Roosevelt said that you must never bluff unless you are prepared to have the bluff called. There is an old saying out West, "Never pull your gun unless you are going to use it." There is a saying down South, also, that "a man is a fool who either talks about his gun or pulls it unless he is going to use it." If you are going to talk about your gun and talk about your isolation and talk about your self-sufficiency and talk about the other people having to do whatever you tell them and your own unlimited and unlimitable sovereignty, to do what you will, regardless of all other opinion—if you are going to say, "You can not use the word 'must' to the United States," as the Senator from Massachusetts does in this report, but that we can use it to the entire balance of the world, then not only must we have our gun ready, Mr. President, but have it loaded and have our finger upon the trigger. Then we must go to work at once and build up the greatest Navy, not excepting that of Great Britain; build up the greatest Army, not excepting that of any other two nations united, and say, "Here I stand upon my two feet, proud, isolated, chauvinistic America. The only trouble with Prussianism was that they did not have the power, but we have it and we defy the entire world"; and we say, in the language of the Senator from Massachusetts, "that if you do not like it," as he says to Germany, "'it is not a very great feat of physical endurance to come to Washington when I ask you and sign on the dotted line.'"

Mr. President, did the boys who died die for nothing? I notice that in Paris they erected a cenotaph to the dead side by side with a monument to the living and returning soldiers. There was an inscription, "These dead are also walking with you under the arch of triumph to-day." It was not only Flanders fields that they enriched with their blood, but they enriched with their blood and with the memory of it all the future of this world, all the aspirations and all the idealism and all the proud courage of their kindred in every nation under the sun. Their blood served more than as a fertilization for poppies and other flowers. It served as a fertilization of idealism and high dreams of liberty and peace. That British battalion that went into action in Flanders whose war cry was "Never again, never again, never again," expressed not only the true soul of that conflict but of this covenant of nations. Defective, of course, it is; all human instrumentalities are, simply because they are human. Even the word of God becomes imperfect by the mere translation of it by man. Let men mount to "the height of this great argument"; let them cease to be muck rakes, raise their eyes from the ground and seek the stars of hope in the heavens, and chief amongst those stars let them look at the star which yet twinkles in memory of the nativity of the Prince of Peace—the star of Bethlehem.

What care I if there be made a mistake here and there in this "great adventure"? It is the body that counts, not the raiment; it is the soul that counts, and not the word of the mouth; it is the dream and aspiration that count, and not the mere practical temporary accomplishment, which falls short so often. Speaking for myself, I believe that if I were condemned to live forever in a world with the same conditions which faced us in 1914 or die right now I would prefer to give up immortality on earth and die right now. There would not be much to my dying right now, anyhow; but there would be very much to having my children and grandchildren and their great-great-grandchildren to the utmost generation live under a cloud of international suspicion, fear, and hate, while every nation went armed, not because it wanted to fight, but because of abject fear that some other nation did want to fight and might at any moment call upon her to do so.

Mr. President, before I came to Congress I was a lawyer. I defended several men who killed others, but I never defended in all my life but one man who ever killed another who did not kill him because he was afraid of him. Very few nations go armed, very few nations go to war except out of fear of some other nation. So that bloodthirstiness and brutality are more or less allied with another and a meaner and a littler thing, to wit, abject cowardice.

Are you afraid to trust your fellow men? Before this war we might have seen some excuse for it. People spoke with contempt of the "Wop" and the "Dago," but they came out mighty well on the field of battle. You had been taught to believe in "French decadence," had you not; but they came out magnificent heroes, from the day that they faced the Germans upon the Belgian border to the time that they drove them back, following the two battles of the Marne. Every prejudice that hyphenated Americans of one description and another could raise against the Briton took the form of denunciation and contemptuous remarks, but the British bulldog, from the retreat before Mons down to and following up the last victory upon the battle field, proved that he was worthy to be a son and descendant of Richard Coeur de Lion, of the men who marched to the Crusades, the men who settled America, the men who gave the world Magna Charta, the men who gave it the Bill of Rights, the men who gave it Shakespeare and Milton, who gave it Keats, the sweet singer; Robert Burns, sweeter singer yet; who gave it Macaulay, Hume, and Gibbons to write the annals of the world; who gave it Huxley and Darwin and Tyndall and Newton to originate and follow up the science of the world; who gave it Stephenson to invent the steam engine; who gave it the man who revolutionized industry by the invention of the spinning jenny. These descendants of all these—Scotch, English, Welsh, and Irish—are just as honest as you are, just as good and just as honest as any miserable hyphenated so-called American who ever breathed to fight the league of nations and is now fighting it—Scotchmen and Welshmen, Englishmen and most Irishmen, too—all worthy of our confidence and worthy of our praise—intelligent in peace and brave in battle—as were the French, as were the Italians, and as were the poor, huddled, victimized, stricken people of Belgium, as were the Serbians, whom we have despised, but whose annals in this war have not been equalled, much less excelled, by Briton, Frenchman, Belgian, or Italian.

Why imagine, then, that you are superior to everybody else, and that your word must be the dictum, and that you do not even need to enter into concert with the other man, not even consult with him; that you can not even agree with him to leave yours and his mutual controversies to arbitration; or, when you do not think the matter of controversy is one for arbitration, you do not need to leave cooling time so that the decent opinion of the world may operate upon him and you before you go a l'outrance?

Mr. President, I now ask permission to insert, as a part of my remarks, the editorial headed "Defiant Recklessness," quoting this language from the report of the Senator from Massachusetts:

> The other nations will take us on our own terms—

And so forth. They have got to do it, I reckon, or the Senate of the United States will put on armor and lick them. There is something worse than being "a contemptible quitter," and I am not adopting that language; that is, being contemptibly insolent in your comparison of yourself with another man, or comparison of the men of your tribe with the men of all other tribes. This tribal insolency is the spirit that runs through this report. That is the spirit that runs through these speeches being made by the "trailers" of the President—"trailers," God save the mark! They can not other than follow after.

These Members of this august body seem to say, "Here I am. I worship myself. Therefore, I suppose, God Himself worships me. I am one of the chosen people," as the Kaiser said to the Germans about themselves—"Ye are the chosen people." "This committee is the anointed of the Lord," as the Kaiser imagined he was, "to point out the way for the chosen people."

Mr. President, did I secure permission to print as a part of my remarks this editorial?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave will be granted.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

[From the New York Times of Thursday, Sept. 11, 1919.]

"DEFIANT RECKLESSNESS.

"'The other nations will take us on our own terms, for without us their league is a wreck and all their gains from a victorious peace are imperiled.'

"These words from the report of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations submitting amendments to the treaty, words of terrible import and colossal insolence, will be read with profound regret by every American whose eyes are raised above the strifes of party, with deep pain by every friend of America in those foreign lands with which we are newly come into relations of closer friendship. They are not words spoken thoughtlessly in the heat of debate. They are part of a report prepared with deliberation, carefully considered and approved by the Republican majority of the committee, Mr. McCUMBER being the only majority member who withholds his assent, and they are submitted to the Senate and published to the whole world.

"There can be no misunderstanding the meaning of the sentence we have quoted. The Republican authors of the report declare that in the attempt to force upon other nations the treaty amendments they have framed they are willing to wreck the league of nations, the world's only safeguard against the recurrence of destructive war; they are willing to put in peril the 'gains from a victorious peace' that has cost millions of lives and an expenditure of $200,000,000,000. They have the full courage of their hardihood; they are inflexible in their purpose—for their amendments do wreck the league. Even though they should be accepted by all the other nations, the league would be a maimed and nerveless pact, its very heart plucked out, the ultimate sanction and power set up for the enforcement of its resolves altogether destroyed. This report of the Foreign Relations Committee, if the Senate shall act in the sense of that shocking passage, sets the world back a hundred years. It does destroy the gains of victory; it does annihilate the league of nations; it repudiates not only all that was won by the war but the declared purpose for which the nations poured out their blood and treasure. The Allies and the United States took up arms to check the mad ambition of Germany; to destroy her dangerous military power they fought her until that purpose was achieved. They fought that nations and men might be free, that the world might be governed by law and justice, not by the will of autocrats; and in the peace council they drew up the covenant of nations to safeguard what they had won at such immense cost. All is sacrificed, all is lost, if these reckless men of the Foreign Relations Committee have their way.

"The passage we have quoted, a brazen disclosure of the defiant spirit in which the committee prepared its report, is of such overtopping importance that comment upon details seems hardly necessary. That passage controls the whole document. The report declares that the treaty is 'the most important subject that ever came before the Senate of the United States.' Yet, though the happiness of mankind and the destinies of nations are involved, the committee's report asks the Senate to treat the matter purely as though it were a question of party interest. The report speaks of 'a solemn public duty;' it declares that the United States can best serve the cause of peace 'by no permitting herself to be fettered by the dictates of other nations or immersed or entangled in all the broils and conflicts of Europe.' If this report had emanated from a committee of a board of aldermen, intelligent men would dismiss these expressions as mere canting humbug. Coming from a committee of so august a body as the Senate of the United States, in the known circumstances which have called them forth, we recognize such utterances as the fruit in part of partisan calculation, in part of vindictive passion. But we read the purpose of the committee in its acts. The definite things it recommends to the Senate for adoption are perfectly in keeping with the spirit of the burning passage in which it is declared that peace may go to wreck and ruin and the gains of victory be thrown to the dogs, but these perversely minded men of the committee must have their way.

"They say that the other nations 'will take us on our own terms.' On whose terms? Not the terms imposed by the people of the United States or approved by them, but a program of fatal amendments to the covenant and the treaty drawn up by nine Republican members of a committee which a Republican ex-President of the United States declared was expressly packed against the league of nations. They talk about the danger that the United States may be 'immersed and entangled in all the broils and conflicts of Europe.' We have been embroiled in a conflict fought in Europe, but whose scope embraced the United States. It has cost us some $25,000,000,000 in expenditure and 100,000 lives. The statesmen with whom Mr. Wilson was in conference at Paris have prepared a plan of such promised effectiveness that it has the world's approval to forestall our entanglement in the broils of Europe by preventing the broils. That plan the Republicans who drew up this report would destroy utterly. They substitute their own plan, which would make great wars as certain as anything can be, which would inevitably immerse and entangle us in conflicts of unknown magnitude and unforeseeable outcome. The Versailles treaty organizes one world at peace; the Senate committee would call into being a world divided, always necessarily armed for war, and frequently engaged in war."

CONTROL OF FOOD PRODUCTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8624) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I want to urge on the Senate that we consider this rent bill and profiteering bill and get through with it this week. We are going to find ourselves on Monday in the situation of coming up against the treaty; and both the measures are of tremendous importance, of course. The Attorney General and the President appealed to Congress something like three weeks ago for this legislation. While we have doubts about it as a permanent policy, it is only to apply until the end of the war, or until peace is declared; and it seems to me, in view of the situation we will be in on Monday, that we ought to dispose of this legislation one way or the other this week.

I am not going to take up any time, but I hope we can take up the amendments now.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I also hope very much that we will dispose of the little banking bill that I tried to get up here on last Saturday. There was only one objection to it. I am going to try to make it the unfinished business immediately after we dispose of this bill. It ought not to take an hour.

Mr. KENYON. I think we all want to clear the decks for action next week.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, does the Senator from Georgia desire to proceed this afternoon?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If you wish me to do so, I will proceed this afternoon.

Mr. HARRISON. Would the Senator object to our passing upon these other amendments, and then the amendment that he has?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not at all.

Mr. KENYON. Are we not to vote on the Owen amendment now?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly; I think we are ready to vote on the Owen amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, at the end of section 2, it is proposed to insert the following:

That this section, with the interpretation of the term "necessaries," as set forth in the act approved August 10, 1917, shall not cease to be in effect upon the cessation of the existing state of war between the United States and Germany.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Johnson, S. Dak.	McNary	Stanley
Beckham	Jones, Wash.	Myers	Swanson
Capper	Kellogg	Norris	Thomas
Chamberlain	Kendrick	Page	Townsend
Curtis	Kenyon	Phipps	Trammel
Dial	Kirby	Pomerene	Wadsworth
France	Knox	Robinson	Walsh, Mass.
Gerry	La Follette	Sheppard	Walsh, Mont.
Harris	Lodge	Smith, Ga.	Williams
Harrison	McKellar	Smoot

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] are absent from the Senate on public business. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON], the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS,] and the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], are detained from the Senate on official business. The junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY] is absent on business of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. GRONNA answered to his name when called.

Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. SPENCER, Mr. NUGENT, and Mr. NEW entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, September 12, 1919, at 12 o'clock, meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, September 11, 1919.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Rev. William Couden, late chaplain of the Second Division, American forces in Germany, offered the following prayer:

God in heaven, Thy revolving earth brings those to the east of us to the rest of night while it awakens to a new day "our brethren 'neath the western sky," thus the shining of light encircles the world. We pray that likewise the gleaming of truth and love may sweep over all until the repose and the activities of all men may be governed by Thy will. Bless the churches, the schools, the constructive agencies of Governments, the movements of uplift, and the united efforts of all noble men and women that make for brotherhood, justice, and clean living. As of old, Thou didst call to young Samuel in the night silence of the tabernacle, so search our hearts and call to us in the inner chambers of our being, that we, too, may feel ourselves chosen to Thy service. Then may we answer Thee, "Speak, Lord, for Thy servant heareth." We ask this for the sake of this needy world, which Christ died to save. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. STEVENSON, for two weeks, on account of important business;

To Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee, until Wednesday, September 17, on account of important business.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 15 seconds in order to have a telegram read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent to proceed for 15 seconds. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to have received a telegram from Hon. Edwin C. Bean, secretary of state for the State of New Hampshire, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read in my time.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

CONCORD, N. H., September 10, 1919.

SHERMAN E. BURROUGHS, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

Suffrage passed house 212 yes, 143 no; senate 14 yes, 10 no.

EDWIN C. BEAN.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. Under the order of the House, by unanimous consent, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has permission to address the House for 40 minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I think I shall be able to yield back a great part of this time if I can get unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and I make the request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I suggest that the gentleman prefer his request later. For the present I shall object.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, before proceeding with my discussion, I want to mention a serious situation. The policemen of Washington have formed a union and have affiliated with the American Federation of Labor.

The benefit to be derived from affiliation with the American Federation of Labor is the sympathetic strike of all unions backed up by force to compel compliance with the demands that may be made by the affiliating union. Sympathetic strike means simply this, that all affiliated union men have sympathy with the separate causes of each and all other unions, that they will stand together and by force compel compliance with demands.

When policemen strike, it is an invitation to all thugs and lawbreakers to proceed without hindrance to loot, murder, and rape. Policemen affiliated with all other unions simply means that when any union men strike and break the law they will not be opposed by sympathizing policemen brothers. The first fruit and immediate result of all strikes is disregard for and the breaking of laws. To illustrate the ridiculous situation of a police strike I merely have to insert here the following report from yesterday's Washington Star:

STATE GUARDS CALLED TO SUPPRESS DISORDER DUE TO POLICE STRIKE—BOSTON AUTHORITIES UNABLE TO STEM THE TIDE OF LAWLESSNESS—LOOTING OF STORES GOES ON UNCHECKED—SCENES APPROACHING ANARCHY FREQUENTLY OBSERVED IN THE IMPORTANT BUSINESS DISTRICTS.

BOSTON, September 10.

Mayor Peters announced at noon to-day that he had taken over control of the police department from Commissioner Curtis, a State appointee, and had called upon the State guard organizations to assist in maintaining order.

BOSTON, September 10.

Gov. Coolidge early this afternoon called out the Fourth Brigade of the State guard, made up of the Eleventh, Twelfth, and Fifteenth Regiments, and the Machine Gun Company of the Fourteenth Regiment. The troops were ordered to report to Mayor Peters forthwith.

BOSTON, September 10.

Lawlessness was rampant in Boston to-day. Without adequate police protection, private citizens were left to their own resources to protect their lives and property.

Since the police struck at 5:45 o'clock yesterday afternoon there has been no organized police power able to cope with the situation that last night approached anarchy, and to-day appeared to grow more serious as the inadequacy of the makeshift arrangements intended to preserve public order became obvious to the criminally inclined.

CITY ABANDONED TO HOODLUMS.

Last night the city was virtually abandoned to the hoodlum and criminal. For some reason not publicly explained the volunteer force, which it had been expected would go on duty when the police quit, was not called out until this morning.

The banks and larger mercantile institutions were protected by their own guards, but the small retailer was at the mercy of mobs which included in their number all elements from the purely mischievous to the downright criminal. Store windows to a number estimated at 300 were smashed in and goods by the armful carried away. Police Superintendent Crawley placed the damage done during the night at $300,000.

DESTRUCTION IN DOWNTOWN BOSTON.

Downtown Boston presented a sad picture this morning. The systematic looting had ceased apparently with the coming of daylight, but evidences of last night's lawlessness were plentiful. On Washington Street near School Street the whole glass front of a haberdashery had been smashed.

ATTACKS ON WOMEN FREQUENT.

Attacks on women throughout the night were frequent and atrocious. In numerous parts of the city there were villainous assaults.

Are we to sit quietly and permit this disgraceful scene to happen in our beautiful Capital of the Nation? What is our remedy? For however many obstacles have been thrown in the path of and temporarily obstructed the proper action of the District Commissioners attempting to prevent this evil, we still have a remedy. It is upon Congress, after all, the responsibility rests. All we have to do is to provide in the next appropriation bill that no part of same be paid to any employee who is a member of a union when such union is in any way affiliated with any other union. Or, better still, by a direct act we may prohibit all peace officers and employees of the Government from joining a union that affiliates with any other union. The burden rests upon us. The people of the United States are expecting us to act. What are we going to do is the vital question?

But I must get to my main discussion.

Mr. Speaker, for a subject, I propound this inquiry: What is there in, behind, or connected with the Department of Labor that has buffaloed the House of Representatives? Has this department grown so great that its creator is now impotent? Has it come to pass that Congressmen, who are directly responsible to the people for initiating legislation appropriating public money out of the people's Treasury, are arrogantly denied the right to know how public money which they have appropriated has been expended? Has the servant become greater than the master? Are we mere puppets, outwardly camouflaged with power, yet wearing caps and bells underneath?

Is it possible, Mr. Speaker and colleagues, that the House of Representatives of the United States of America is reluctant and afraid to enforce its proper mandates against the Secretary of Labor, because, forsooth, he is intrenched behind Mr. Samuel Gompers and the American Federation of Labor, which autocratic powers have threatened to put out of Congress every legislator opposing their will? I have too much respect and high regard for this Congress to believe any such piffle.

On the 5th day of June, 1919, the House of Representatives by an overwhelming vote passed House resolution No. 65, introduced by me, directing and requiring the Secretary of Labor to promptly furnish to the House the names of all of its employees holding dual positions and having near relatives in the same family employed by the Government. The Secretary of Labor was then furnished with a form of a questionnaire to be answered by employees, which would elicit the information sought, which questionnaire could have been delivered to all employees at the same time, answered by the next day, and within 24 hours said Secretary of Labor could have been in possession of all information requested, which by his ample, in many instances idle, office force could have been assembled and reported to the House within a very short time and with practically no expense. Yet months have passed, and no effort whatever has been made by the Secretary of Labor to furnish this information to the House, but, on the contrary, he has arrogantly and insolently disregarded and ignored its mandate.

As a ridiculous excuse for not complying, the Secretary of Labor claimed that it would be necessary for him to have a huge appropriation to expend, intimating that he was under the impression that he would have to propound the questionnaire to all of his 9,500 employees, which he claimed were scattered all over the world, while as a matter of fact the record made during the passage of said House resolution 65 clearly and unmistakably showed that it applied only to the employees here in Washington. The following are his remarkable communications:

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, June 11, 1919.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Receipt is hereby acknowledged of House resolution 65, dated June 5, and you are advised that the department will comply with the terms of the resolution as soon as it is possible for it to do so. You are doubtless aware that the force of the Department of Labor, approximately 9,500 employees, is scattered over the United States, Alaska, Porto Rico, the Hawaiian Islands, and England, France, and China, and it is going to take considerable time to get response from these officers. The handling of this questionnaire is placing an additional burden on the force already hard pressed to perform its duties, and an additional number of clerks will be necessary in order to perform the work of forwarding, receiving, and tabulating them within a reasonable time. Accordingly, I have submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury a detailed estimate amounting to $1,541, so as to provide the necessary clerical force, printing, and envelopes.

Cordially, yours,

LOUIS F. POST,
Assistant Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
OFFICE OF THE ASSISTANT SECRETARY,
Washington, June 11, 1919.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Transmitted herewith is an estimate of appropriation of $1,541, to enable the Department of Labor to furnish the information requested by the provisions of House resolution 65. To comply with this resolution without an addition to its clerical staff will seriously delay not only the work of the department but the furnishing of the information requested in the above resolution. There are approximately 9,500 employees of the Department of Labor scattered in all parts of the United States, Alaska, the Hawaiian Islands, Porto Rico, and in England, France, and China.

It is estimated that the work of forwarding these questionnaires, receiving replies, arranging and tabulating the same will require the services of six clerks for two months:

1 clerk, at $1,800	$300
1 clerk, at $1,600	266
4 clerks, at $1,200	800
Printing	100
Envelopes	75
Total	1,541

Of course, there will be no means of estimating the cost of the time lost by the bureau, section, and other chiefs distributing, or by the employees filling out, these questionnaires; but the above is the actual estimated additional cost to the department.

Cordially, yours,

LOUIS F. POST,
Assistant Secretary.

Mr. Speaker, in order to save the reading of a lot of facts to the membership, I hope my friend [Mr. WINGO] will not object to my extending them in the RECORD. I can save a great deal of time that way. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the gentleman extending his remarks by printing an official communication such as he suggests.

Mr. BLANTON. There are several matters here containing facts and figures that bear out my argument.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman will ask leave to extend his remarks by inserting such facts and figures and communications, I shall not object.

Mr. BLANTON. And certain communications connected with my speech that I could read.

Mr. WINGO. If they are official communications, I shall not object.

Mr. BLANTON. They are not all official communications. There are other facts and figures.

Mr. WINGO. If they are facts and figures, and not vituperation and abuse.

Mr. BLANTON. I shall not insert anything that is improper.

Mr. WINGO. I have no objection to anything that shows facts and figures.

Mr. BLANTON. And communications that bear out my argument, that do not abuse, that are not vituperation and abuse.

Mr. WINGO. Anything in temperate language that gives information to the House I have no objection to.

Mr. BLANTON. That is exactly what the documents seek to give—absolutely information to the House on very serious subjects.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed under the limitations suggested.

Mr. BLANTON. Now, Mr. Speaker, the above merely illustrates the inefficiency, wasteful extravagance, and utter unreliability of the Department of Labor. According to statement, it had 9,500 employees on the Government pay roll. It is well known that it is just as well equipped with typewriters, adding machines, mimeograph machines, multigraph machines, stenographers, stationery, and office supplies as any other department, and that there are more idle employees there than anywhere else in Washington. Yet this Department of Labor could not do what the Interstate Commerce Commission did. Let us examine Document No. 190, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session, which embraces the report of this department of Government, accompanied by the following communication:

EMPLOYEES OF INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SIR: The Interstate Commerce Commission has the honor to transmit herewith, in response to House resolution 71, June 5, 1919, the following statements:

Statement 1.—The names of all Government employees of said department who are employed by any person, firm, or corporation, the name of such employer, the hours of service given to such employer, and the amount of compensation received by such employee per month for such outside service.

Statement 2.—The names of all employees of the Interstate Commerce Commission whose spouse (wife or husband), father, mother, sister or sisters, or brother or brothers are in the civil employ of the Government, their names, department of service, hours of service, and amount of compensation per month, respectively, received by each and all of said relatives.

Very respectfully, CLYDE B. AITCHISON, Chairman.

On the first page of the above report it gave the names of 53 employees of this Government in that department alone who at the same time were also employed by outside persons, firms, and corporations. Of the hundreds of employees named in said department as having relatives employed by the Government Mr. George F. Graham, jr., who himself received $325 per month, was shown to have four near relatives employed in departments, to wit, his father, George F. Graham, sr., at $100 per month; his mother, Mattie M. Graham, at $95 per month; his sister, Nettie F. Graham, at $100 per month; and his brother, William S. Graham, at $250 per month, totaling $870 per month drawn by this one family, not counting their $240 additional bonus allowed by law. It was purposely sought to avoid disclosing to Congress the identity of the 9,500 employees in this Labor Department that the Secretary of Labor interposed his ridiculous excuse.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I have not the time to yield. Of course, the time that was taken up in the colloquy between the gentleman from Arkansas and myself will not be taken out of my time.

The SPEAKER. No. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BLANTON. I wish I had the time to yield, but I have not. I do not want to waste the time of the House. [Laughter.] Well, let us see about that. Am I wasting the time of the House?

Mr. VAILE. I do not think so.

Mr. BLANTON. My good friend from Colorado does not think so. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] very kindly asked that the House meet an hour earlier to-day; otherwise it would not have met until 12 o'clock.

Mr. BEGG. Oh, go ahead.

Mr. BLANTON. I am sure my colleague would not have the country believe that I am wasting time, when we have met here an hour earlier, and you did not have to come here unless you wanted to. I am very glad that you are here, however.

If the Interstate Commerce Commission, without asking for a dollar of expense, could by using its own office force, its own typewriters, mimeograph, and multigraph machines, comply with the resolution of the House, and in its report furnish the specific information requested of it by the House, why could not the Department of Labor have done likewise? When employees are continually coming to Congress for raises and contending that each must receive a salary large enough to maintain a family, is it not an important thing for Congressmen to know that the members of one family are drawing already $870 per month in salaries from the Government, besides the $240 bonus allowed by law in addition thereto? It is just such information as this in a department employing 9,500 employees that the Department of Labor has denied us.

But this is not the only turning down he has arrogantly given the House of Representatives. He has repeated the dose several times since.

On June 27, 1919, the House of Representatives passed by an overwhelming vote House resolution 128, introduced by me, requiring the Secretary of Labor to promptly report to the House what connection John B. Densmore had with the case of Thomas J. Mooney, attaching copies of his report thereon, and what later connection therewith the Department of Labor had with said case, and the expenses relating thereto itemized, and other requests. The Secretary of Labor paid no attention to this resolution until I introduced another to compel him.

During this time it was known that Fremont Older, a radical sympathizer with anarchists, had on November 1, 1918, published in his newspaper in San Francisco what purported to be a complete copy of John B. Densmore's report on the Mooney case. And it was well known that by reason of the misinformation given to the President on this case he recommended commutation, and Mooney's death sentence was commuted to life imprisonment.

I want to call the attention of the Congress to the fact shown in the report by the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] on the housing corporation bill, filed some time ago, where he shows that since the armistice had been signed a bunch of employees, about $1,200 men in some instances, have had their salaries raised by the Secretary of Labor, one of them even as high as to $9,996 per year. He refuses to tell us how many of such men he has.

Let me call your attention to the record of these facts connected with that report. Mr. Densmore first tells us here in the report introduced by Mr. BANKHEAD that neither he nor any person connected with the service had anything to do with the Mooney case, and yet when we have taken this report out of the Secretary's hands by resolution we find the first sentence of that report reads to this effect:

The Secretary of Labor:

Pursuant to instructions received from time to time during the past six months, I have the honor to report that I have conducted a secret and altogether informal inquiry into the Mooney case, and beg leave to submit herewith the results of my investigation.

And this report is signed by Densmore as director general of the United States Employment Service, and dated November 1, 1918.

He then goes on to tell how he feloniously installed a dictograph machine in the office of the district attorney in California, not to detect and punish criminals, if you please, but in order to assist a convicted anarchist to escape just punishment.

Let us now turn our attention to my House resolution No. 225, which the House of Representatives passed by an overwhelming vote on August 14, 1919, requiring the Secretary of Labor, whether he deemed it incompatible with the public interest or not, to forthwith furnish to the House information theretofore requested and unheeded, together with other information.

It will be remembered that when the Secretary of Labor sent his communication embracing the Densmore report on the Mooney case to the House, although it was dated July 22, it was presented July 23, and the Speaker on July 23, 1919, in the House referred it to a committee, and it was published as House Document No. 157. It will also be remembered by the press that on that very day John B. Densmore released from the Department of Labor a six-page, legal-cap, mimeographed statement, headed:

Department of Labor, Wednesday, July 23. Immediate release.

in an attempt to have the newspapers explain away the whole report. This mimeograph matter becomes especially important because it identifies another important document coming from the Department of Labor.

Now, after my fourth resolution, House resolution 225, was passed by the House, on August 14, 1919, demanding of the Secretary of Labor that he furnish the information sought, nothing of interest transpired in connection therewith until, on August 21, 1919, there was addressed to the Speaker of the House and to other Congressmen and some Senators a communication signed "C. H. Mathews, Capitol Park Hotel, Washington, D. C.," viciously attacking me, and claiming that three union-labor men belonging to the American Federation of Labor had worked a frame up on me by having one of their number send me anonymous letters signed "Safety first," attempting to detail improper matters in the United States Employment Service, and offering to furnish me proof by procuring and sending me certain files out of said department if I would put a personal notice signed "Helen" in the Star asking for same. Said Mathews's communication was so very libelous in its nature that none of the newspapers would agree to handle it for the interested parties, hence their chagrin may be imagined.

Immediately upon said letter offering to procure said files for me reaching my office my secretary called my attention to it, and I promptly told him that it was undoubtedly an attempted frame up, but to see what there was in it, and whether genuine or not, and to find out who was behind it. We would give them some rope by apparently accepting the information as bona fide and sincere, but I instructed my secretary that it would be unlawful for files to be removed. So in putting the personal in the Star it merely requested that copies be obtained, and no request was made for files. Now, a little later on I will show you exactly which of John B. Densmore's tools he used in this attempted frame up.

On August 29, 1919, the Secretary of Labor filed with the Speaker of the House his attempted compliance with the requirements made upon him by my said House resolution No.

225, passed in the House on August 14, 1919, which by the Speaker was referred and printed as House Document No. 209.

Notwithstanding that Densmore began his Mooney report as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., November 1, 1918.

Hon. W. B. WILSON,
Secretary of Labor, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Pursuant to instructions received from time to time during the past six months, I have the honor to report that I have conducted a secret and altogether informal inquiry into the Mooney case, and beg leave to submit herewith the results of my investigations.

Yet when the Secretary of Labor is requested to send the House copies of such instructions, which said Densmore said on November 1 he had received from time to time during the last six months, the Secretary of Labor says all such instructions were oral, although Densmore was in San Francisco and the Secretary in Washington, the following being Secretary Wilson's exact language in his report:

The only instructions issued to John B. Densmore in connection with the Mooney case were oral instructions that he (Mr. Densmore) should get any additional information that might be of value in securing a full understanding of the case for submission to the President and if necessary to the governor, and to utilize the services of the immigration inspectors assigned to him for the investigation of frauds in immigration cases for that purpose.

And when the Secretary was asked to give—

The names of all persons who, under the direction of any branch of the Department of Labor, had anything to do with the investigation of Thomas J. Mooney, charged with and convicted for heinous crime in California, stating in detail their respective activities, the amount of compensation paid them, respectively, and the expenses of such investigation itemized in detail during the six months between May 1 and November 1, 1918—

he arrogantly tells the House of Representatives of the United States—

It is not deemed compatible with the public interest to make public the names of these persons or to itemize their expenses.

We Congressmen are the representatives of the people who turned the people's money over to the Secretary of Labor in blanket appropriations for certain lawful purposes, yet after the Secretary of Labor has unlawfully misapplied this public money in behalf of a convicted anarchist, and we ask him for an itemized account, and the names of the parties who spent it, he tells us to go to the devil. And having Samuel Gompers and the American Federation of Labor behind him, we sit here supinely and let him do it.

And when we asked the Secretary in this resolution No. 225 to state—

What connection in behalf of the Department of Labor, if any, since the punishment of said Thomas J. Mooney was commuted to life imprisonment, and since November 1, 1918, has any employee of the Department of Labor had with said case of Thomas J. Mooney, stating such activities in detail, the expense of same itemized in detail, and upon what authority of law, attaching copies of all reports made thereunder to the Department of Labor—

this absolutely independent servant of the people again arrogantly tells the House of Representatives of the United States—

It is not deemed compatible with the public interest to disclose at this time its activities in detail, to itemize its expenses in detail, or to attach copies of reports thereunder to the Department of Labor.

And based upon his statement at Atlantic City, when addressing the American Federation of Labor convention, likewise attended by Mrs. Rena Mooney, wife of the anarchist, wherein Secretary Wilson, concerning the Mooney case, said:

Every effort that the national administration was able to put forth was put forth for the purpose of trying to secure that new trial, and we are not through with it yet. We are still working on it. [Applause, long and continued.]

Yet when in said section No. 225 the House of Representatives asked him to state—

What activities, if any, are now being conducted in behalf of Thomas J. Mooney—this wily public servant, the Secretary of Labor, again arrogantly tells the House of Representatives of the United States—

It is not deemed compatible with the public interest to make public the present activities of the department that affect the case of Thomas J. Mooney.

What is the House of Representatives going to do about it? The people of the United States expect proper action to be taken. They know all about the junketing trips to France and other places taken by so-called investigating committees, and they are not going to be camouflaged with any excuse for not properly investigating and cleaning up this department in Washington.

But, Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of Labor did furnish some information, though possibly unwittingly. When he was asked to attach copy of letter of instructions sent to H. L. Cobb after Cobb was sent to Texas on a propaganda trip for the Employment Service, and expense of trip itemized in detail, the Secretary answered as follows:

H. L. Cobb was not sent to Texas on a propaganda trip. He was sent on official business of the Employment Service. No instructions were sent by John B. Densmore to H. L. Cobb after Cobb was sent to Texas. The itemized expense account of Mr. Cobb is herewith attached.

Now, is the Secretary of Labor absolutely accurate when he says that no instructions were sent to Cobb, and that Cobb did not go to Texas on a propaganda trip? Let us see.

First as to the instructions. Read the notation in the $334.35 account of H. L. Cobb for trip to Texas under date of June 5, 1919, wherein it is stated:

NOTE.—LE46115 (meaning transportation) canceled account instructions to change itinerary after ticket bought.

Whence came such instructions? Did not Cobb, as claimed in this account, leave Washington for Texas via Detroit? Rather a direct route to Detroit from Washington to Texas, was it not? I imagine that it would not have been compatible with the public interest for the Secretary of Labor to have sent us this account if he had not had very good reason to believe that I already had a fac simile copy of it, and that I would produce it, as I did copies of the four Pullman coupons which disappeared from the vouchers of Miss Densmore until it was known that copies were in existence, and then John B. Densmore produced the originals, and as I produced before the Joint Committee on Labor in June, 1919, the travel account of $742.48 paid to Miss Jeanette Densmore, sister of said John B. Densmore.

Cobb says in his account that it was upon instructions that he canceled his transportation and changed his itinerary. It is also interesting to note that when he changed his itinerary he jumped across the State to my home city of Abilene, Tex., where he stayed two days, notwithstanding the office there was then run by the chamber of commerce at no expense to the Government.

Now, as to the propaganda. Let me call your attention to a few excerpts from newspapers in Texas, which I put in the hearings before the Joint Labor Committee last June, pages 183 to 187 of part 1, relative to Cobb's propaganda, to wit:

Continuation of the United States Employment Service, organized during the war as a war emergency and maintained during the so-called reconstruction period following the armistice by voluntary subscription, is to be made a permanent institution in the Department of Labor, despite the efforts of Congressman THOMAS L. BLANTON, of Texas.

This is the statement of Harvey L. Cobb, Washington representative of the service, in Waco yesterday.

Also again note the following:

OLD OPPOSITION LOSING HOLD.

"Opposition to the Federal Employment System, which has been bitter on the part of the fee agencies and Congressman THOMAS L. BLANTON, because of his antipathy toward the Department of Labor, is not being found by the country at large," declared Mr. Cobb.

"This is demonstrated by the fact that throughout the United States more than 500 offices have been maintained the past two months by voluntary subscription. Also by the vote on the floor of the United States House of Representatives, last week, when the deficiency bill, providing $300,000 for the continuation of the service during the month of June, was voted on and received the support of the entire House with the exception of two votes."

And it is interesting to note that after jumping clear across the State to San Antonio, in the extreme southwest, this employment agent then jumped several hundred miles from San Antonio to Galveston, the great seaside resort of Texas, where he remained getting inspiration from the sea waves from June 5 until June 8, 1919. Most of his itinerary was long jumps across Texas. Why did he stay two days in my home city of Abilene? Does not his newspaper article while in Texas show that he had me specially in mind?

But, Mr. Speaker, now we come to the most interesting chapter of all. On the same day that the Secretary of Labor sent this last report to the Speaker of the House, at the same time there came from the office of the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN], who is generally understood to be organized labor's spokesman here, to the press gallery, for distribution to all newspapers, mimeographed copies of the documents heretofore mentioned as having been sent to the Speaker and others on August 21, 1919, signed C. H. Mathews. And these copies show to be upon the same paper and mimeographed upon the same Government machine in the Department of Labor as the former statement for release to the press, which was handed out by the Department of Labor July 23, 1919, with the Mooney report, thus disclosing that all of same emanated from the Department of Labor. But we have more proof than this. None of the newspapers would carry this Mathews article, because it was viciously libelous and also because they could not locate Mathews. And this specially prepared article, designed to injure me, was not published in the press as intended. Then, in its behalf, to the press gallery first came A. D. Chiquoine, urging its publication. Then likewise came H. L. Cobb, urging its publication without avail. And then came together Mr. Luther C. Steward, president of the Employees' Union, and Mr. George Parsons to see what they could do about it. Now, who are these gentlemen? To fully identify Mr. Steward we will again have to insert the statement of our good United States auditor in the Shipping Board, to wit:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 9, 1919.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
United States Representative, City.

DEAR SIR: Answering, as requested, in detail your specific inquiries, will state:

My name is Charles H. Burroughs; live at 221 B Street NE.; am now one of the auditors in the United States Shipping Board, employed in room 1046, Munsey Building, Washington, D. C.

First, I would like to state that in answering your inquiries I am not volunteering information; that I am dependent upon my position for a livelihood, and hope that you will not cause me to lose my position with the Government.

You are correct in stating that formerly I was Chief of Transportation and Revolving Fund Section of the United States Employment Service. I voluntarily left such position.

Relative to your inquiry concerning record of travel vouchers of Special Representative Luther C. Steward for the months of July, August, September, October, November, and December, 1918, wherein Mr. Steward claimed and there was allowed to him for travel expense: For July, $134.45; for August, $127.25; for September, $87.50; for October, $113.25; for November, $120.50; and for December, 1918, $127.50, per vouchers numbered, respectively, 197, 2450, 6248, 9656, 14331, and 18495. I am familiar with such departmental matters. Numerous parties connected with the service were furnished with transportation books containing printed requests and stubs in same, and such parties would present such requests, filled out by them, to the railroads and get transportation, and their books with the stubs, were supposed to be returned to the department. The claim of Mr. Steward was in addition to such transportation furnished by the railroads. Thousands of dollars were absolutely wasted in this way. I doubt whether one-third of these books were ever returned and filed with the department. It can not be shown that it was necessary for Mr. Steward to make these trips. He was receiving in the neighborhood of $3,500 or more from the Government and at the same time drew about $2,750 from the Employees' Union, and for a time, at least, his wife worked in the Munition Building at about $1,100. If this service is properly audited, it will be found that thousands of vouchers were issued in irregular and unnecessary transportation, and it will also be found that there were numerous details made from stations merely to enable parties to draw their $4 per diem in addition to their salaries and travel transportation. It was wholly unecessary for Mr. Hibbard and Mr. Harry H. Stone to take that expensive trip to France. Mr. Harry S. Parks took many unnecessary trips at great expense. Relative to the transportation voucher and three Pullman tickets issued to Miss Jeanette Densmore, sister of the director general, from New York to Atlantic City on July 4, 1918, and the return by Miss Densmore from Atlantic City to New York on July 7, 1918, will state that is only one of hundreds of such trips such agents took on the expense of the Government. In my opinion, the business management of the whole department was rotten. Answering your inquiry, will state that, in my judgment, had Congress allowed the proposed $10,000,000 appropriation requested in February that at least two-thirds of same would have been wasted. It would be a waste of public money for Congress to allow this United States Employment Service any more appropriations until the whole service has been properly audited and investigated and reorganized on proper business lines. It has been continually stated that much has been done and is being done for the returning soldier. Reports of this work are padded and is mostly propaganda, as I do not believe that returning soldiers have received any benefit from the great bulk of the enormous expenditures wasted by this service. I was absolutely disgusted with the system and practice.

Answering your inquiry, I believe that you can depend upon Mr. J. Stuart Brand, of 1477 Newton Street NW., and Mr. J. E. Leemon, now employed by the Federal income tax, to tell what they know about this service.

If the department is properly investigated, Congress will be astounded at the revelation awaiting accounting.

Very sincerely, yours,

CHARLES H. BURROUGHS.

P. S.—If you can get him to do so, Mr. Lynn could give you some very valuable information.

This excerpt from the RECORD will further identify him.

Now, bear in mind that Mr. Luther C. Steward's official station was Washington, D. C., and, as stated by Auditor Burroughs, had no occasion to travel; yet, in addition to his salary of $3,500 drawn from the Government, he drew the above average travel allowance of $118.60 each month additional. Possibly the following newspaper item will give us some light on the matter:

[News item from Washington Times, June 28, 1919.]

"UNITED STATES EMPLOYEES' HEAD RETURNS FROM MEETING.

"Luther C. Steward, president of the National Federation of Federal Employees, returned to-day from New Orleans, where he attended the annual meeting and festival of Local No. 22 of the federation. Mr. Steward was the guest of honor at a banquet tendered him, and he was presented with a handsome gavel."

And this Mr. George Parsons, Mr. Speaker, is the same George Parsons whom John B. Densmore had to assist him in San Francisco when he burglariously installed a dictagraph in the district attorney's office there trying to help Mooney escape justice.

Now these two, Luther C. Steward and George Parsons called together in the press gallery the representatives of the Universal Press and the United Press, and one other, and wanted to know why this Mathews article was not published. And through questions these reputable press representatives drew from Luther C. Steward the fact that no such person as W. J. Mathews existed, but that he was a myth, and that the letters signed Safety First and W. J. Mathews were written and so signed by said George Parsons, whereupon they were told that such a transaction would not be published.

Have I yet to convince my colleagues that this whole Department of Labor needs cleaning up? Is it not a ridiculous situation when a Director General of the United States Employment Service will feloniously install a dictagraph machine in the district attorney's office for the purpose, not of ferreting out and punishing crime, but for the express purpose of assisting a convicted anarchist to escape? Is it not strange and ridiculous when this same official of the Department of Labor will stoop to a conspiracy to send anonymous letters through the United States mail to Congressmen and Senators of the United States seeking to affect a disreputable frame up upon a Member of Congress in the hopes of hindering him in his efforts to clean up the wrongs existing in the Department of Labor?

Since May 31, 1919, there has been pending before a committee of this House, resolution 91, introduced by me, the substance of which is as follows:

Resolved, That an expert auditor be, and he is hereby, employed and directed forthwith to audit all funds expended by the United States Employment Bureau, and within six months to report all irregularities, if any, found in such expenditures; that said auditor be, and he is hereby, authorized to examine all books, papers, and records of said service; administer oaths and examine witnesses; and is to be furnished by the Department of Labor with a suitable office, furniture, and typewriters.

What excuse has this House to offer to the people for not having this audit made? Numerous witnesses, employees of this Government, have testified that much public money has been wasted and misapplied here. Is all of it to be ignored? If so, why? We surely are not afraid of Mr. Samuel Gompers and the American Federation of Labor, which has threatened to put us out of Congress if we opposed.

But I must go to the other branch of my discussion.

Mr. Speaker, we have been so continually besieged with union-labor demands, and have had our mails so flooded daily with union-labor propaganda, while we have heard practically nothing from the masses, until I am afraid that we have forgotten the existence of about 100,000,000 unorganized peoples of the United States. Therefore for months I have been pleading their cause before Congress, and I realize that in doing so I have made enemies.

There is but one way that a Member of Congress may become popular and well liked by all of his colleagues, and that is for him to remain silent, vote for every measure any one of them is personally interested in, never vote against any measure championed by any one of them, be passive at all times, and oppose nothing. If a fellow will just draw his salary and do nothing else his personal popularity will be assured. But he will not be worth a damn to his constituents.

Unfortunately, upon every measure presented in Congress there are at least two interests vitally affected. One is the common interest of all the people. The other is the interest of some particular person, class, or combination. The representatives of the latter are always highly partisan and resent opposition. He who seeks to protect the interests of the people immediately becomes the target for their vicious darts.

On last Friday the following occurred:

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, is it the purpose of the gentleman to take up the Private Calendar to-day, this being Private Calendar day?

Mr. MONDELL. It is. I intend to ask unanimous consent to take up bills on the Private Calendar that are not objected to.

THE PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar not objected to, and bills objected to to retain their place on the calendar for future consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, and pending that asks unanimous consent that bills unobjected to be considered and that bills objected to remain and retain their place on the calendar.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I understood the gentleman to ask unanimous consent instead of moving.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated unanimous consent—that he asked unanimous consent for the latter part. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman did not ask unanimous consent, he moved.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman has no right to move, and so the Chair stated that as a matter of unanimous consent.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, that being true, as the Chair holds, that he has no right to move, but simply determines the matter by unanimous consent, then a motion would not be in order as a substitute.

I intended to move a substitute that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for consideration of bills on the Private Calendar without restriction. But if it is not by unanimous consent that would not be in order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House for consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, with Mr. LONGWORTH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House for consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

The above clearly shows, Mr. Speaker, that no motion whatever was put to the House, but that by unanimous consent the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar not objected to, meaning, of course, that any bill objected to would not be considered.

Whereupon, Mr. Speaker, without objection from anyone, the following bills were considered and agreed upon, to wit: H. R. 683, for the relief of William E. Johnson; H. R. 400, Sioux Tribe of Indians; H. R. 396, damages by Rosebud Indian Reservation; H. R. 685, relief of Frank S. Ingalls; H. R. 974, relief of W. T. Dingler.

And then the bill H. R. 6413, to pay $549.12 to Clara Kane, was called, based upon an accident to a civil employee, William A. Yenser, in Philadelphia a long time before our recent war occurred. I insert from the RECORD the following excerpts:

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, this is a bill to which I gave very careful consideration in the last term of Congress and filed a minority report, in which I set forth that it should be reduced to $480, because under the evidence submitted the amount of compensation could not under any circumstances amount to more than $480. Would the gentleman——

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from Texas, I would like to state that the committee gave Mrs. Clara Kane, the aunt, a full year's pay, as was customary. But if the gentleman wishes to raise that objection, I am perfectly willing to reduce the amount to $480.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman states he will reduce it to $480, I will not object.

[Report No. 632, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session.]

"CLARA KANE.

"Mr. BLANTON, from the Committee on Claims, submitted the following minority report:

"This is a case where my colleagues on the committee, through the favorable majority report, seek to pay to claimant $69.12 more than she asks. Under the law she is entitled to nothing, and has no legal claim against the Government. Whether she is paid anything depends entirely upon the Government's bounty. She asks for only $480. The bill (H. R. 6406) was introduced in the Sixty-fourth Congress to pay her $480. In her letter dated February 28, 1916, addressed to Congressman WILLIAM S. VARE, she, Clara Kane, states:

"'William Yenser, the deceased, contributed an average of a little over $10 per week, but I returned to him sufficient to buy his clothes from the amount he contributed, leaving a net balance of $480 for the past year. As you will see, this shows that he spent about $50 or $60 for clothes, and I did not feel that I was entitled or should ask for that which he had spent on his clothes, and confined myself to the actual net amount received.

"'Trusting this will be satisfactory, I am,

"'Very truly, yours,

"'Mrs. CLARA KANE.'

"William Yenser received only $1.76 per day. If he spent $50 or $60 per year on clothes he could not have contributed even $480 net per year to Mrs. Kane, for he had to have food, and a year's food must have cost him or Mrs. Kane something.

"But in the face of the above evidence the committee, with that liberality for which it is noted, recommends that Congress pay more than the claimant desires, and that she be given $549.12 instead of the $480. Mrs. Kane was related to William Yenser neither by affinity nor consanguinity. I respectfully submit that this allowance should be reduced to $480, the full amount asked for.

"THOMAS L. BLANTON."

Under the law this claimant is entitled to nothing. To be legally entitled to anything she would have to be the mother of the said William Yenser, and even if she were his mother she would then be entitled only to such part of his salary for one year as he usually contributed to her support.

His yearly earnings amounted to only $549.12, out of which it is admitted that he supported himself and only contributed part to Mrs. Kane.

The following is Mrs. Kane's statement of her claim, wherein she shows that under no circumstances would she be entitled to more than $480, and she only asks for that sum of $480; yet this committee and my colleague from Texas [Mr. BEE] are so liberal with the public money of the people that they seek to give her $69.12 more than she wants. It is not so much the insignificant amount involved, but the precedent we will set by such action, and unless the chairman will assure me that he will reduce this amount down to $480 in the passage of this bill I shall be compelled to object to its consideration under this unanimous-consent rule.

MRS. KANE'S STATEMENT OF CLAIM.

Hon. WILLIAM S. VARE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Replying to your letter of February 16, in reference to the Clara Kane matter, beg to say that the amount of $480 claimed as compensation is made up as follows:

William Yenser, the deceased, contributed an average of a little over $10 per week, but Mrs. Kane returned him sufficient to buy his clothes from the amount he contributed, leaving a net balance of $480 for the past year.

As you will see, this shows that he spent about $50 or $60 for clothes, and she did not feel that she was entitled or should ask for that which he had spent on his clothes and confined herself to the actual net amount received.

Trusting this will be satisfactory, I am,
Very truly, yours,
Mrs. CLARA KANE.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. I object, unless the chairman of the committee will assure me that he will reduce the amount to $480.

Mr. EDMONDS. It has been customary in the case of the death of an employee to give one year's pay. The year's pay of this man was $549.20. The aunt of the man, the only person to whom this money could be paid, agreed that he spent a certain amount of money during the year for clothes, and that deducting that amount from the $549.20 would leave $480, which she claimed ought to be paid to her. Now, if the gentleman is going to object, then, rather than postpone the claim any longer, it having been here for a number of years, I will move to make the amount $480.

And, Mr. Speaker, in the face of the agreement made by the chairman to reduce the claim to $480, the amount the claimant wanted and requested, without which agreement I would have objected to its consideration and thus prevented it from being taken up, the comparatively few members present in the committee, many of whom were interested in private claims to be considered, disregarded such agreement and put the amount of $549.12 in the bill when the claimant asked for only $480.

Whereupon, concerning other private bills, I made the following announcement:

Mr. BLANTON. I will state to my friend from Oklahoma that I could have prevented the last bill from coming up, but I had a distinct agreement with the chairman of the committee that in passing the last bill he would assure me that he would reduce the amount to $480, which the claimant wanted and asked for. No one has given this bill closer investigation than the chairman and myself, and in overriding our agreement, I feel that the House did not keep faith with me and therefore on other bills coming up I do not think that they should come up when we can not depend upon an agreement made between the chairman and a Member, especially when by objecting that Member could prevent the bill from coming up. I shall therefore object to other bills being considered now, as several are wholly unmeritorious.

And, Mr. Speaker, realizing that otherwise many unmeritorious private claims involving thousands of dollars of the people's money would be rushed through without argument or consideration, I objected to the present consideration of each and every one of the remaining 46 private bills on the calendar.

Then in the face of the fact that we were still in the committee under the unanimous-consent agreement to consider only such bills as were not objected to, the presiding chairman of the committee [Mr. LONGWORTH] ruled that we could nevertheless take up said private bills, even though objected to, and consider same without going to the House for authority. While his ruling was clearly erroneous I was forced to abide by it, and the committee then considered and voted to favorably report back to the House several bills theretofore objected to. And notwithstanding the fact that some newspapers, including the Houston Post, Dallas News, and Fort Worth Star Telegram, usually very accurate and reliable, erroneously reported that all of said 46 bills were then passed by the House, as a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, none of them passed, for as soon as the committee rose and the House resumed business I made the point of no quorum, and there not being a quorum present the House adjourned without acting on any of the said bills.

But while in the committee, Mr. Speaker, I felt that the presiding chairman [Mr. LONGWORTH] wrongfully permitted the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] to criticize me concerning my efforts put forth in the House during the past months of this session, my efforts being an endeavor to properly save the people's money from being wasted out of the Treasury, and insisting on the Members leaving their private affairs long enough to furnish a quorum to transact business in the House after it meets every day at noon. I also felt that such chairman had no right to resort to side-bar criticism of me himself.

Since both the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] disapproved of my work here and questioned my statesmanship, I will be excused in offering the following as rebuttal evidence from the people of the country whom we serve here:

The following indorsements of my work here came voluntarily and spontaneously from citizens of the United States outside my district:

WEST SIXTY-EIGHTH STREET,
Chicago, Ill., August 9, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: Would to God that you were representing this district so that I could vote for you. The Labor Trust is the whole cause of the present unrest and high cost of living.

Truly, yours,

J. P. EASTMAN.

NEW YORK, August 9, 1919.

REPRESENTATIVE BLANTON: Glad we have at least one man in Washington with backbone. You used the right word when you said "truckling." The great majority have been bluffed by labor. Now, what is it to be, the Government or the labor unions? I congratulate you on your stand.

Yours, truly,
165 Wall Street.

G. F. BRADLEY.

SANTA MONICA, CALIF., August 15, 1919.

DEAR MR. BLANTON: I am a stranger to you, but nevertheless I write to congratulate you on your fearless and manly stand in Congress on various issues of the day. If we had more public men like you enemies of good government would soon vanish, and Bolshevism would be a thing of the past. I am a Democrat who, with you, believes in a clean Government.

Yours, truly,

H. H. HUGHES.

HOTEL ARAGON,
Atlanta, Ga., August 8, 1919.

REPRESENTATIVE BLANTON: The sane element of our country thank God that there is at least one man in Congress with spunk enough to fight Bolshevism. At a discussion here to-night it was moved and adopted that we request you to urge that Stone, Morrison, and Plumb be deported to Russia forthwith. God bless you.

A. B. WINTERS
(And 10 others).

PITTSBURGH, PA., August 10, 1919.

REPRESENTATIVE BLANTON, of Texas: You hit back and covered Congressman WILLIAM J. BURKE'S case all right. Good. I believe that you can floor him every time. Like the Bolsheviks of Russia, these railroad unions want to get the benefit of the work and savings of others, the result of long years of toil and thrift, through the so-called nationalization of railroads. Slick piece of robbery, this!

Very truly,

J. M. SMITH.

BERWICK, LA., August 8, 1919.

MY DEAR MR. BLANTON: We have noticed with considerable pride your record in Congress, as we have been watching your efforts, and feel that you are taking the right course. It is high time that some one should have the courage to do the right thing. Our country needs more statesmen, not politicians. You have demonstrated to our entire satisfaction that you are in the former class, and we wish you God-speed.

Yours,

W. J. LOWRANCE.

DAYTON, OHIO, August 4, 1919.

DEAR MR. BLANTON: May I assure you that your efforts in behalf of law and order and the constitutional rights of nonunion workingmen are appreciated in this section.

Assuring you of regard and appreciation,

Very truly, yours,

A. C. MARSHALL.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., August 5, 1919.

REPRESENTATIVE BLANTON: You may be glad to know that Indiana people are watching your efforts, and your course is causing much favorable comment among all classes of citizens.

Sincerely,

W. R. DUNKLE.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I heartily thank you for your courage in introducing the joint resolution referring to conditions of anarchy in the United States. We have permitted affairs to drift from one thing to another until we have reached a point where the activities of the country are threatened, and the very life of our system of government is at stake. The Congress should take the lead, and with no uncertain sound, make it plain and clear that all those who attempt to nullify the laws of the land, or to interfere with the orderly process of government and the right of each and everyone to labor as they please, will be classed where they belong—as traitors to the United States. There is no half-way ground, and an immediate end should be put to the condition wherein everything that is vital to the people of this country is partially controlled by various aggregations of organized conspirators.

A wave of resentment against all these things is sweeping over the country. The people are only waiting for an opportunity to make this point clear. It is the worst kind of politics to cater to these elements of disorder and lawlessness. Sentiment all over the country is overwhelmingly in the other direction. I remain,

Yours, very truly,

C. H. CANBY.

ADA, OKLA., August 6, 1919.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have been watching with a great deal of interest your fight upon some of the high-handed methods of organized labor. It looks as though this fight is going to go to every nook and corner of the earth.

Yours, very truly,

ROBT. W. WIMBISH.

Yours, truly,

BIRMINGHAM, ALA., August 6, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: We have for some time noted a general and ever-increasing favorable comment among the thinking people of this district upon your courageous and independent struggle in Congress against the tyrannical and insolent attitude of organized labor in attempting to dictate all essential legislation for the general public of this country.

It is indeed refreshing to find even one Representative in the Halls of Congress who has the courage of his convictions and is not afraid to make them known.

It is a well-known fact that the useless, inefficient, and expensive United States Employment Bureau was administered solely in the interest of the American Federation of Labor.

We wish to congratulate you upon your fearless fight on all these vexing problems.

Yours, very truly,

B. A. MONAGHAN.

SHERIDAN, August 13, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I heartily indorse your work in Congress. Your resolution is none too strong and only states a fact. At the first alarm of war organized labor seized the country by the throat and have never yet let loose. Their protestations of loyalty and patriotism are nauseating. BLANTON for President.

Respectfully,

LEW CHAMBERLAIN.

715 SOUTH DEARBORN STREET,
Chicago, Ill., August 21, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: You are doing a fine and much-needed work. In these times when self-seeking politicians, demagogues, and grafters are attempting to dismantle civilization it is refreshing and makes a true American proud to find one like you, with courage and ability, to present to the country a picture of true and false Americanism. I thank you for giving me the opportunity to say so.

Yours, truly, W. H. FRENCH.

CHAMPAIGN, ILL., August 15, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I am a Republican, but congratulate you on your straight-from-the-shoulder comments on the present situation. I have many acquaintances in your State; one Joseph Hirsch, of Corpus Christi.

Sincerely, yours, D. F. HARRIS.

ADA, OKLA., August 2, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I want to thank you for your masterful exposure of the United States Labor Bureau published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD July 28. I have just finished reading the astonishing mass of evidence piled up against Densmore. Fight that Nolan bill to a finish and tell my Congressman, TOM D. MCKEOWN, to help you.

With very best wishes for your success in this fight, I am,

Very truly, yours, THOMAS P. HOLT.

RICHMOND, VA., August 22, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: Will you accept the writer's congratulations on your speech on the "Blanton plan." I feel that you have covered every phase of the subject, and it is the most logical condemnation of the Plumb plan yet offered.

I really believe the criticism offered by you against the Plumb plan voices the sentiment of every true and patriotic American citizen.

Yours, very truly, T. C. CROUCH.

LOUISVILLE, KY., August 7, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: You seem to be the only man in Congress that is not afraid of the labor unions. I most heartily indorse your course. Our Nation has pampered and encouraged this dragon until the monstrous thing has grown to such proportions that it wants to devour the wealth of the Nation. The Labor Trust is the most criminal of all. May you long continue your good work.

Yours, truly, E. H. MORRISON,

BIRMINGHAM, ALA., August 7, 1919.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: I feel that I would not have done my duty had I failed to write you a letter of commendation for your work in Congress.

Your position is being discussed by the public, and I have not heard a single person who has not praised you. As a matter of fact, the public is sick and tired of being bulldozed and is in no mood to put up with it longer.

I earnestly hope that you will carry on the work you have started, and I think that I am pertectly safe in saying that the Nation as a whole is back of you.

Yours, very truly, R. I. INGALLS.

WM. C. HALBERT,
JUDGE TWENTIETH JUDICIAL DISTRICT,
BOYD, GREENUP, AND LEWIS COUNTIES,
Vanceburg, Ky., August 6, 1919.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As a fellow American citizen, I write to congratulate you over your efforts to protect the rights of an American State and its courts to enforce its own laws against anyone who violates them within the State, although the violator may be a member of the I. W. W., a socialist, or even worse, a Mooney, and therefore immune from prosecution in the State courts. The acts and conduct of Mr. Densmore in this Mooney case is one of the darkest blots on the national administration at Washington, and unless his department is investigated thoroughly and he is divorced from any connection with the Government the administration itself will not be held blameless for his most reprehensible conduct.

There are altogether too many socialists in office under this administration to suit a conservative Democrat anyhow, and the party stands to lose far more than it will gain by an alliance with such people and their acts when given a place under the administration for which the party must, of course, be held responsible.

You are entitled to and I believe will receive the commendation of good men of all parties for your efforts to unravel the acts of Densmore in the Mooney case and to bring to bear to same the pitiless publicity every decent man and woman wishes brought to any official act of an agent of the National or State Government that tends to interfere with or corrupt the pathway of justice to all men and all women regardless of race or creed or party.

Thanking you for your interest in this matter and your effort to sustain the rights of the State courts, and wishing you every success, I remain,

Fraternally, yours, WM. C. HALBERT.

HOTEL MARLEY,
87 Third Street, San Francisco, Calif., August 3, 1919.

REPRESENTATIVE BLANTON: I have noted your record with pleasure. Increased wages forced by strikes is only another form of holdup.

Is this country safe for democracy, or are we to be governed by terrorism of I. W. W.'s, anarchists, and labor unions? To take by force and fear what you can not take by law is kaiserism pure and simple.

I am glad to see you stand for Americanism. I hope to see a law passed making strikes a felony and thus prevent interference with interstate traffic and commerce. Congratulating you on your efforts, I am,

Yours, truly, W. LINDSAY.

H. G. S. ANDERSON,

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Permit me, an ordinary citizen, to congratulate you upon your stand, publicly taken, in regard to the railroad unions' attempt to forcibly grab more loot from the country.

Many other citizens think as I do, but few presume to express their thoughts.

If you are ever in need of "two-fisted" backing, you may depend on me for one, and there are many others that will be available.

Hoping that you will still continue to call these footpads by their proper names, I am,

Very truly, yours, H. G. S. ANDERSON.

PLEASANT VIEW FARM,
Oscar P. O., La., Point Coupee Parish, August 6, 1919.

Congressman BLANTON, of Texas:

Please accept my personal thanks for your record in Congress. I wish that you represented my district, as it would be a pleasure to vote for a man who has grasped the situation so clearly and who has the courage of his convictions.

I am, yours, very truly, THOMAS H. HEWES.

NEW YORK, August 12, 1919.

REPRESENTATIVE BLANTON: While I am a Republican, yet I wish to commend your work. There must be no more truckling. We need more men like you, with backbones, and fewer of the kind who jump at the crack of the autocratic unions' whip. Many a favorable comment has been made on the Americanism you have shown. Keep the good work up.

Respectfully, GEO. C. BLANKNER, 60 Wall Street.

FELIX ROTHSCHILD & CO.,
329 South Franklin Street,
Chicago, Ill., August 11, 1919.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I can not refrain from complimenting you on your efforts in Congress.

I have traveled to the Pacific coast from Chicago twice each year for the past 30 years and have come in contact with a great many railroad employes. There is not another element of workers in the United States as well paid.

In your speeches you have hit the nail on the head, and if other Congressmen would take a like stand things would be much better.

I told Mr. Werner, of Fort Worth, Tex., who is visiting us, that men who live in your district should be only too willing to go 250 miles out of their way during a rainstorm to vote for you on election day. Hurrah for Texas!

Yours, very truly, FELIX ROTHSCHILD.

262 MONCADA WAY, INGLESIDE TERRACES,
San Francisco, Calif., August 5, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I have noticed your course in Congress for several months, and I write to express my appreciation of it. I am glad to see some one in public life who is not afraid. I wish you success, and more power to you.

Yours, very truly, THOMAS NELSON.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA., August 7, 1919.

REPRESENTATIVE BLANTON: The business men of this district have noticed with a great deal of interest the good work you are doing in Congress, and we wish to express our appreciation, as we believe your work will be beneficial to the whole country.

If we only had the whole House of Representatives filled with men, such as yourself, who have the courage of their convictions, our country would not be intimidated at all times by threats from groups. Assuring you of our hearty cooperation and support,

Yours, very truly, GEORGE M. MORROW, Jr.

MARENGO, IND., August 12, 1919.

DEAR MR. BLANTON: I have been reading the record of your work, and I am with you at heart.

Very truly, yours, MARTIN GILLIATT.

HOTEL SAVOY,
Kansas City, Mo., August 8, 1919.

DEAR MR. BLANTON: Congratulations to you on your work. I am thankful that the country has at least one Representative with a backbone.

I am a traveling man, covering 10 States, and most of our half million traveling men work and ride trains 18 instead of 8 hours, and the average one can't afford to live in as good style as the average railroad conductor. The great body of patriotic American citizens are at your back.

Yours, B. BECKHAM.

MORRILLTON, ARK., August 9, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: We appreciate your efforts and want to tell you that all of the live people way back here in the sticks know the situation, realize that it has to come to a show-down, and don't want to drift along trying to plan for the future with this damn menace hanging over us, gathering volume as time goes by. Men who you would think were ignorant of the situation are eager to shoulder a musket and march under the Stars and Stripes to rid our country of this red monster. If Congress doesn't support you, they will be doing worse than fiddling while Rome burned.

Yours, truly, J. S. MOORE.

SALEM, OREG., September 5, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I believe that I am voicing the sentiments of virtually all of the people outside of the unions when I say that I am thankful that we have one lawmaker in Washington who has the courage to express his convictions regardless of consequences. These questions involve every channel of trade and commerce in our Nation. President Wilson is the greatest man in the world, but he did make a mistake when he truckled to unions, as with them it is rule or ruin, and the sooner the issue is tested the better it will be for our people and Nation. The brotherhoods are becoming more arrogant all the while, and in time America will become Russianized unless some prompt action is taken.

I wish that our Congress was composed of more men like yourself, that dare to express their views, instead of truckling and trying to prevent those that have the courage of their convictions to express themselves. Your efforts are awakening the people from their lethargy and will have an effect. I am a lifelong Democrat. With best wishes, I am,

Yours, truly,

L. H. SUTER.

ROANOKE, VA., September 8, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I have read your addresses from start to finish, and it certainly indicates a situation not at all creditable to this country. It shows the need of some drastic action on the part of the Government with regard to labor matters, as well as some investigations and actions being taken with regard to other matters. I would like to have a half dozen copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for July 28.

Yours, very truly,

EDWARD L. STONE.

253 CORNWALL STREET,
San Francisco, Calif., September 5, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: Inasmuch as we are strangers, I must introduce myself. I was in the Fifty-fourth Congress. I refer you to Congressman CURRY. My son is Senator JOHNSON of California. I have read in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD your speeches regarding the tyranny of labor unions and the wickedness of Densmore, and indorse all of them. You sized up the Mooney case, and Fremont Older, its editorial scavenger, in proper style. I inclose you documents from which you will see the estimation in which Older was and is held in San Francisco.

Very truly, yours,

GROVE L. JOHNSON.

NORTHFIELD, MASS., August 11, 1919.

DEAR MR. BLANTON: I am a Republican and you a Democrat, yet I desire to congratulate you on your efforts in Congress.

I am acquainted with the conditions of railroad employees in New England, and I know that they eat sirloin steak, buy expensive clothes, own automobiles, and in general live like prosperous nabobs. The rest of us go without necessities. Burdens must be made more equal.

We need fighters in Congress—men who are not afraid of being defeated for reelection. We need more men who will stand in the open and denounce wrong and injustice. Strike hard and never let up. Drop party label in this common fight.

Yours, for victory,

C. S. WARNER.

PYLE INVESTMENT CO.,
401 Kennedy Building, Tulsa, Okla., August 9, 1919.

REPRESENTATIVE BLANTON: I want to congratulate you. The citizenship of this Nation are in accord with you, and I have heard numbers of the best men in this community express satisfaction on your course.

The time has come when this Government must assert itself instead of permitting soviet organizations to dictate to it.

Yours, very truly,

W. E. BLANTON.

NEBRASKA-IOWA WHOLESALE FRUIT
DEALERS' ASSOCIATION,
W. H. YOUNG, MANAGER,
Fremont, Nebr., August 9, 1919.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: May I be permitted to express my hearty approval of your efforts. I wish we had more men in Congress who would have sufficient courage to express their convictions in matters affecting labor, especially when it concerns a labor autocracy, which is not satisfied with fair wages but demands that Congress rob 95 per cent of the people in order that their particular pockets may be fattened.

Very sincerely, yours,

W. H. YOUNG.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES RECLAMATION SERVICE,
428 Federal Building, Denver, Colo., August 9, 1919.

REPRESENTATIVE BLANTON: I think Congress was primarily to blame for passing the infamous Adamson law, which you justly characterized as "truckling" to the railroad unions. I thought it a duty to write you this note and let you know that the people are not willing to do any more truckling to this dangerous anti-American power that has of late years risen amongst us and which represents not the real American laborer but the soviet class of Europe.

Yours, truly,

EDWIN H. PEERY.

HAWK ISLAND, LAKE PLACID,
New York, August 9, 1919.

REPRESENTATIVE BLANTON: Have been reading your speeches on unions. I am president of the Luce Furniture Co., Grand Rapids, Mich., and the P. C. Fuller Co. Have been in business 38 years, employed large numbers of men, and have never had a strike. Any concerns I am connected with nail up the doors before they will recognize the "closed shop." It is impossible to work now with the unions. The unions are for themselves only. Any man that lives for himself, and himself only, is a failure. We have just found out that any nation that lives for itself, and itself only, is sure to fail. Germany is the last that history will record of the many.

As you state, the Adamson law was a "colossal blunder." If I were in Grand Rapids instead of an island, would show that a stenographer is mightier than a poor pen; but this is only to congratulate you on your work. I am willing to stand forth against the politicians that will truckle for the labor vote.

Yours, with respect,

PHILO C. FULLER.

BRINKERHOFF-FARIS TRUST & SAVINGS CO.,
Clinton, Mo., August 27, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I have been reading with very great interest the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, showing your splendid stand for economy and against willful waste, and against the uncalled-for and un-American stand of unions. I hasten to congratulate you on the splendid cards you are playing in the Halls of Congress. May you be continued there, to keep up your fight for the right and for proper administration of our governmental affairs. I am patting you on the back and bidding you a hearty Godspeed.

Sincerely,

H. P. FARIS.

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J., August 20, 1919.

Representative BLANTON,
Dallas, Tex.:

You are doing a splendid work in Congress, and not only Dallas but the whole country ought to be proud of you.

AN APPRECIATIVE AMERICAN.

THE M. C. LILLEY & CO.,
J. W. WOODWORTH, GENERAL MANAGER,
Columbus, Ohio, August 22, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: Please send me 1 dozen copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Sixty-sixth Congress, volume 58, No. 56, for Monday, July 28, 1919, containing speech made by you. Thanking you for same.

Yours, truly,

J. W. WOODWORTH.

S. CHENEY & SON,
Manlius, N. Y., August 28, 1919.

REPRESENTATIVE BLANTON: We have noted with a great deal of pleasure your exposure of the trade-union activities in some of the departments in Washington. It is certainly very refreshing to find a public man who is not afraid to speak out on a matter of this kind. In our opinion, Congress has been very cowardly on these labor matters.

Keep the good work up, for the people know how this labor-union class legislation is a menace to the life of our Republic.

Yours, very truly,

W. W. CHENEY, President.

409 LEVY BUILDING,
Shreveport, La., August 24, 1919.

DEAR MR. BLANTON: I am glad to know that there is one man in Congress who has the courage to speak for the good of the 110,000,000 people of the United States. You have been looking after the interests of all the people, and not merely those who elected you to office, and for this reason I am writing you.

Whether you have the whole people of your district behind you or not, certainly you have many, many Americans behind you in these United States; and perhaps you have many colleagues in Congress who may openly criticize you and yet secretly admire you. So long as you continue to think clearly, speak plainly, and say the thing that ought to be said, the people will be behind you.

Yours, sincerely,

BRADFORD HEARN, Manager.

BOSTON, MASS., August 9, 1919.

DEAR MR. BLANTON: Although a dyed-in-the-wool Republican, and hence probably persona non grata to you, I am taking the liberty to write to express my sincere concurrence in your sentiments and opinions on the subject of labor generally and the demands of railroad men in particular. I not only agree with and applaud your opinions on these subjects but admire your fearlessness in expressing them. This required not only courage but patriotism as well. Unfortunately, your efforts are not calculated to increase your popularity, but you may rest assured that the responsible, intelligent, and patriotic people of the country—most of whom, unfortunately, are dumb—agree with your views, and admire your temerity in publishing them.

Very respectfully, yours,

CHARLES F. AYER.

MEMPHIS, TENN., August 4, 1919.

REPRESENTATIVE BLANTON: Please accept the writer's congratulations on your having the backbone to tell organized labor the truth about itself. The idea was fast becoming prevalent in this section that our Government is mostly for members of labor unions.

Yours, truly,

T. B. CABELL.

HUNTINGTON, W. VA., August 3, 1919.

REPRESENTATIVE BLANTON: You are on the right track exactly. I thank, commend, and compliment you in your work. If there were fewer politicians and more statesmen of your type, who had the courage of their convictions, a very different status of affairs might obtain in this country, and the future look more stable and promising.

It is my sincere wish that through your efforts that many of your colleagues may assume a similar attitude.

The situation has now reached an alarming state, and I believe that there are hundreds of thousands of citizens of the country who are heartily in accord with the stand you have taken.

I am only one of many thousands who greatly appreciate the service that you are rendering your country in this crisis, and trust that you will keep up the fight for the good of your countrymen as a whole.

Most sincerely, yours,

FRED A. WARE.

MALDEN, MASS., August 3, 1919.

REPRESENTATIVE BLANTON: Permit one who does not yet despair of continuing to be proud of his native land to voice his appreciation of your efforts. Is it possible that Congress may be held up by an organized band? I hope the manhood of our Congressmen will prevent such a disgrace.

Very truly, yours,

A. J. STEVENS, M. D.

CREWE, VA., August 4, 1919.

REPRESENTATIVE BLANTON: I have read of you with interest. I am glad to think that there is yet one man in Congress who has the courage to sound a warning note. Take it from me that no man ever got nearer the truth than you did. There must be a conclusive show-down.

Very sincerely, yours,

W. F. BERGMAN.

CHELMSFORD STOCK FARM,
Poolesville, Md., August 5, 1919.

DEAR MR. BLANTON: I wish to congratulate you on your efforts in the House. It is high time for organized labor to cease dictating to Congress. Here is strength to your arm. If in need of votes at the next election, I will be glad to communicate to my personal friends in Texas my desire for them to help a man who is not afraid.

Yours,

A. D. TRUNDLE.

543 FULLERTON PARKWAY,
Chicago, Ill., August 3, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: Permit me to express admiration for your independence and courage in your work. Your speeches have put into words just what thousands of serious men have been thinking the past three years, while the supernumeraries at Washington have yielded or passed the buck every time any demand was made by labor delegates.

It is an "endless chain," just as you say, and like a falling row of bricks, affects every department of our private and public life.

There is a limit beyond which the demands of an employee become an extortion, a holdup, and no man realizes this so well as an employer who worked for years to create a business, and incidentally has borne the responsibility of finding the cash for the pay roll, often with the knowledge that the money did not come from profits, but was an additional deficit to other losses. Meantime the care-free employee arrives by the clock in the morning and departs gayly when the hour strikes in the evening, while the boss sticks around trying to figure out how to collect certain bills or how to convert slow merchandise into some cash to meet the next pay roll.

Yours, sincerely,

WINFIELD S. BRAINERD.

CANTON, OHIO, August 23, 1919.

REPRESENTATIVE BLANTON: I have read with much interest your speeches in the House of Representatives. I would like it very much if you could send me a few copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for July 28, 1919, volume 58, No. 56, United States Employment Service measure.

I want to compliment you on the fearless stand you have taken. It is certainly a revelation to the laymen to learn how public money is squandered by Congress, and the tentacles of unionism are reaching forth into every branch of the Federal Government. You have truly said, "Whither are we drifting?"

Yours,

F. E. KOHLER.

MILTON, PA., August 20, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: We have read with pleasure and profit your speeches in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Send us half dozen copies to hand to our friends.

Thanking you in advance, we are,

W. H. BECK,
Vice President Samuel J. Shimer & Sons.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA., August 21, 1919.

REPRESENTATIVE BLANTON: Inclosed please find a copy of the resolution of executive committee of Alabama Manufacturers and Operators Association. The documents inclosed will serve to show you that when Congressman BANKHEAD objects to just criticism of Secretary Wilson, the Department of Labor, and the United States Employment Service, he is at variance with the opinion of the vast majority of the employers of labor in his own State, and in this particular, like Secretary Wilson, is representing organized labor only. Would it be asking too much to request that you put us on your mailing list?

Yours, very truly,

HARDIE-TYNES MANUFACTURING CO.

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., August 9, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: Have been watching your work. You are on the right track. Go for these anarchists in our Government and the people of our country will applaud you.

Yours, in sympathy,

B. SUNDAE.

RICHMOND, VA., August 23, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I sympathize most heartily with your efforts and am glad that there is at least one man in the Democratic Party that is not bound hand and foot by the American Federation of Labor, and that he can see some defects in labor unions and has the courage of his convictions. We wish you success in your fight. I am not opposed to union labor, but am very strongly of the opinion that there are a few others in the United States that deserve attention.

Yours, very truly,

ROBT. S. CRUMP, President.

JESSE FRENCH & SONS' PIANO CO.,
Newcastle, Ind., August 22, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: Your speech in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD July 28 is the first plain, unvarnished statement of facts on the Employment Bureau that I have ever seen from Washington.

You have my best wishes in your good work, and may you succeed over the present obstacles, which seem to become more numerous.

Yours, truly,

JESSE FRENCH.

OHMER FARE REGISTER CO.,
Dayton, Ohio, August 22, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: You have struck a popular chord leading to the hearts of at least 90 per cent of the American people.

If all the Members of the House and Senate were as keenly alive to the situation and were not afraid to assert themselves in combating the pernicious activities of union labor organizers the chaotic conditions of unrest throughout the country would soon be reformed. I thank you for your efforts.

Yours, very truly,

JOHN F. OHMER, President.

EMPLOYERS' ASSOCIATION OF PITTSBURGH,
Pittsburgh, Pa., August 25, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: Our experience prompts us to say that the United States Employment Service is both extravagantly and inefficiently administered.

We have no difficulty in securing the help, when the same is available, through our own efforts. This association maintains for its members a free employment bureau. We make no charge to the applicants. At our own expense we advertise for labor, and our position is that this whole matter of the placement of labor should be done by those directly interested and not as a burden upon the Public Treasury.

We feel it is due you from us, the largest employers of labor and representing the greatest manufacturing industries in the Pittsburgh district, to write you this brief letter of commendation on your splendid and fearlessly worded remarks.

Yours, very truly,

THE EMPLOYERS' ASSOCIATION OF PITTSBURGH,
E. B. MORELAND, Secretary.

DENT, MINN., August 16, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I am here on a short vacation. My home is in Missouri. I write to commend your work and efforts respecting the Densmore report. Secretly sending this man to California by a Cabinet official shocks our sense of common decency and propriety and deserves to be rebuked.

J. M. SANDUSKY.

CLEVELAND, OHIO, August 22, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: Thank God, we have one Representative in Congress who has the courage of his convictions. Texas should feel proud of you. But your admirers are not all confined to that State. More power to you. Allow me to express my highest esteem toward you.

J. B. ORRISON,
President, 7418 Franklin Avenue.

RICHMOND, VA., August 21, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I want to congratulate Texas on having a man in Congress who is not afraid of his convictions. I believe that the people at large are solidly in accord with your ideas.

Yours,

W. J. SCHAEFER,
Late Captain, O. M. C., U. S. A.

EVANSTON, ILL., August 5, 1919.

DEAR MR. BLANTON: I am not one of your constituents, and have not always agreed with you politically, but I want to thank you for your attitude concerning labor demands.

The "tail has certainly wagged the dog" long enough, and it is time that all the people were being considered instead of accepting the fiats of the labor oligarchy and falling in with their program of terrorism and force.

I am a great believer in the union, but I have little use for the unions that now fill our land with disunion and discord.

Very respectfully, yours,

W. P. TURNER.

AURORA, MO., August 2, 1919.

DEAR MR. BLANTON: It is a pleasure to know that we have a Representative in Congress who has the courage to back up his convictions in such a fearless and masterful manner. As a small "unit" of this country of ours, I thank you for showing up the Department of Labor.

F. S. STEVENSON, M. D.

SHARONVILLE, OHIO, August 4, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I was just about to write the President when I read your record of the brotherhoods. Never were truer words uttered in the Halls of Congress. Railroad employees are better paid than any other laborers in the United States. Millions of families are living on less than one-third of what the average railroad employee gets. Russian Bolshevism is a mild name for the labor revolutions labor agitators are endeavoring to inaugurate in this country. It will require wiser statesmanship than ever applied since the birth of this Republic.

Along with millions of others, I congratulate you for the bold utterances regarding a subject that it requires a braver man to tackle than ever crossed No Man's Land, in the name of decency and democracy.

Yours, very truly,

T. J. WYSCARVER.

WEST CHESTER, PA., August 5, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I want to commend you on the stand you have taken with the unpatriotic slackers—the railroad agitators. They are not only a menace but a public nuisance. If they strike we will fill their places with men who shot rifles at Hun enemies for $1 per day, while these slick fellows drew $5 to $10 per day.

EDWARD M. MCFADDEN,
203 West Chestnut Street.

2323 GREENWOOD, August 4, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: Just a word of hearty encouragement in the great fight you have been and are now making in behalf of millions of oppressed Americans. The trouble is pure Bolshevism. Our loyal soldiers will stand by Congress.

Yours,

J. L. WOODBRIDGE.

OMAHA, NEBR., August 22, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I have read a good deal of your work in Congress during the past few weeks, and want to congratulate you most sincerely on the independent and courageous stand you have taken in dealing with the various questions that have come up in the House. I was more than pleased when the House sustained your use of the word "truckling." The writer believes that the vote of the House had much to do with shaping the President's letter to the Director General of Railroads, and also in shaping his last address to Congress. Jewell's threats approach treason and sedition. I believe from reading your speeches in the House that you take the same view.

Yours, very truly,

JAMES C. KINSLER.

ST. LOUIS, MO., August 22, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I wish to commend you for your fearless expressions. It seems to me that never before in the life of this Nation did it need more of fearless speaking. It is indeed time for thought. Any time that you can place before the Nation such evidence as you did recently, you have served the public well.

Cordially, yours,

R. H. WEBSTER, President.

COLUMBUS, GA., August 22, 1919.

MY DEAR MR. BLANTON: I have read of your work with great interest and benefit. Strength to your heart and tongue.

Yours, very sincerely,

FRED B. GORDON.

SUMMERDALE, ALA., August 28, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: If they continue autocratic, fight unionism till hell freezes over and then fight it on the ice. We must prepare for the civil war that is at our door.

W. A. GALUSHA.

PITTSBURGH, PA., August 28, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I congratulate you, and only wish there was a majority in Congress that had the interests of the people at heart instead of politics, to support you.

Yours, very truly,

R. J. WILSON,
Secretary Wilson-Snyder Manufacturing Co.

THE BROWN PAPER CO.,
Fort Madison, Iowa, August 23, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: Your speeches are very gratifying to us. We are glad there are at least a few men in Congress who dare to speak the truth, and we hope that you will be able to shame Representatives into fighting Bolshevism.

Yours, respectfully,

A. P. BROWN, President.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, August 12, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I want to congratulate and thank you for the stand you have taken on labor matters, and particularly on the gross and impudent demands made by the four brotherhoods. The principles of our Government are now being rapidly undermined and overthrown by labor unions.

I think we are very fortunate to have one man in Congress who has the courage and patriotism to stand up against this monstrous evil which is seeking to overtake us. I deem it a great pleasure and privilege to write to you approving your course. I have observed your actions not only on this occasion but on others, in which you intervened for the interest of the United States and our people, and I wish to thank you.

Very sincerely, yours,

L. C. BLACK.

LUNING, NEV., August 10, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: Do you realize by your statements that the great labor vote is likely to be antagonized? You seem to place the public interests above party. I only wish for the country's sake there were more Democrats at Washington who had some of your independence.

Yours, respectfully,

E. C. WATSON.

BOSTON, MASS., August 13, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: Thank God for a real man! We are everlastingly grateful to you for your courageous speeches opposing the insolent demands of union labor. Unfortunately, we must look to the West and the South for virile statesmanship and vision, for New England's Representatives appear to be able to look only to the past and are unable to look at things as they are.

Very truly, yours,

CLARENCE B. WOOD.

445–457 WEST THIRTY-FIRST STREET,
New York, August 5, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: Permit me to congratulate you on your gallant fight against the exactions of unions. Would there were more public men with your courage.

Yours, very truly,

ROBT. L. CHAMBERLAINE.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., August 11, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: Permit me to congratulate you for your work in opposition to radicalism, which is being openly advocated by various organizations and individuals throughout the country.

Yours, very truly,

WALTER VAN BENTHUYSEN.

PALO ALTO, CALIF., August 11, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I want to express my admiration for the fearless work you are doing and your refusal to be intimidated. If we had some more men with your insight and courage in the House, unionism would be given to understand that the Government is not going to be coerced.

Very truly,

L. C. BEACH.

BOSTON, MASS., August 14, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: If available for distribution, I should very much like to receive a few copies of the splendid address recently delivered by you in the House of Representatives relative to the demands of the railroad brotherhoods.

Permit me to offer my congratulations on the position taken by you in this matter.

Sincerely, yours,

D. A. BELDEN.

ADA, OKLA., August 14, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: Being an old Texan and very much in sympathy with your stand against the unlawful and arbitrary acts of organized labor, I would like very much to have a copy of your speeches on this very important subject.

Yours, very truly,

P. A. NORRIS,
President First National Bank.

20 RIVERSIDE DRIVE,
Binghamton, N. Y., August 4, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: Allow me to congratulate you. I know railroad men pretty well and feel [illegible] them, but their course is subversive of the [illegible] claims unjust. Considering the short time it takes them to learn their business and the amount of education required, they are about the best paid men in the country.

Respectfully,

E. R. MASON.

AUGUST 13, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I greatly admire your record in Congress. It seems that the powers can neither bulldoze nor buy you. With the best of regards,

Very truly,

R. L. HARVIN.

SIESTA DEVELOPMENT CO.,
Sarasota, Fla., August 10, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: Your speeches suit me and meet my opinion exactly. When the Adamson law was allowed to be bluffed through, the corner stone was laid for all this trouble.

Yours, truly,

HARRY L. HIGEL.

HOTEL STRATHCONA,
Victoria, British Columbia, August 1, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: From the Victoria Colonial to-day I inclose you quotation from the dean of St. Paul, wherein he says that labor unions have become huge capitalistic concerns, engaged in financing raids upon the people. He says: "With them it is not a struggle between the rich and poor; it is open brigandage against the community. They are a privileged class, determined that these privileges shall not go outside themselves. They are shutting down employment not only against discharged soldiers but wounded men."

I trust that you will continue your fight for freedom of the individual to work and labor as he wills under the law.

Respectfully,

D. W. BELL.

Mr. Speaker, the foregoing is a fair sample of the many letters I have received from citizens all over the United States, living in States other than Texas, indorsing my work in Congress and approving my efforts to clean up certain departments and to rid our Nation of lawlessness and Bolshevism. I have received hundreds of such letters from my constituents in my own district, none of which I have put in this RECORD. But inasmuch as my Texas colleagues might be interested in learning the sentiment on these issues expressed by their constituents, I will now exhibit a sample of the letters I have received from numerous citizens of Texas outside of my own district, as follows, to wit:

BURGESS, BURGESS, CHRESTMAN & BRUNDIDGE,
ATTORNEYS AT LAW,
Dallas, Tex., September 1, 1919.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I have just finished reading your extended remarks under date of Monday, July 28, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD regarding the Nolan-Kenyon United States Employment Service measure. I read it all. I have also been reading in recent issues of the public press accounts of your activities in Congress in behalf of the "common people" as distinguished from the labor unions.

I wish to congratulate you upon your stand in Congress, and the fact that you appear to be one of a very few, if, indeed, there are any others, in Congress who has the courage to stand up for what is right and to oppose what is wrong, even though the wrong be in high places in the national administration.

I commend your stand, and I have heard many others say that they also commend it—men who never heard of you until recently. Your fame is spreading not only throughout Texas but throughout the Nation. Keep after the grafters, whether in low or high places, and you will receive the support and backing of the honest people of this Nation.

Very truly, yours,

J. L. BURGESS.

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS,
PUBLISHERS-IMPORTERS, TEXAS REPRESENTATIVE D. S. FURMAN,
Dallas, Tex., August 9, 1919.

Hon. T. L. BLANTON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR BLANTON: I take pleasure in sending you a clipping from the Dallas News of to-day. You do not know with how much interest and pleasure your Texas friends are watching the splendid fight that you are making in Congress for the preservation of the people's rights. It does one good to see that there is one Congressman who is willing to take the lead against the Bolsheviki spirit which is animating the labor unions in this country. You are exactly right, and I want you to know that the people in Texas who have any nerve are with you to the last ditch in this contest. Everywhere I go I hear your action discussed and only words of praise for the stand you are taking.

I want you to know that I am with you and for you for anything that you may want; not only because of our long and intimate friendship but because I believe you have both the brains and the nerve to stand up for what is right against any wrongs and against any opposition. Keep up the good fight, because you are doing a grand work not only for the State of Texas but for the Nation as a whole.

I have intended for some time to write you, expressing my appreciation of all that you are doing, but after I read this morning's paper I could not delay writing any longer. I feel sure you know that you have my best wishes in both your personal and political careers. If you should come to Dallas at any time, be sure to look me up, because it is always a pleasure to see you.

With best wishes, I am,

Very truly, yours,

D. S. FURMAN.

THOMAS L. BLANTON,
Washington, D. C.:

Ninety per cent of the citizenship worth while are with you in your fight for justice to the citizens that are developing the industries of the United States, and they should be protected against the class that is not competent to manage it.

EL PASO, TEX., August 4, 1919.

DEAR MR. BLANTON: I can't keep from admiring the only man in Washington who has guts to come out in the open and stand up for what is right. At one time I was foolish enough to think that organized labor was patriotic and stood for what was right. Now, I know that they are the most dangerous trust in existence in the United States to-day.

Everybody is suffering from these hard times now, it is the price we paid for victory. Most of us are waiting for times to adjust themselves, but the traitors can't wait. While we boys were fighting for $30 per month the Government had to raise the traitors' wages every 30 days to keep them in line and then throw an insult at us by telling the dynamiters how patriotic they were.

Don't grant their unjust demands. If necessary call for volunteers to guard and operate the railroads. They made soldiers out of us in 30 days, we can learn to run the railroads in the same time. Stand up for the right and keep off the civil war, I am for you. With best regards, I am,

Yours, truly,

COLBERT COLDWELL.
1121 Los Angeles Street.

SAN ANTONIO, TEX., August 21, 1919.

REPRESENTATIVE BLANTON: I am greatly pleased with the honest and frank manner in which you discuss public questions. Would that all of our Congressmen were equally frank. However, it is a great pleasure to know that we have at least one representative in Congress who has the courage to call a spade a spade.

With best wishes for your future success, I remain,

Sincerely, yours,

W. F. MILLER,
821 Mason Street.

THE OZARK CIDER & VINEGAR CO.,
PARIS, TEX., August 9, 1919.

REPRESENTATIVE BLANTON: We strongly admire the courage you have displayed in standing up for the rights of the public. The feeling of the public generally is in accord with the stand you have taken.

Yours, very truly,

MAURY ROBINSON.

GRANBURY, TEX., August 9, 1919.

REPRESENTATIVE BLANTON: You seem to be the only man in Congress. Our hat is off to you. May you live long and happily. Here's to you for United States Senator when the next vacancy occurs.

Sincerely,

J. H. DOYLE.

FORT WORTH, TEX., August 9, 1919.

REPRESENTATIVE BLANTON: As a citizen who believes in protection to property, and a fair deal for all the people, permit me to express to you my high appreciation for the invaluable work you are doing in Congress against anarchy, Bolshevism, and a thousand other ills with which the country is now afflicted.

I do not live in your district but feel proud that we have one man in Congress, at least, that will stand up and defend the principles that our country has heretofore stood for.

Yours, kindly,

H. H. HARDIN.

WICHITA MILL & ELEVATOR CO.,
Wichita Falls, Tex., August 12, 1919.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
Care House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BLANTON: I can not refrain from expressing to you my personal appreciation of the position taken by you with reference to the demands of the railroad brotherhoods for the passage of their so-called "Government Ownership Railroad Bill." I am sure that your attitude and the views expressed by you are harmonious with the attitude and views of an overwhelming majority of our Texas people. The only difficulty about the matter is, that too many of our people are willing to let matters of this kind go by unnoticed, and then later complain of the injustice that has been done.

I sincerely hope the very courageous example set by you in opposing this monstrous injustice which is sought to be forced roughshod on our American people may be followed by a sufficient number of Democratic and Republican Congressmen to assure the overwhelming defeat of this vicious measure.

With kindest regards, I beg to remain,

Very truly, yours,

J. C. MYTINGER.

BELLVILLE, TEX., August 9, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I am not one of your constituents, but am a native Texan, and desire to say that I have read of your efforts in the House with great pleasure. I always admire a man who has the courage to openly express his honest convictions.

Your stand with regard to the railroad men is absolutely correct.

I stood in front of the post office to-day when the papers came, and heard at least a dozen men indorse your efforts, and praise you for your courage and fearlessness. I tell you that it is bad that we haven't at least 300 more men like you in Congress.

The political cowards must be sent to the political junk pile, and the people will no doubt do it.

In these strenuous days when our Government has been put to an expense unheard of, every person ought to stand by the Government and reduce the expense.

Again expressing my appreciation, and with kindest wishes, I am,

Very truly, yours,

C. G. KRUEGER.

S. E. MCASHAN GRAIN CO.,
Houston, Tex., August 6, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: Simply want to say that I am watching your work in Congress with pleasure. The H. C. of L. and the labor question go hand in hand and both are now exactly where they ought to be, before Congress, where they should be thrashed out. The issues must be faced and decided to save the Republic.

With best wishes,

S. E. MCASHAN.

SHUTTLES BROS. & LEWIS,
Dallas, Tex., August 9, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I should feel recreant to a duty if I did not write and commend you for the stand you are taking regarding organized labor.

I am heartily in sympathy with labor and prepared to go a long ways toward dividing profits with them, but it is impossible to satisfy them.

If a few more of our Congressmen and Senators had the courage that you have, it would soon bring about much better conditions in this country.

I believe all thinking people are with you and hope that you will be successful in your efforts.

Yours, truly,

R. H. SHUTTLES, President.

AUSTIN, TEX., August 7, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I note in the papers your stand with reference to labor unions, and I want to congratulate you, as it occurs to me you are the only one so far that has nerve enough to tackle this combination and trust. You are on the right road, according to my opinion, and I hope that good results will follow your onslaught on this combination.

Yours, truly,

W. R. SMITH.

WACO, TEX., August 20, 1919.

DEAR MR. BLANTON: I read your speech, "Whither are We Drifting?" in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with a great deal of interest. It is almost as interesting as one of Dumas's novels, and I am so pleased with the methods you pursue in this and other matters of a similar character that I can not resist telling you and congratulating you.

Very truly, yours,

CHARLES HAMILTON.
Bankers Trust Building.

HUMBLE OIL & REFINING CO.,
Fort Worth, Tex., August 7, 1919.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: You never saw or heard of me before, and I am an utter stranger to you.

Nevertheless, I hope I may not be exceeding the privileges of even the humblest citizen in writing you to express to you my deep admiration and my heartfelt sympathy in the stand you have been and are taking against the unreasonable demand and inordinate arrogance of federated labor.

I am in complete sympathy with labor itself, as I know you and all other good men are; I am a laborer myself, though my labor is not manual. But organized labor is under arms and marching. The time is not far distant when it must crush or be crushed. It is as relentless and as selfish as the Hun; if victorious, it will be as ignorant and chaotic, as vicious as the Russian Bolsheviki.

For years past I have been hoping that conditions might raise some dauntless giant who would have the courage and the force to lead a fight against this growing tyranny of federated labor. Three years ago I was disappointed when even our great President had the opportunity, but not the courage, to do it.

And until you took up the gauntlet I had almost lost hope that any of our public men would be brave enough to join battle in behalf of that greater and more numerous, but less noisy and aggressive force, the great American public, which some day is going to rise in its wrath and sweep the present labor organizations from the face of the earth. I am praying for more strength to your arm.

I resided for 22 years at Ballinger, and in my heart still call it home; I consider myself as one of your constituents; your district is my home, and I am very proud if it shall prove that my home district in Texas shall raise up the David who shall defeat this arrogant Goliath. I am,

Very respectfully, yours,

ROBERT L. BENNETT.

GREENVILLE, TEX., August 9, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I note with much interest the bold stand you have taken in favor of the enforcement of the law against organized anarchy. It is indeed regrettable that so few of our public men have the nerve to denounce wrong when it may jeopardize their political prospects. I want to express my admiration of the courage which you have manifested since you became a Member of Congress.

I have some acquaintance with your distinguished sister, Miss Annie Webb Blanton, our efficient State superintendent of public instruction, and knew of you as a former district judge in western Texas.

Respectfully,

V. W. GRUBBS.

ORANGE, TEX., September 4, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I was in the office of Mr. Lynch Davidson in Houston yesterday and found him reading "the most interesting document he had seen in years." Questioning him, I found it to be a CONGRESSIONAL RECORD containing your exposé of the Department of Labor. Would consider it a special favor if you would kindly send me a copy of this RECORD.

Yours, very truly,

F. H. FARWELL, General Manager.

MOSHER MANUFACTURING CO.,
Dallas, Tex., August 7, 1919.

DEAR MR. BLANTON: I wish you to know that I have heard many favorable comments on your work in Congress from business men not only in Texas but in my travels North and East, where my business takes me frequently.

Yours, very truly,

W. S. MOSHER.

BEE COUNTY ABSTRACT CO.,
Beeville, Tex., August 7, 1919.

REPRESENTATIVE BLANTON: As far as I can see from the press, you are the only man in Congress that has the nerve to raise your voice against the Bolshevist, anarchy, and labor unions, which are more menacing to this Government to-day than anything else since the Declaration of Independence.

Yours, truly,

DAN TROY.

THE R. H. SWARTZ CO.,
Houston, Tex., August 6, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: Please allow me to congratulate you. You represent not only the sentiments of the masses of this State but also the interests of the country at large. I am sorry that so few of your colleagues have the courage to say what they think and know to be right. Thanking you again, and wishing you success.

Yours, very truly,

R. H. SWARTZ.

DALLAS, TEX., August 9, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: The writer wishes to congratulate you on your efforts. You are one of the few men who are not afraid to think and to say what you think. If this country had more Congressmen who were of the fearless type you are our problems would not have reached such a critical state.

Trusting you will continue your good work, and thanking you for what you have done,

Yours, truly,

J. H. BRILLHART.

VAN HORN, TEX., August 9, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: After reading your speeches on union labor, I have felt it to be my duty to thank you for the stand you have taken.

Yours, very truly,

T. R. OWEN.

DUBLIN, TEX., August 11, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: Permit me to commend you for your courage and efforts. What you have said everybody knows is true, but nearly everybody is afraid to "open his head" about it. Believe me, organized labor has got fangs and is showing them. The average legislator has not seen that this great upheaval on high cost of living is not of the plain people.

Very truly, yours,

C. G. FOUST.

DALLAS, TEX., STATION A, August 11, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I have carefully read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for years. I feel in my deepest heart to write you that we sorely need BLANTONS to fill our congressional seats in both Houses. The holding up of our Government, the robbing of our masses by classes drawing fat salaries is the crime of the ages, and a disgrace to our Representatives. To stop the infamy of the Adamson law, it is only necessary to get the facts before the people. Once the masses get to see this infamous bulldozing of our Nation, they will put men in Congress who will see that we have a real Government. Go ahead. The people are with you.

W. A. JARREL.

SAN ANGELO, TEX., August 7, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I want to compliment you and commend your efforts against allowing labor unions to dominate Congress and our Government. The consensus of opinion here outside of unions is that you are the only man in Congress that has had the guts to fight for the rights of the people. Thinking men know that there must be a change.

Yours, very truly,

R. H. HARRIS.

LAGRANGE, TEX., September 4, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: You are making a wonderful fight, and I realize that the labor element is undermining our very institutions. I have never voted anything but a Democratic ticket in my life, but it strikes me that it is high time that house cleaning be had. Labor is dominating the party, and are demanding whatever capricious scheme that may suggest itself to them, whether right or wrong. There never was a time when we were in greater need of strong, bold, fearless men in Congress, who know the right and are willing to defend it.

Keep up the fight. Every true American is with you.

Very sincerely,

GEORGE E. LENERT.

6016 LINDELL STREET, DALLAS, TEX., August 7, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I don't know what district you represent in Congress, but I want to congratulate a constituency whose Representative has the courage to speak his convictions, even when those convictions run counter to those of a body of men whose will to rule or ruin is so manifest.

I am a railroad man myself, but the world has not yet grown so old that a railroad man must of necessity be a Bolshevik, and so I am opposed to the Plumb plan of running the railroads. Nor do I find that any of the railroad men with whom I have talked are in favor of it. I sincerely hope that the President and Congress will not make an abject surrender as was done in the case of the Adamson bill.

Very truly, yours,

CHARLES F. STEELE.

EL PASO, TEX., August 4, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I have noted with interest your speeches. I believe that the time for calling a halt is upon us. I appreciate the stand you have taken, and also appreciate the fact that Texas has one Representative in Congress who has the moral courage to voice his convictions. I hope you will continue to soak this bunch of highbinders until the people can get in touch with their Representatives in Congress. The people are becoming more and more disgusted with this bunco game, and unless Congress takes action without further delay, the people are going to act. You may rest assured that the people who believe in a square deal for all and special concessions to none will always be found backing you.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: Congratulations. You are just exactly right. Keep up the good fight.

Yours, very truly,

J. E. FARNSWORTH.

FORT WORTH, TEX., August 20, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I have just read your speech in the Dallas News and desire to congratulate you.

As I understand it, there are something like three to six million organized laborers, and possibly 100 real rich men furnishing the surplus capital for carrying on organized commercial manufacturing and industrial pursuits, and I am rather of the opinion that they are standing in together. Only a few years ago Mr. George L. Bennett, who controlled the Strawn coal mines, was very much opposed to organized labor and would not let his miners organize. He was also the controlling interest in the Acme Pressed Brick Co. at Bennett, Tex., and some of his friends at Alton, Ill., were also interested with him in that enterprise, and during a trip to Alton one of the coal-mine organizers slipped into Strawn and organized the miners into a union, and when Mr. Bennett returned he found them all out on a strike, and on inquiry he found that the superintendent had discharged a man who had almost beaten a mule to death down in the mine, and the miners demanded that he be taken back, and on the refusal of the superintendent the miners struck.

When Mr. Bennett located the trouble and was unable to get the miners to work until this fellow was taken back, he called the miner into the office and told the superintendent to put him back to work, but the first time he beat a mule again to kill him and the company would see that he was cleared of the crime. This was a real good joke on him, and I was telling it on Mr. Bennett a year or two later, and he says, "Hell, I am in favor of organized labor now," and I asked him why, and he stated that in negotiations with the Miners' Union in Indianapolis a month or so prior to that, and they had been in conference for two or three weeks and had not arrived at a settlement, and one of the union men got up and stated that he was badly fooled in the class of men—the mine owners—that they were dealing with, that he thought they were shrewd business men. Mr. Bennett stated that he got up and told them that he was an ordinary damphool, but he wanted to know wherein he had acted a damphool in this instance, and the miners' representative asked him the question, what difference did it make to him or the mine owners what price they paid the miners for mining the coal, as the consumer eventually had to pay it anyhow. The miner stated that they were only asking for 5 cents a ton increase and suggested that "you mine owners can easily agree to pay this and then go home and raise the price of coal 25 cents a ton, telling the consumers that you were forced to do this on account of having to increase the pay to the miners for mining the coal."

Mr. Bennett stated that he told them that he was agreeable, that he was a simple damphool, and that he was ready to settle right now and pay the advance and follow the suggestion of the miner, which was done. Mr. Bennett stated that they had contracted for two years on this basis, but when that contract was out with the miners he was in favor of making the contract for only one year, so that they could increase their profits every year instead of every two years.

The nerve of the union labor as suggested in what is known as the Plumb plan for controlling the transportation of this country is collossal, and our Congressmen should stand by the gun and fight such a suggestion on every occasion.

Union or organized labor has for years been intimidating our legislators, our Congress, our courts, and even the Supreme Court of the United States. Look what they have done in the Mooney case, and I for one believe it is time to stop such proceedings in this country if we propose to be free people.

There is everything against union labor and nothing in its favor, and I congratulate Texas on having a representative with nerve enough to get up and fight it in Congress.

For the above reasons, I am of the opinion that the Congressman or Senator who looks after the interest of the public, even if he has to go up against organized labor, will be the man that will be in public favor in the end, as the public is beginning to wake up to the conditions brought about by organized labor in the high cost of living.

Yours, very truly,

H. B. DORSEY.

EL PASO, TEX., August 5, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I heartily agree with you that something must be done or this country will face a condition of anarchy. Labor is but human and becomes a tyrant as well as the capitalist. Trusting that we may soon be released from threatened anarchy, I am,

Very truly,

M. M. WINNINGHAM.

STERLING CITY, TEX., September 1, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I have read and studied carefully the brave stand you have taken before Congress and the American people against the cowardly, selfish, unarchistic aggressions of labor unions.

As an American, and therefore a natural born rebel against wrong, regardless of its source, I want to thank you for your manly stand. I think it is magnificent. All decent, self-respecting Americans are and will be with you.

Within the past four or five years America—my country and yours—has absorbed more Kaiserism, more imperial German rottenness, than we will be able to get rid of in many years.

Sincerely and respectfully,

JEFF D. AYRES.

PARIS, TEX., August 22, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: Your attitude certainly meets with the hearty approval of the good citizenship of this State, and I congratulate you on having the nerve to express yourself.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: About everyone is with you and telling of the good work you are doing against governmental extravagance, and for America and all Americans.

Very respectfully,

DALLAS, TEX., August 6, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I hope that I shall have an opportunity to vote for you some time, for it is a real pleasure to know that we have one statesman representing the people of the United States that rises above the mere politicians that have filled the legislative halls for so long—the politicians who have pampered the labor unions for fear of losing a few votes until these unions have decided that they can now dictate the kind of government we will have. The time has come for the Government to stop the hold-ups, else we might as well turn things over to Lenine and Trotsky.

If you receive letters from all who approve your efforts, the Postal Department couldn't handle your mail.

And on that daylight-saving law, Mr. BLANTON, you are right again. I will bet everything I have that 98 per cent of the people of Texas are against it.

With best wishes for your success, yours, sincerely,

JOHN J. MILLER.

COLLIN COUNTY MILL & ELEVATOR CO.,
McKinney, Tex., August 28, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: Kindly permit me to congratulate you. If there were more Representatives of your kind in Congress, this Nation would feel a security which it does not now feel.

In our present-day affairs, when people are generally thinking more of themselves than of anyone else, it is certainly very refreshing to find a man who, perhaps, lays aside his personal advancement for the cause of humanity and good government, like you have done. I believe that you are entirely correct in the things which you have said in Congress.

I hope that some time I may have the opportunity of voting for you for United States Senator. I have found in the last few months hundreds of people in the State of Texas, and for that matter outside of the State of Texas, who heartily indorse the things which you have said and done.

It would seem like you and my good friend, SAM RAYBURN, from this district, are the only Democrats from the Southwest who have had the courage of their convictions, and who stand loyally by the people who have elected them, regardless of whether or not they belong to labor unions.

With every good wish, I am,

Yours, very truly,

J. PERRY BURRUS.

ROSEBUD, TEX., September 5, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: As an ex-soldier I wish to commend you and show my appreciation of your efforts in Congress, knocking out the big appropriation for the United States Employment Bureau, and your fight against wasting the people's money.

You are right, Mr. BLANTON. Congress has truckled to unreasonable labor demands while we soldiers served in the Army for a dollar a day, and all suffered, and many died in France, during which labor struck and shirked on the jobs, when munitions and ships meant life and blood. You are right. Labor frequently acted the part of traitors. I wish you success in your efforts and sincere endeavors.

Yours, truly,

DALLAS, TEX., August 21, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: Keep up your good work. I inclose editorial from to-day's Dallas News re BLANTON. Papers all over the State are now sitting up and taking notice. You are receiving more editorial notice than any other Representative or Senator, according to my observations. The people are beginning to watch BLANTON. We need a man like you for Senator. HOUSTON, TEX., August 8, 1919.

HON. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BLANTON: It is encouraging to note that at this period when the American Federation of Labor seems to be in fancied control of the legislative and executive branches of the Government that there is at least one Member of the House of Representatives who is unafraid of this un-American and menacing organization. The papers give us a brief outline of the resolution which you introduced in the House on yesterday, and I wish to congratulate you upon your timely act.

Whatever may be the effort of the Government to regulate the relations between employer and employee and the conditions of labor throughout the Republic, it ought not to be undertaken solely for the purpose of creating a privileged class. The Congress some years ago attempted to relieve the labor organizations of all obligation to the Republic and of all respect for private property rights. In amending the antitrust laws labor organizations were exempted, thus discriminating between citizens, and the belief then became almost universal that by this act and other acts the Congress had recognized the labor unions as incapable of doing any wrong. The Supreme Court, however, exploded this theory to a certain extent in the case of Hitchman Coal & Coke Co., against John Mitchel et al., page 229, Sixty-second Lawyers Edition, United States Supreme Court Reports, and other cases in the same volume. These opinions were dissented from by Justices Brandies, Clark, and Holmes, as might have been expected.

One vicious element in this legislation as in other similar legislation is that the lawmakers do not differentiate between the employments of different organizations in so far as they affect the public interest. Men engaged in conducting the activities and operations of quasipublic corporations owe the public a duty differing from the duty owed by men engaged in private employment, but this duty has never been recognized in legislation. It ought to be.

Men engaged with corporations performing a public duty, such as transportation, whether upon the steam railroads or other line, and men engaged in all of the activities which we know as public utilities, owe the public a duty, whereas men engaged in private employments do not owe the public the same duty. It is the privilege of every American citizen to take employment where he chooses and quit when he pleases. This right can not be abridged. It may be that American citizens would enjoy this right in their collective capacity so far as private employment is concerned, but they ought not to be privileged to exercise such right in so far as public employment is concerned. Every man who accepts an engagement with any railroad, street railway, telephone, telegraph, or public utility knows that the employing corporation owes the public a certain duty, and that he in accepting such employment assumes the performance of such duty, and he ought not to be permitted to quit that employment of his own will but only for good reasons which involve a proper consideration for his obligation to the public.

Since there has been legislation bestowing extraordinary powers on labor unions in the matter of resorting to force for the purpose of carrying their demands, then there should be legislation limiting the exercise of this force in every instance where the employing corporation owes a duty to the public. There is no better time than now to give consideration to this serious omission in our legislation because of recent efforts of certain potential organizations to demand a ransom of millions or billions of dollars from the Congress, or otherwise these organizations would wreck society through a tie-up of all the transportation facilities of the Republic, which have rendered the public mind capable of thoughtful and sane action.

It is not probable that the Congress would undo the legislation heretofore carried in the effort to render labor organizations supreme in all industrial matters, but Congress ought to be willing, in the public interest, to divide these organizations into the classes in which they belong and require those engaged in public vocations which are essential to the comfort, happiness, and progress of the people, to perform their duties with some regard to the public welfare. I believe if you would take up this question and think out remedial legislation that you would be performing a service of tremendous national value and adding substantially to your already well-earned reputation as an old-fashioned Democrat who believes in equal opportunity for all and special privilege to none.

With assurance of my high regard and with a just pride in the fight you are making, I am,

Very sincerely, yours,

JNO. H. KIRBY.

DALLAS, TEX., August 20, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I have been trying to get a chance to write you for several weeks expressing my approval of your efforts. Suffice it to say you are doing something all patriots should do, but which few have the courage to do. You are doing right without fear, but you are going to lose nothing; like all cases where men do their duty, you will be remembered and honored and rewarded. Keep it up.

Sincerely, yours,

E. M. BAKER, Attorney.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I wish hereby to heartily indorse your efforts. You have my heartiest support.

Very truly, yours,

ROY H. HIGHTOWER.

PLAINVIEW, TEX., August 19, 1919.

DEAR MR. BLANTON: I read with considerable interest of your work in the House. You are right. We have had enough of this socialistic doctrine and threats.

Yours,

L. B. BAIN.

And, Mr. Speaker, I have received numerous unsigned commendatory letters from all over the United States, and insert the following as a fair sample of them:

UNION, S. C., August 16, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: The people know that the high cost of living is largely the result of demand after demand made by labor unions since war began. Congress must call a halt. We all appreciate your self-sacrificing, valuable work. I would vote for you for President. Your heart is with all the people.

A LABORER.

SEATTLE, WASH., August 13, 1919.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The United States Employment Service should be investigated here. Shortly after this office opened there were seven men drawing $3,000 a year each, because they were union men and would not send anyone without a union card. We have six labor bureaus in Seattle, all spending public money. Mr. Shells, of the city bureau, will tell you that Federal Director Lawrence Wood and his office are a joke. On July 1 his monthly allowance was reduced to $1,500, but he had rented half of his floor space to the Knights of Columbus for $300 per month. I am a civil-service employee, hence can't sign my name.

ONE ON THE INSIDE.

TRENTON, N. J., August 13, 1919.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE BLANTON: Keep up your patriotic work in the interest of a square deal for all the people. I am inclosing you an article published in the newspaper from Dr. A. C. Kniskern, of Mechanicsville, dated August 12, wherein he says no labor union member is starving or in any way suffering, but that the cost of production has increased through wage increases and restrictions demanded, and that industry, dexterity, and efficiency are discouraged, while shiftlessness, incompetency, and sloth are protected.

FIXED INCOME.

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 15, 1919.

DEAR MR. BLANTON: I am much interested in your good work. Keep it up and clean up these departments. At 1310 Pennsylvania Avenue SE. there are four members of the same family drawing salaries from the Government. Is it right for the law to be ignored?

A HELPER.

PORTLAND, OREG., August 12, 1919.

Representative BLANTON, of Texas.

DEAR SIR: I desire you to know that I commend your stand and the work you have done in Congress.

There is hardly a Government institution connected with industry, outside of farming, that has not been given over to the control of labor unions. You doubtless know that the employment agencies have been turned over to them. It is idle for the Secretary of Labor to say that union men can deal fairly with unorganized labor, as it is an impossibility. It is your efforts and fight to clean up the party that will keep us Democrats in it who are now ready to quit if the old policy is pursued. To sign my name would invite attacks.

A TAXPAYER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 30, 1919.

CONGRESSMAN BLANTON, of Texas: Unions will not let men work when, where, and for whom they please, or an employer employ whom he pleases, but is a gigantic trust crushing the freedom and life out of this Nation. Where is the business man, newspaper, or clergyman who dares tell the truth about it? Is there left among our public men in this country an old-time, honest American, who like Henry Clay would rather be right than be President? Gold help us, I fear not, unless it is you.

AMERICAN.

WEST SIXTY-EIGHTH STREET,
New York, August 16, 1919.

DEAR MR. BLANTON: I feel impelled to write you this letter, congratulating your work in Congress.

Since the brotherhoods thrust their "Plumb-to-hell plan," as it is characterized by the Hon. Martin W. Littleton, of this city, on Congress, there is fast developing a movement that might be called a government of the labor unions, by the labor unions, and for the labor unions.

The time has arrived when the American people should call a halt on the activities and holdup methods of the labor organizations of this country. They must fight back to again establish that freedom of action and that freedom from domination that is the inalienable right of every American citizen and which privilege he holds so dear.

I therefore rejoice that there is at least one Representative in Congress who has the courage to stand up in his place and make a most emphatic protest against the most vicious measure that has ever been presented to Congress, and which would invest in a class the power to control the most important element of our national life.

The result may be a revolution, but it won't be on the Plumb plan. Wishing you success in your work, I am,

DEMOCRAT.

CAMDEN, N. J., September 5, 1919.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BLANTON: I read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and you are the only Member in the House who really stands up for the people, and I want to extend my humble praise to you for doing so. If there were more Representatives like you, the country would be a great deal better off. Being a Republican of the Roosevelt type, it goes against my grain to have anything to do with or say to a Democrat, but you are such an exceptionally honest and clean Democrat, to say nothing of your fearlessness, it kinder pulls me near to you as you fight to protect the interests of all the people. Some of your colleagues ought to go back home and knock their damn blocks off, for they are no earthly use either to their constituents, who have been damn fools enough to send them to Congress, or to their Government. If some of your colleagues would spend half the time helping you that they waste in opposing your good fights, something would be accomplished.

You keep on with your good work and the decent people of the country will with one accord say, "God bless TOM BLANTON, of Texas; well done thou good and faithful servant"; and we will forgive you for being a Democrat.

FIRST DISTRICT, N. J.

MADISON, WIS., August 19, 1919.

DEAR MR. BLANTON: I am in hearty sympathy with your work in Congress. After forcing the Adamson law on the people in 1916, all branches of organized labor followed suit, and through threats and force have reached the dollar-an-hour basis. Now, they are to solve the high cost of living by reducing the price of all farm products. Unions raise the price of farm machinery and lower the price of farm products and makes the "tiller of the soil" a slave to labor organizations. I note that you are representing all of the people alike and not a small class.

REPUBLICAN FARMER.

994 FOURTEENTH STREET,
Boulder, Colo., September 4, 1919.

MY DEAR MR. BLANTON: Your speeches in the House on Americanism, particularly your opposition to class legislation demanded under threats by certain organizations, should be read by every red-blooded American who holds the interests of the whole country to be above the desires of a small clique of agitators, most of whom were permitted to evade military service and who labored for their country at from $8 to $10 per day, while others of us served our country by fighting in the trenches of Europe at $33 per month. Gompers says organized labor won the war. If labor was so essential to the winning of the war, why was it not conscripted to work at the same remuneration paid men who were laboring on the battle fields of Europe? We who have served in France sometimes wonder just who are real Americans.

ROY H. FLAMM.
County Road Superintendent, Alamogordo, N. Mex.

MONTROSE, COLO., September 3, 1919.

Congressman BLANTON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BLANTON: I read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with more interest than any magazine, and I take a dozen, and I am wonderfully interested in your splendid campaign against bureaucratic iniquities prevalent in Washington. I am not asking any special assistance at this time in this matter, but thought you would like to know some of the latest developments in this rotten war bureau.

Permit me to say that your name in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD always attracts me to something worth reading. I am no Democrat, but Senator THOMAS's views, as well as your own, of bureaucratic or governmental unions are my own. They are nothing less than treasonable.

Yours, truly, F. D. CARLIN.

WILLIAMSTOWN, MASS., August 10, 1919.

DEAR MR. BLANTON: I am glad to think there is one Congressman who is not intimidated by the threats of those who talk of tying up the railroads, starving our cities, and killing industrial life if the Government doesn't do their bidding. The misfortune is there are not more men in Congress with your backbone. It would certainly be better for the country.

Wishing you great success.

A BUSINESS MAN.

Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] expressed so vigorously his disapprobation of my efforts in this House I will insert a few excerpts from a few leading newspapers, giving information as to the view of at least some impartial newspapers on the issue involved:

[Honey Grove Signal.]

We don't know THOMAS L. BLANTON, Congressman from the Abilene district, but we are hoping his voice will never grow weaker than it is now and that the supply of sand for his gizzard will never be cut off. BLANTON is saying things out loud that many men have long been thinking in secret. Yea, BLANTON is saying things other men know they ought to say and would say if their backbones could be stiffened a little.

[Wills Point Chronicle.]

Say what you may of Congressman THOMAS L. BLANTON, of the Abilene district, he is one man who would go to jail, if need be, for opinion's sake. Right or wrong, he is a fighter who never squawks when the cold steel of an opponent strikes him. Game to the last; that's TOM BLANTON.

[Athens Review.]

BLANTON is a strong man. He is not only representing his own district but is doing most of the fighting in Congress for Texas. The Review places him in nomination for governor next year. We would like to hear a second to the nomination.

[Ledger.]

That would be great for Texas but a sacrifice on the part of Mr. BLANTON and the seventeenth district, a sacrifice our east Texas friends should not exact. The governor of Texas draws the princely sum of $4,000, and the people, through their prejudice and ignorance, recently said it was sufficient. Yes; Texas needs a man of BLANTON'S backbone and ability for governor, but the Nation needs him in Congress, and it is up to Texas and the seventeenth district to keep him there.

[From the Houston (Tex.) Post, p. 6, Apr. 23, 1919.]

MR. BLANTON AND MR. GOMPERS.

When Mr. Gompers in his recent statement to the Associated Press suggested Congressman BLANTON'S "utter incapacity of understanding the plainest propositions of right, justice, freedom, and democracy," he invited a rejoinder from the Texas Congressman that may be taken as one of the preliminaries of some very plain speaking in the American Congress.

Mr. Gompers need not expect to dismiss the Texan in so summary a manner. Mr. BLANTON is plenteously endowed with understanding. There need be no fear on that ground, and he is very apt to be heard from on the floor of Congress.

Mr. BLANTON is not lacking either in intelligence or courage, and in the general discussion of war matters, which is very apt to follow the coming investigations, he may be depended upon to exhibit an understanding that will satisfy Mr. Gompers on that score.

Mr. Gomper's labor activity has never placed him in touch with the great agricultural classes of America. Mr. BLANTON is very much in touch with a quarter of a million of just that sort of population. And probably before very long there will be a very close inspection by Congressmen of the agricultural demands of the country, for some of the very things that Mr. Gompers is now boasting of achieving happen to be things that are not viewed with any great enthusiasm by the agricultural classes and the great unorganized bourgeoisie of the country.

Mr. Gompers is a man of great ability and determination, but what he has achieved during the war must eventually come up for review, because the great majority of the workers of the country were not included in the benefits, but certainly are included among the payers of the cost of such benefits.

And when we say these achievements must come up for review we do not say that they must be set aside. But it is evident that the permanent adjustments, so far as the Government is concerned, and so far as all private activity is concerned, must include all classes of workers, organized or otherwise.

Agriculture will not pay these mounting tolls upon its energies without a hearing or without full consideration. It is slowly awakening, as Mr. BLANTON knows, and it is going to contend for an application of the principle of equal and exact justice to all. When the sleeping giant awakes, Mr. Gompers will be surprised to see how many Congressmen will cease to regard him as the Colossus he has appeared to be for 30 years past. He may be sure there has been little genuine regard for him personally, and quite as little for some of his achievements during the war which unquestionably outraged the sense of propriety of many a Congressman who was too timid to risk anything by open rebellion against Mr. Gompers's mastery of the labor vote.

With the farmers awake, the tongue-tied element in Congress will be quick to emulate Mr. BLANTON'S example of courageous speech. Practically every district in the South and two-thirds of those in the Middle West and Southwest are in the final analysis dominated by the farmers. These people are far from satisfied in all respects with the various war adjustments so far as labor is concerned.

They are going to have a say in the payment of these vast tolls upon their primary industry. They are not objecting to just wage schedules, but as the ultimate payers of both capital and labor they are going to have their own status investigated and fixed upon a basis of equal justice.

And the man who threatens them with any calamity whatsoever will be a fit subject for the insane asylum. They are not to be frightened. They are holding the pantry keys and the wardrobe keys of the world, and they are going to ascertain why they are not considered in the adjustments between capital and labor.

So far, therefore, from exhibiting a lack of understanding, Representative BLANTON has shown a most acute understanding of what is in the mind of millions, but which has remained unsaid during the war period for various reasons. This will become more and more apparent as the weeks go by. Party control is losing its effectiveness and men will not fear to speak out.

COTTON KEPT OUT OF FOOD CONTROL BILL—TEXAS MEMBER'S POINT THAT IT IS NOT GERMANE SUSTAINED.

WASHINGTON, August 22.

Cotton was kept out of the food-control bill to-day by a point of order made by Representative BLANTON, of Texas, to an amendment offered by Representative NEWTON, of Minnesota, which proposed to render raw cotton subject to the same regulations made applicable to wearing apparel, etc. The House had voted into the bill the regulation of rents, which was later eliminated. Representative HAUGEN, chairman of the Agricultural Committee, made a point of order, but reserved action pending a discussion of the Newton amendment, whereupon Mr. BLANTON renewed the point, insisting that cotton was not germane to the subject of the legislation.

"The prime purpose of the bill is to protect the producers of raw material in their right to collective bargaining," said Mr. BLANTON. "Labor is not included, and no one would offer an amendment to do so, and we have a right to assume that the producers of raw materials will not be relieved of their natural rights. Cotton is not clothing."

"You raise cotton in Texas, don't you?" asked Mr. LAGUARDIA, of New York.

"Yes; and you have your collective bargaining by labor in New York, too," replied Mr. BLANTON.

REPUBLICANS WANT COTTON INCLUDED.

Against the point of order Republican Members argued that the inclusion of cotton would tend to make sure an adequate supply of clothing and as a raw material ought to come under the regulatory power as well as the finished product.

Representative TEMPLE, of Pennsylvania, occupying the chair in Committee of the Whole, sustained the point of order.

DR. J. B. CRANFILL'S CHRONICLE—HE DISCUSSES THE RAILROAD PROBLEM AND REFERS INCIDENTALLY TO OTHER IMPORTANT AND ABSORBING MATTERS.

It seems to me that the American press and people have not lived up to their inherent feelings of gratitude and duty with reference to the four brotherhoods on what is called "the Plumb plan." In Russia the Bolsheviki took it all; but the Plumb plan only contemplates taking half. It is thus seen that the American soviets are more considerate than the Russian soviets were. Of course, the four brotherhoods have not given bond that they will not take the other half later on; but thus far no intimation has been given that they will commandeer all of the railroads as soon as they secure their demands for half of them, or rather a half interest in them. Moreover, the beauty of the plan seems to have escaped many writers and publicists. It is this way: The American soviet, represented by the four brotherhoods, not only contemplate taking over a half interest in all the railroads through the Plumb plan but they participate only in the profits. If there are any losses, the Government is to pay the losses, as it is doing now. If there are any profits, the brotherhoods take the profits on their half and seem at the present writing to be willing for the other two groups of owners to take the other half. That is what I call downright liberal, and the American people should be duly grateful to the brotherhoods for the fact that they have spared up to this writing half of the railroads and have not as yet demanded 40 acres and a mule for each one, as was the case in certain circles after the close of the Civil War.

Naturally, all of us feel sorry for the brotherhoods. They are a down-trodden and oppressed element in our population. Congressman BLANTON, who represents the Abilene district in Congress, has recently made public the salaries for July of engineers and conductors. I quote from a report that appears in a special telegram in the News:

"For the month of July freight engineers received $392.35 a month; passenger engineers, $376.85; passenger conductors, $313.90, and freight conductors, $308.55."

Representative BLANTON goes on to make some comparisons, which I quote:

"The governor of Texas only receives $333.33 per month, and a colonel in the Army receives the same rate of pay. A lieutenant colonel gets no more than $291.66, a major $250, and a captain $208.33. In other words, members of these two brotherhoods get more than does the governor of the great State of Texas or a colonel in the United States Army."

I repeat that we are naturally sorry for these brotherhood men, because of the oppression under which they now slave. This terrible oppression of which they are the victims began at about the time America entered the World War. At that time W. G. Lee and the other three heads of the brotherhoods went to Washington and demanded the passage of the Adamson law, which I have not now time to analyze. Moreover, they made demands for increases in wages, coupled with the threat that unless these demands were at once complied with they would precipitate a nation-wide strike, tie up all the railroads of the country, and paralyze every branch of American industry.

Later on, when we were in the very crisis of our struggle with Germany, these demands for increased wages were renewed, and our President, wisely, as I believe, acceded to them. These brotherhoods did not mean very much by these demands. They only meant that if we did not grant the demands, they would tie up the railroads; but they were unmindful of the fact that the effect would be to give us over to the enemy. And no one who knows the heart of the walking delegate doubts that Germany would have overswept the world if the American Government, in the most critical hour of the world's history, had not allowed these men to pile up their salaries until they are now what Representative BLANTON has disclosed.

All of this shows such a spirit of patriotism and unselfishness on the part of these brotherhoods that all of us, whenever we hear a locomotive engine whistle, should take off our hats. If we do not take off our hats, they will take them off for us a little later on, and all the balance of our clothes.

In passing, allow me to say that every true American of the ninety-four millions of our people who are not members of the American Federation of Labor, should honor and revere Congressman BLANTON. He has made a national reputation, which he well deserves, by standing four-square for the rights of the American people as against the unreasonable demands for the confiscation of our railroads on the part of the four brotherhoods. There may be other Congressmen in the House and Senate who think as Congressman BLANTON thinks, but he is the only man in our American halls of legislation who has the nerve to stand against the encroachment of these walking delegates, who are bent upon the confiscation of American property in order that they may fatten upon wealth which they do not own and to which they have no right.

For this very gratifying state of affairs, we are indebted to the four brotherhoods, and, if by any means they should succeed in becoming the owners of our lines of transportation, I for one would extend my walk, and instead of attempting to board a train, I would hoof it to Chicago and Battle Creek the next time I went, or ride in some passing automobile.

Leaving all persiflage and irony aside, the American people have reached a monumental crisis in their history. The common man, the day worker, and the owner of property must confront the fact that his liberties are not only imperiled but every dollar's worth of property he owns hangs in the balance in free America. The resolutions that are being passed by the different local unions of the American Federation of Labor, approving the Plumb plan, are but indices of the smoldering volcano upon which the American people are walking day by day. We had an exemplification of this in what is called the Mooney case. This man was convicted of murder in California, and the labor unions of the country came very near precipitating a nation-wide strike, because the jury of this man's peers had assessed his punishment at death. I know nothing of the facts in the case except those disclosed through the press reports, but the incident furnishes us with a warning that even a blind man should not ignore. The American Federation of Labor, through its walking delegates and leaders, are determined to either rule or ruin this country. They are determined to own it through one plan or another. Of course, they can soon own it on the salaries they are drawing, if they will keep quiet and mind their own affairs; but that will be rather too slow a process for the average walking delegate. The property, and incidentally the life, of every owner of property in America is in danger. We will be blind to the fact of world events if we do not see our American peril.

For one, I am caught up on the whole bunch of them. I am in favor of allowing all of them to strike whenever they want to, and the rest of us will take care of ourselves the best we can. I am in favor of liberty of conscience and freedom of speech and action, and if our brave boys fared forth to defend the civilization of the world against the Huns, it is far more important for us to defend our own American civilization against the encroachments of the soviets here at home. A man's life will not be worth a groat in America if we allow this strike mania to encroach upon us further. It is an amazing fact that in view of all that we know, much of which the average American has hidden from his eyes, that only one man in either the Senate or the House of Representatives at Washington has had the courage to stand for untrammeled freedom of thought, action, and purpose, and that man hails from the western part of Texas.

I think we have reached the limit; and while I am absolutely and always a friend to every true laboring man, we have had enough of this strike business, which seems to be epidemic in many sections of the country. There ought to be a getting-off place somewhere, and for my part, I feel that the American people have about reached the terminal station.

On the labor question in general, the late Andrew Carnegie stated some fundamental principles that all of us should always keep in mind. I will not discuss them, for they speak for themselves. I simply quote them as follows:

"Labor, capital, and business ability are the three legs of a three-legged stool; neither is first, neither is second, neither is third; there is no precedence, all being equally necessary. He who would sow discord among them is an enemy to all."

I am for the league of nations and Woodrow Wilson up and down and around and around. There are some things the President has done that I would not have done, I think; but that is no reflection on him. I would never have vetoed that daylight-saving law. This getting up at 3 o'clock in the morning and going to bed before sundown has never appealed to me at all.

J. B. CRANFILL.

[From the Abilene (Tex.) Daily Reporter, p. 2, Aug. 26, 1919.]

PRAISES THE WORK OF CONGRESSMAN THOMAS L. BLANTON.

The following article was furnished the Reporter from Richmond, Va., with the request that it be published:

"As my business requires me to keep close track of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD I have been forced to take notice of the activities and speeches of the Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON. I never met him in my life and am in no way connected with any corporation or political or 'capitalistic' scheme, but I have been impressed by his dauntless and conspicuous courage, his tenacity of purpose, and his foresight. He is so near my idea of what a statesman is and a Member of the House of Representatives ought to be that I am writing this as an outside and impartial observer to try to do a mite toward making sure that the people of his district will keep him in Washington. There are too few of his kind, and the country can not afford to spare any of those few. I do not live in Texas, nor anywhere near it, have never been in the State but three or four times, and probably never have been in his district. This is written without suggestion from or consultation with him or any of his friends—absolutely off my own bat.

"On several occasions I have observed that he stood alone, voted by himself after insisting on a division on some proposition, and with the whole House against him. That may seem to some ridiculous. I confess I admire it. Doubtless to many people the stand at the Alamo and the rush at San Jacinto seemed ridiculous, but the men who stood and the men who rushed live in everlasting glory while millions of the prudent counters of noses and chances are forgotten long ago.

"Judge BLANTON—I see by his speeches and his biography in the Congressional Directory that he is 'Judge'—probably will be fought by organized labor. Any man with the nerve to oppose any of its demands and methods may expect to be fought with all the power of unlimited command of money and of men for open and secret work. He has put himself up as a target and he will be shot at all right. His overthrow would be a warning to all others in politics to grovel and worship before the labor leaders, as most of the politicians of both parties have done. His reelection would be notice that, in Texas at least, courage and independence are honored.

"I am a friend of organized labor—a friend too sincere to applaud its errors or connive at or accept its sins. During the 30 years I was in business for myself, an employer on a small scale, I employed only organized labor, never had a strike or serious dispute, and was an honorary member of the union with which I had to deal. I have aided strikes when I thought they were justified and helped fight them when I believed them to be unjustified, my position in that regard being that of the average unorganized American citizen. In my opinion organized labor is as much a necessity for our time and stage of civilization as combinations of capital or cooperation of churches. It seems to me, however, to be in a transition stage, just about where a big, strong boy is when he feels within him the strength of a full man, but has not learned to realize a man's responsibilities and need for cooperation with other men for the general welfare and his own. All of us know that a boy at that stage is prone to fall into foolishness and devilment, and that sometimes the more virility and ambition he has the worse he is. Most of us have seen young men of that age given too much money or power go straight to destruction and do endless harm. We know, too, that put under vicious or foolish influence and leadership they are likely to go very far wrong and that their most faithful friends are those who advise them against their inclinations and anger them by opposing their progress toward ruin.

"It seems to me that is precisely what Judge BLANTON has been doing. He has been trying consistently to balk the unions in wrongdoing, to prevent them from undertaking to establish in this country a new and dangerous tyranny, to hinder and overthrow the law-defying, unscrupulous, and reckless leaders. Probably three-fourths of the Members of Congress know in their hearts he is right, but few of them have the nerve to stand with him. I confess that plodding, as I have to do, through the pages of debates and speeches, the clear, challenging, bugle-call crow of this Texas gamecock amid the barnyard wheezings and squawkings and quackings of those around him comes as refreshing as martial music. He sounds like somebody looking at the horizon while others scratch for worms and scraps. Almost single handed he exposed and overthrew the money-squandering, humbugging Employment Bureau, and he is now dragging to light the attempts of the Department of Labor to use the United States Government to invade the most sacred rights of the sovereign State of California and rescue a man convicted of the most hideous of murders by thrusting aside the orderly action of the State's courts. Because this attempt was made behind the disguise of organized labor few Members of either House dared condemn or criticize action which ought to set every old-fashioned State rights Democrat afire."

"Crazed by success and the subserviency of politicians, the labor leaders have gone too far. Congress begins to hear now from the 15,000,000 voters on the farms and otherwise outside organized labor that they are tired of being run over and having national policies dictated, at their cost, by the scant 3,000,000 inside the unions—or, rather, by the few hundreds who presume to speak for those 3,000,000 and to hold their votes as trading assets. Judge BLANTON is gaining a good many recruits these days, judging from the reports in the newspapers. A great number of gentlemen are seeing that he has been right all along. This outsider believes the number will increase steadily. I am asking the use of your columns, Mr. Editor, to warn and exhort the people of his district to stand by the Constitution and laws on which our Government and our civilization are founded and by the time-tried and time-honored principles of democracy, and begin to make sure now that Judge BLANTON shall come back by bigger majority than ever, if possible.

"I do not sign this simply because I am not seeking publicity and my name would mean nothing to your constituents. I am just a plain, old-time Democratic citizen and Virginian, dearly loving truth and courage and these United States. You are authorized to give my name—and address, too—to anybody who wants it."

[From the Clyde Enterprise.]

Congressman THOMAS L. BLANTON, of Abilene, is determined that at least a quorum of the Congressmen of the United States shall be on the job at the regular sessions of Congress in Washington. We'll wager dimes against ginger cakes that they are all there on pay day. To solve the problem of quorums we suggest that Congressmen be paid by the day immediately following the daily sessions. No charge is made for this suggestion.

We have tried to tame Representative BLANTON down to the accepted standards of American statesmanship, but in vain. His combination of exuberance, irrepressibility, iconoclasm, waspishness, and all-round obstreperous and impudent disregard of tradition is making him persona non grata in Congress, especially among the herd of logrollers and bunk peddlers who cut their capers far from the eyes of their constituents.

Not one of these men who are incensed at BLANTON would dare to attempt in a State legislature what they actually do in operating these private legislation mills in Washington. The history of private pension legislation during the past 50 years is a reproach to Congress. The reeking dishonesty of tens of thousands of these enactments constituted not only an outrage upon the taxpayers of the United States, but an insult to the heroic and patriotic Union soldiers who served their country with courage and patriotism.

There is no reason why men who even pretend to represent the hard-working people of the American democracy should not attend to the business which they were sent to Washington to transact. It is not unreasonable to expect a quorum to be present at all times Congress is in session, voting away the taxes of the people at the rate of $20,000,000 a day for every day in the year.

There is no reason why every measure carrying an appropriation should not be subjected to more scrutiny than it obtains in committee.

And it is nothing short of a crime the way the great supply bills carrying billions are rammed through the house practically as prepared in the committee, because the Members of the House are given neither the time nor opportunity to examine and discuss them.

The brief period of consideration that ensues when the House is sitting as a Committee of the Whole House, with the raw Members firing their political guns for consumption at home, and filling the RECORD so often with fake speeches, affords no opportunity for investigation of appropriation bills. There could be no more ludicrous travesty upon the solemn function of apportioning the hard-earned tax money of the people to the public service.

The customs, systems, and practices which the execrated BLANTON has denounced have made the American Government the most extravagant, wasteful, and corrupt that ever existed on the face of the earth; they have lowered the tone of American public life and introduced conditions into the lives of the people themselves that constitute already a problem of baffling complexity; and they are directly responsible for an artificiality and shallowness in current political and social ideals that promise no good for the Republic.

If the men on Capitol Hill in Washington can behold no connection between the unrest, discontent, and rebelliousness among the masses and their frivolous sense of responsibility in the matter of expending the taxes of the toilers of the Nation, then they are strangely blind to the "state of the Union" which they periodically consider.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] states that he was elected to Congress by a plurality of 5,037 votes. He might be interested in knowing that with three opponents last year, one an ex-Congressman and the other two State legislators, I received not a plurality but a majority over all three of them of 15,212 votes, defeating ex-Congressman Callaway in his home county—Comanche—by 1,191 votes.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I understand that Oscar Callaway did not in reality make an active campaign. I hope the gentleman will make that clear in fairness to him.

Mr. BLANTON. He made what is called a "pussy-foot campaign" and spoke in the various precincts of his home county. [Laughter.] He started out early in the campaign, when I was here attending to the people's business, as I did not leave here until about a week before the election. He tried to begin speaking in one of my counties, at Gorman, Tex., and he got upon a truck before a lot of my constituents who knew me when I was a judge there, and they advised him that he could not make that kind of a speech there in Gorman, Tex.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] is now serving his fifteenth year in Congress. I am only serving my third year here; yet I challenge each of these gentlemen, since they have expressed violent disapproval of my work in Congress, to show that during their long terms of officeholding either has received more real, bona fide, sincere indorsements sent us by our respective constituents prior to last Friday, when they criticized me, commending us for individual effort exerted in behalf of the beneficial interests of all the people of the United States alike, than I have received this year. Unless they can do this it little becomes them to criticize me and condemn my work and statesmanship when it is approved by the people whom, after all, and not our colleagues, we represent. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] accused me of wasting urgent time in demanding quorums. Last Monday, on page 5061 of the RECORD, appears the following:

Mr. GARD. Is there no further regular business for the day, may I ask?
Mr. LONGWORTH. So far as I am informed, there is no further legislative business for to-day.

The above, Mr. Speaker, occurred exactly at 3.55 o'clock in the afternoon, after which the balance of the session was wasted in partisan political perorations; and it has frequently occurred that at the instance of the majority leader the House has adjourned on Friday afternoon not to meet again until Tuesday noon, which illustrates how much the gentleman was camouflaging when he spoke of wasting time. We have now been in session continuously since May 19, and only two pieces of constructive legislation have been considered.

The time has been wasted with such class legislation as the chemical glass and surgical instrument bills, the tungsten-ore bill, the pearl-button bill, and the zinc-ore bill, considered and passed by a handful of Members present, and designed to take millions of dollars out of the pockets of the poor people of this country and place same in the pockets of multimillionaires. It would have been better for the people had the House not been in session at all. If the gentlemen will look on pages 5048, 5049, and 5050 of last Monday they will learn that in the consideration of important legislation in the House, upon my demanding a division in order to ascertain how many votes we could muster, the various votes stood: Ayes 22, noes 4; ayes 28, noes 2; ayes 12, noes 27, and the bill was finally passed by a vote of ayes 47, noes 0. Do not the gentlemen know that the people of the United States are of the opinion that the above is ridiculous, when there are 435 Members of Congress on the pay roll? And on the adoption of the rule making it in order to consider the measure conferring the rank of Admiral on Admiral Sims and Admiral Benson, deemed so urgently important by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT], page 5051 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for last Monday shows that when I called for a division, again to find out how many votes we could muster in the House on such an important measure, only 53 Members of Congress voted. And page 5059 shows that in finally framing this measure, upon a division, called for by me again to ascertain how many votes we could muster, the vote stood, ayes 77, noes 0; and pages 5059 and 5060 show that when the majority leader and the Republican steering committee was going to let this measure pass by such a little handful of Members I made the point of order that this bill, the first of its kind in the whole history of the United States Republic, conferring the permanent rank of Admiral of the United States Navy upon two individuals, to draw $13,500 each per annum, should be passed by a quorum, and thus forced a roll call, upon which, out of a membership of 435 Congressmen, the vote stood, yeas 345, nays 9, present 1.

I love every one of my colleagues in the House of Representatives, even the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], who presided against me.

Mr. LONGWORTH. What does the gentleman mean by "presiding against"?

Mr. BLANTON. By making side-bar remarks of a reflecting nature, which is wholly unwarranted by any presiding officer.

I even love the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN], who sought by sending these infamous documents to the press to injure my character and reputation, and were his life or the lives of any of my colleagues in danger I would risk my own to protect them.

I feel that it is the disposition on the part of many of the older Members here to be jealous of and resent all attempts of newer Members to take an active part in the proceedings. The gentleman spoke of it when I first came to Congress. I was then given to understand that I was expected to be seen and not heard until I had been here several sessions.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I will have to yield to the good gentleman from Illinois; he is so affable always. [Laughter.]

Mr. JUUL. I thank the gentleman. I want to ask him whether, from the statement he is making here to us, it is likely that Texas will go Democratic at the next election? [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; just as sure as you live. Now, when I was advised that I was expected to be seen and not heard until I had been here several sessions, I said, "To hell with such bunk!" I represent over 300,000 highly intelligent people of the United States. I am their only Representative here. They look to me and depend upon me, whatever my limitations are, and not upon other Congressmen to represent them. I draw just as big a salary as each and all of the other 434 Congressmen draw. I am allotted the same number of garden seeds and cedar chests each session. My people expect me to give them just as much and just as valuable service as any other Congressman renders to his constituents and Nation. And by the eternals, neither the "once over," the "twice over," nor the hundred times the "thrice over" attempted to be administered to me by such gentlemen as the ones from Pennsylvania and Ohio will check or prevent me from at all times making every effort within my power to give my people and country just as valuable service, to the limit of my maximum efforts and limited ability, as that rendered by any other Congressman, from our distinguished Speaker down to the very deserving, excellent, ever-wiggling Republican whip, whom I greatly admire and with whom I rejoice to fraternize. I am not so well endowed with greatness as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT], and am not so renowned as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], I not having the distinction, unfortunately, of being the son-in-law of an ex-President of the United States, but what I lack in ability and renown I try to make up by being present on the floor of the House at all times when public business is being transacted and being ever alert to the interests of my constituents and Nation. I have been present at every roll call during this session of Congress, and have been actively present while all business has been transacted, and to my colleagues who have become angry because I have forced them to attend the House by insisting on a quorum being present, I might say that if they will stay in their seats and furnish a quorum the public business can be attended to without a single point of no quorum being made. My colleagues know that out of over 100 roll calls the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COSTELLO] answered only one. The rules of the House require that all business be transacted by a quorum. The people of the United States are interested in having a quorum present and this rule observed. We have entirely too many committee laws passed, without any consideration or suggestions whatever from the membership of Congress. If Members were permitted to take more part in the proceedings, fewer mistakes would be made and fewer bad laws passed.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me say that I crave the good will, commendation, and friendship of each and every one of my colleagues in this House. But, Mr. Speaker, if by doing my full duty here under my oath to my people I represent, and to my country, according to the lights and dictation of my own conscience, I thus lose the kindly feeling of any or all of my colleagues, I am doomed to such a great sacrifice, as I came here to serve my constituents and my country and not my colleagues, however much I cherish them.

Possibly those whom I have aggrieved will like me better later on. May I remind you of a little true story. When our well-beloved gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] was sheriff there, he arrested an unusually aristocratic, high-toned offender. When the Chinaman who fed the prisoners brought this autocrat his dinner of boiled cabbage and sow-belly, a potato, hunk of corn bread and cup of black coffee, he pushed it aside in disdain, and ordered it taken away. This action seemed to tickle the fancy of the witty oriental, when the following colloquy occurred:

CHINAMAN. Muche good food. You no likee?
AUTOCRAT OFFENDER. No. Damn it, take it away.
CHINAMAN (grinning). Allee righte. Takee away. But maybe-so bye-um-bye you likee.

On his arrival in New York our martial hero of the hour was by Secretary Baker handed his commission as General of the United States Army. In the great ovation which followed, Gen. Pershing handed this valuable commission to his inferior officer, Sergt. Warren Pershing. During the surges of the immense crowd, the general and the sturdy little sergeant became separated. After an anxious hunt the young officer was found, when the following occurred:

Gen. PERSHING. Warren, have you still got the commission?
Sergt. WARREN. Yes; safe and secure, General.
Gen. PERSHING. Warren, see that you hold on to it.

May I say that the commission given me by the people of the seventeenth congressional district of Texas means to me the same thing that this commission of general meant to little Sergt. Warren Pershing—duty. As long as I hold this commission this one word which Gen. Pershing has made synonymous with the United States Army—duty—will ever be paramount with me.

But in conclusion I want to say this to you: If you think we can camouflage the people of this country you are mistaken. They come here and sit in this gallery, and they can see when there are only 25 or 30 men here. I want to say to my good Democratic colleagues and to my Republican colleagues just what my good moose-hunting friend from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] said to you in Republican caucus the other night: God knows you ought to come here and attend to the people's business when you are sent here for that purpose. I thank you. [Applause.]

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from California rise?

Mr. NOLAN. To make a request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on next Tuesday after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table I may have 40 minutes to reply to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] in his statements made here to-day, as well as certain statements that were made in his extension of remarks covering 22 pages of the RECORD recently.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that he may address the House for 40 minutes on next Tuesday immediately after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table. Is there objection?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Reserving the right to object, I would very much regret to be compelled to object to the gentleman's request. The Ways and Means Committee expect to have up on Monday and Tuesday a very important bill to protect the dyestuff industry. Under the arrangement suggested by the gentleman from Wyoming that the House meet at 11 o'clock I have no objection.

Mr. NOLAN. We can get that consent later.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then I withdraw the reservation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege, and I offer a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas presents what he claims to be a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas in the record of the proceedings of the House of Representatives of September 5, 1919, as the same appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, on pages 4942 and 4943, there appears in the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] what purports to be statements made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], as follows, to wit:

"He is mad because I will not permit him to ruthlessly waste and misappropriate the people's money from the Treasury.

"I ask the Chair to keep the gentleman in order without forcing me to continually interrupt him. If he were not protected under the rules of this House, as construed by the present occupant of the chair, he would not dare to thus abuse me. He is now applauded by Members who have in their pockets private bills seeking to take public money out of the Treasury and put it into the pockets of private individuals and corporations without argument and without proper consideration, and they are all mad because I blocked the proceedings. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] imagines that he will injure me with my constituents. He does not know west Texans. They will size up his bunk, and in the next election I will get 10 votes to every 1 he gets.

"The gentleman's statement is untrue. He is mad because I have forced him to come to the House of Representatives occasionally.

"Against such childish abuse repeatedly continued in violation of the Chair's ruling and the rules of this House. The gentleman knows he is not stating the truth, for it was only by such objections that I prevented numerous pernicious and unmeritorious measures from passing, which angered certain friends of such legislation.

"Falsely and wrongly. When he knows he is not stating the truth.

"The gentleman is maliciously and willfully abusing me personally, when he would not dare do it off the floor of the House, and is willfully violating the rules of the House."

And

Whereas the said statements were not, as a matter of fact, made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] upon the floor, but were by him without the knowledge of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT], and without the leave of the House, inserted by interlining the typewritten copy of the stenographer's notes furnished to the Government Printing Office; and

Whereas the greater part of said statements so injected were unparliamentary, out of order, and a violation of the privileges of the House; and if the same had been uttered upon the floor of the House would have been subject to a point of order: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives—

First. That it condemns the said falsification of the records of its proceedings; and

Second. That the said remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] be stricken from the RECORD.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, the youngest Member of the House is familiar with the rules and practices of the House with reference to the revision and extension of remarks in the RECORD; but for the purposes of the RECORD, so that those who read it may understand, I will direct the attention of the House to the method of procedure in such cases. The House has its Official Reporters of Debates—shorthand reporters—who take down in full the utterances of each Member as they are delivered upon the floor. These shorthand reports are transcribed on the typewriter. When any gentleman wishes to revise his remarks he gets the typewritten sheets of the report of the House proceedings before they go to the Printing Office and makes the proper changes. Now, under the rules and practice of the House, when a gentleman makes a speech, or when he makes remarks in the course of debate here upon the floor, he is permitted by common practice to correct any grammatical errors, or, if he thinks proper, he may change the wording so as more clearly to express his thought, but in no instance is he permitted, without the permission of the House, to insert new matter. If he engages in colloquy with another gentleman and then desires to do what I have stated, the rules and practice of the House for obvious reasons require him to submit the proposed changes to the gentleman with whom he engaged in the colloquy. If he wishes to extend his remarks and put anything into the RECORD not spoken on the floor he must get the consent of the House, and give to the House when demanded information as to what he intends to put in the RECORD. I think that is a fair statement of the rules and practice of the House in that regard.

Now, as the resolution recites, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] while the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] had the floor, repeatedly interrupted him. After the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] had been transcribed by the Official Reporters and the typewritten copy made for the Public Printer, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] interlined in certain statements that he interjected into the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania the interlined and objectionable and unparliamentary language which I have set out in the resolution and which the Members may find upon pages 4942 and 4943 of the RECORD of last Friday's proceedings.

It is apparent to every Member of the House that it violates every rule I have recited. In addition to that, the greater part of the language is unparliamentary, it is disorderly, and if the gentleman had seen fit to make the remarks on the floor it is reasonable to suppose that some gentleman, in order to protect the orderly proceedings of the House, would have raised the point of order and moved to have stricken from the RECORD the greater part of the gentleman's remarks.

I think that is a fair recital of the facts. I think if gentlemen will read the RECORD they will see that the great bulk of the remarks are disorderly and calculated to provoke a breach of the good order of the House and destroy the good opinion that people should have for the legislative body.

I want to be fair to the gentleman from Texas, and if he desires to answer or call attention to any error in the matter I will yield to him. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] and reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the RECORD will show that upon certain statements unparliamentary, as the gentleman from Arkansas will admit, being made against me by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT], I raised a point of order. The Chairman presiding sustained my points of order, which, under the practice in all parliamentary bodies, eliminates the objectionable matter. Under all of the rules of parliamentary procedure when a point of order is made against anything and it is sustained, the objectionable matter goes out.

I asked the reporter when the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] came in to give me an opportunity to look at them. I looked at them for the express purpose of seeing whether or not the unparliamentary language had been taken out by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who was a State senator of his State for six long years and who should be familiar with parliamentary usage and practice. The matter had all been gone over by him for correction, and not a single one of the unparliamentary statements, against which I made the point of order and had been sustained by the Chair, had been eliminated from his speech.

I want to say that I want the man here to rise in his seat who will state to this House that he has never made an interlineation in his speech since he has been in Congress without the express permission of the House. Is there a man on the floor of this House who has never made interlineations expressing his sentiments which in the excitement on the floor and the hurry of debate he omitted? If there is such a man, I want to see him rise. I have been told by Members time and again when I have made unanimous-consent requests to extend and revise my remarks, "You have a right to do that anyway; it is only when you go outside and put in extraneous matters not connected with the debate that you want consent of the House."

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Not for a minute; I have only five minutes and I want to continue first. I did not see the record of the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania until late. I had been working all day, had more hard work to do that night, and I worked in my office and at home until past midnight. The remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was brought to me at my home. What was I to do; let these unparliamentary statements that had been objected to by points of order, and on such points of order sustained, remain in the RECORD without any explanation, without any reply, without giving my side of the matter in any way? I leave it to the fairness of my colleagues. I know that some of you now are incensed at me; but you are just men. I am not afraid to leave my case, even though some of you are incensed against me, for your determination. I leave it to you if it was right and just that those remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania should go in without explanation when the Chair had sustained me time and time again, and no change was made in the Chairman's ruling.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. BLANTON. I will yield to the gentleman. Did the gentleman never make an interlineation in his remarks?

Mr. KNUTSON. I never tried to doctor up the RECORD to make myself appear to say something that I never said.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, it illy becomes the gentleman to say that, even in his official Republican capacity on the floor. The argument that the gentleman gives us is not worthy. If he wants to indulge in good argument he must let the facts come out. I was not the one who brought in the abuse; it was started by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. And I will leave it to him, as a legislator, if his remarks were not unparliamentary when he took the floor, protected by the sympathizing Chairman, and he proceeded to abuse me. What was I to do? Well, I could not go out and ram the words down his throat, which I would probably have done in west Texas if a man had said those things to me. [Laughter.] I had to sit here in the House and obey the rules.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have one minute more.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman one minute.

Mr. BLANTON. The Chairman ruled against me; and after we had by unanimous consent gone into the committee to consider only bills not objected to, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] knows that even though we had been in the committee under such a unanimous-consent agreement as that, when the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] stated that it was to consider only bills unobjected to, he ruled that nevertheless we could take them up and consider them; and while I did not agree with him, I obeyed him, because he was my superior officer. Even though I do not agree with my superior officer, I obey him, because I believe in law and order, and I believe in conformity to the rules and regulations.

I leave this matter with my colleagues. I am willing to have my remarks go out; but I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] that he owes it to me and to his colleagues here, even though he is incensed at me because of things he did not like that interfered with his private affairs, to be fair enough to join with me in asking that it all go out. I will shortly retire from the Chamber and not take further part in the discussion and vote on this resolution.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT].

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, how exceedingly fortunate it is for me that I am not within the confines of the great State of Texas, because again I have heard that if I were there this gentleman would ram down my throat the words that I have uttered. In other words, he again addresses this House in the same old style, by saying to a Member of the House of Representatives, "If I disagree with you and you happen to disagree with me, I shall take personal vengeance upon you, and if I can not do it in the House of Representatives or in the District of Columbia, I shall wait until I get in the Lone Star State and meet you there." I do not know that my journeys will ever carry me down there, but if they do I shall be very pleased to recognize the position in which the gentleman is, and take care of myself to the best of my ability, in spite of the threat that he is going to ram the words down my throat.

There is nothing personal in this matter to me, not a particle. When these words were interlarded into the RECORD by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] they must have been so interjected after I had received a copy of the colloquy between us. I received the reporter's transcript at the Burlington Apartments, where I live, early in the evening. I did not change one word or sentence except that I struck out, I think, one short sentence which I though was not grammatical and which was superfluous, and the original transcript will show that. The transcript evidently then was taken to the gentleman from Texas, and the next morning, when it was published, certain gentlemen came to me and called my attention to what was therein stated and asked me to rise and have the RECORD corrected. I then said to those gentlemen, "No, I do not feel like doing that." Why? I said, "To me it is personally of no account whatever what the gentleman does say in regard to me; I do not consider it of sufficient moment to pay any attention to it." Then one of the gentlemen said, "But it is of larger moment than that. While you care nothing about it personally, it is a matter for the House. There has been an evident falsification of the RECORD, and you as the person interested ought to take advantage of the matter and appeal to the House for the correction of the RECORD." Again I said no, that I would not do that. Why? I said then, "The gentleman from Texas might think that I was hounding him, that I was persecuting him, and I do not propose to do that." The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU], and I think the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEE] will corroborate me in every word that I have uttered in regard to this matter.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I give the gentleman two more minutes.

Mr. DEWALT. I shall need a good deal more time than that.

Mr. WINGO. Five minutes.

Mr. DEWALT. Therefore I took no part in this matter whatever. So far as the request and resolution are concerned, I have had absolutely nothing to do with them. The matter is of moment just in this way, and this way only: While my good friend from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], and he now claims to be my good friend—and we will let that go without argument—claims that he has the right to revise remarks after they have been taken down by the Official Reporter, and claims that he has the right to interject therein whatever he pleases, simply because somebody else made unparliamentary remarks, he is not correct from any point of view. Why not? He had the undoubted right at the time I made any unparliamentary remarks to request that they be taken down, and that they then and there be stricken from the RECORD. The attention of the gentleman from Texas was called to that fact by the distinguished gentleman who was then in the chair, Mr. LONGWORTH. He either neglected or refused to avail himself of that privilege. He then took the extraordinary means, the unwarranted means, the unparliamentary method of putting into the RECORD that which he never uttered upon the floor of the House. Why? Does he do that in order to rebuke me? No. Does he do that in order to inform the House of his position? No. He does it more for the purpose, in my judgment, of sending down to his constituents in Texas his version of the affair, and if that sort of thing is to be permitted in the House, then any man at any time can put into the RECORD just what he pleases.

So far as the gentleman from Texas is concerned and his remarks in regard to me, I again repeat that I care very little. So far as the number of friends that he has and the number of friends that I have is concerned, I again care very little. I am glad to know that he has so many and in his estimation I have so few, because I am very frank to say that if my friends were to be judged by the standard of the gentleman from Texas the probabilities are that I would be obliged to recognize them as my enemies instead of my friends. [Applause.]

So far as my service in the State Senate of Pennsylvania is concerned, so far as my record here is concerned, those are matters for your judgment, not for his nor for mine. In the pit of this great House of Representatives every man must stand upon his own feet. It matters little what his record has been back home, it matters less what his record may be in the future. Every tub stands on its own bottom here. It makes no difference whether he was the governor of a State, a State senator or an ex-Senator of the United States, this is a judgment here to be passed by his peers, and upon that judgment I am willing to stand. [Applause.]

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the proper limitations of the privilege of revising one's remarks are well understood by the House, have been well defined by precedents, and were very clearly stated by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO]. Under that privilege one may correct one's grammar, and some of us are wont to do that frequently; one may embellish one's thought somewhat, and some of us are frequently tempted to do so; one may improve the phraseology of debate, and some of us are able to make fairly good speeches in the RECORD by so doing. But, Mr. Speaker, this privilege, so highly prized and of such value to the membership of the House, must be carefully guarded, and clearly under such a privilege one can not be and is not justified in putting into the RECORD statements not uttered on the floor, and particularly such as are of an offensive and personal character. In any event, while there is ground for difference of opinion how much statements made on the floor by a Member in the course of his remarks may be properly edited, there can be no difference of opinion relative to the insertion of statements of an offensive, personal, and unparliamentary character. I think it is very clear to all of us that the gentleman from Texas in revising his remarks violated the rule, and it is the duty of the House, a duty which it owes itself, owes to every Member, to insist upon having those remarks, thus improperly placed in the RECORD, expunged therefrom.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], who has professed love for me, which, even though it sounds somewhat vampish, is nevertheless greatly valued, was certainly in error in two statements: First, that the Chair sustained points of order made by himself during the course of debate the other day, and, second, that the rules of the House provide that where a point of order made against language is sustained, that language, without any further motion, is erased from the RECORD. Now, as a matter of fact, the Chair never once sustained a point of order during that debate made by the gentleman from Texas. The Chair did on several occasions state that, in his judgment, the language of the gentleman from Pennsylvania verged upon the unparliamentary, and cautioned him to proceed in order, but never during the course of debate did the Chair specifically sustain a point of order made by the gentleman from Texas. The Chair came nearer sustaining a point of order in one case than in any other, and I will read:

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I again make the point of order against the language. The gentleman is maliciously and willfully abusing me personally, when he would not dare do it off the floor of the House, and is willfully violating the rules of the House.

This is as it appears in the RECORD, and I desire particularly to draw attention to it:

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas, the Chair thinks, is correct in questioning the language. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is instructed to proceed in order.

Now, what the gentleman from Texas really said was this:

Mr. Chairman, I again make the point of order against the language.

And he stopped there. The Chair thereupon instructed the gentleman from Pennsylvania to proceed in order, but if the gentleman from Texas had said, as in this RECORD he claims to have said but which he did not say as a matter of fact, "the gentleman is maliciously and willfully abusing me personally, and he would not dare do it off the floor of the House, and is willfully violating the rules of the House," if the gentleman from Texas had said that, the Chair, without motion from the floor, would have declared him out of order. [Applause.]

Now, these are the facts of the case. The Chair did not once specifically sustain a point of order made by the gentleman from Texas; and even if he had, the gentleman from Texas knows, or at least ought to know if he pretends to be a parliamentarian, that the mere sustaining by the Chair of his motion would not have stricken out the words from the RECORD. The gentleman knows, or ought to have known, that he had his remedy, to which the Chair later called his attention—that if he objected to any language used by the gentleman from Pennsylvania or anybody else, he had the right to demand that that language should be taken down, but he failed to do it. And the proposition that, having failed to take advantage of his rights, he thereupon had the privilege of interlining the RECORD and putting in things that he never said and which if he had said would have been in strict violation of the rules of this House, causes me to have some opinions which I will not express on the floor of this House. I regret very much that the incident should have to be referred to again. The gentleman from Texas during his speech said something about my presiding "against" him. The Chair, as a matter of fact, was attempting to preserve order under the rules of the House. He agreed with the gentleman from Texas occasionally that the gentleman from Pennsylvania ought to proceed in order, and on other times he believed that the gentleman from Pennsylvania was absolutely in order; and the only thing that the Chair was presiding against, if the Chair could have presided against anything, was the persistent effort on the part of certain gentlemen on this floor to impede the proper transaction of the public business of the House. [Applause.]

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I do not care unnecessarily to delay proceedings. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] desires five minutes and I yield him five minutes of time for debate.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, legislation is rounded by contact with many minds. That is the course of legislation in all assemblies. Men are rounded in the same way. They are rounded by contact with their fellow men, in the association of man with man. In the comradeship of legislative bodies rough edges are worn away; therefore we must view tolerantly things which technically may invade parliamentary rights but are the result of heated debate.

So I address myself now to the good sense of the membership of this House of Representatives. If it may be called speaking on behalf of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], then I speak on his behalf. I was present when this colloquy was had the other day. I had made preparation in regard to a number of these bills on the Private Calendar. I did not approve the objections—made in pique—of the gentleman from Texas to the bills on the Private Calendar. I do not think he should have objected to some of them. I do not think objection should have been made in the way it was made. But there arose this question: A dispute arose on the floor between the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT], who can take care of himself very well, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], and the language used by each of these gentlemen, as the Chairman of the committee said, was perilously near the unparliamentary. This is what the Chairman of the committee said at one time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT]:

The Chair thinks that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is running perilously close to the line, and the Chair will ask him to proceed in order and not to mention gentlemen by name.

Then, again, the Chairman said that he had not ruled directly in favor of the gentleman from Texas. He is in error. On page 4942 it is stated:

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the gentleman, and I ask the Chair to protect me from such abuse. If he can not, then I shall protect myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Texas is right in that last remark, and he will ask the gentleman to proceed in order and not to use language which tends to hold a Member of the House in contempt.

That was the proceeding—two men angry at one another, engaged here in a verbal passage at arms, and neither one following very nicely the parliamentary technique of the books. But that is not a matter which would call the condemnation of the House of Representatives upon either of these gentlemen. The Chair did rule, sometimes in favor of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] and sometimes against him, on his points of order, and the thing did proceed, and reply was made, and in the correction of the record certain matters were interpolated. I grant the interpolations were made substantially as alleged. Probably they should not have been made. They were made, and I have no objection to striking them out; I have no objection, at least, to striking out the greater part of them. In fact, I do not care to analyze what the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] has in his resolution, although I think some of the things here should not be stricken out.

But the gentleman from Arkansas makes the resolution read:

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That it condemns the said falsification of the records of its proceedings.

Now, that is not correct, and I say it not in any offensive sense, but I say it because it was all a matter of running debate; it was a matter of give and take. It is the old passage at arms, and everybody who has been in argument knows that you can not be too thin-skinned in that game. And everybody who asserts a right, everybody who asserts his individual right, knows that he has to bare his breast to the blows of his opponents, and in the game of give-and-take one man is as good as another.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. If I have time, I will yield.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Does the gentleman think there is anything about this game that calls on a man not to be a gentleman or not to be treated as a gentleman in the course of debate?

Mr. GARD. I do not.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. GARD. Therefore, it is my purpose, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, to ask a separation of this resolution. As I say, I realize what was done. This interpolation of language was probably not authorized strictly by the parliamentary rules of the House, and on motion we should strike it out. But I do not go so far as to agree with the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] in his resolution, when he asks the House to condemn the falsification of the RECORD; because, technically, it is not a falsification. It is simply a matter of the conclusion of a running debate here. And when we come to protect the RECORD, if there is any man who can protect the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, he can do something which no man who has ever been in Congress has been able to do, because self-appointed guardians of the RECORD rise and sit down again, and every year somebody tries to forestall the placing in the RECORD of things entirely extrinsic to debate, and every year the same things go rolling in over and over again.

So I submit to the calm judgment, to the serious and best consideration of the membership of this House, that in striking out this unparliamentary language it shall have done its full duty and that it do not act favorably upon this part of the resolution condemning it as "falsification" of the RECORD.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I usually have a very high regard for the logical processes and the reasoning of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD], but candidly upon this occasion I can not grasp his mental processes, when he tells the House, frankly in behalf of the offending Member, that his offense at best is but a technical violation of the rules of the House. I do not know what standard the gentleman has, but I do not regard it as a technical violation of the rules of the House for a gentleman who is engaged in a colloquy with me on this floor, at arm's length, as the gentleman said, with the right to take care of himself, and yet, after the House has adjourned and after the heat and the passion of the moment have died away, goes to his apartment hours after it has passed, and then, after the other man has examined the RECORD and not interlineating anything in it, he himself interlines a charge of falsehood against that man, when he has no opportunity to deny it, and embeds it in the official record of the House of Representatives. If that is a "technical" violation of the rules of the House, tell me what is a serious violation of the rules of the House. But the gentleman overlooks the fact that it is not a question between the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]; it is a question of the integrity of the proceedings of this House.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] can take any course he sees fit to pursue to protect himself in his personal rights; but it has gone beyond that. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] admits that he has falsified the RECORD. He enters a plea of confession and avoidance. What is his plea? His plea is, "Yes; I did it. I did it in the midnight hour. I did it deliberately. I did it because I saw that the other gentleman had left out something. I recalled that I had made a point of order against something."

Ah, the gentleman knew, and he was so advised that day, before he made this interlineation, when he sought to raise the question of personal privilege. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], had told him he had his right, and that was to move to strike out any language that was objectionable. He did not elect to do that. He can not plead ignorance, because he was specifically advised by the gentleman from Ohio as to what his privilege was.

What next? If that had been this situation, instead of "bandying words in the RECORD," as the gentleman from Ohio suggests, with the gentleman, instead of putting things in the RECORD that were insulting and which the ordinary man who reads the RECORD will say were lacking in decency and honor and respect, such as one would naturally look for in the House of Representatives—no man challenges the proposition that what he could have done and should have done would have been to rise in his place the next morning and call attention to the fact that he had made a point of order and that the Chair had sustained it, and yet the objectionable words remained in the RECORD. But he did not do that. The gentleman permitted it to remain in the RECORD.

The gentleman from Texas states that I have waited quite a bit before calling this to the attention of the House. I am not performing this duty of my own volition only, because gentlemen on both sides of the aisle have called my attention to the offense. I do not know why they suggested that I take it up. I raise the question without entertaining any ill feeling for the gentleman. I am jealous of the rules, and I am jealous of the procedure of the House. We all know that the rules of this House, like the rules of conduct that have been recognized between honorable gentlemen, have to a large degree grown out of the experience of those who have gone before us, and when we break down those rules and quietly and sympathetically permit a flagrant violation of them to pass uncondemned it tends to bring disorder in this House and it tends to bring this House into disrepute.

What is the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD]? That we do not condemn it, but that we strike it out? I do not want to vote to strike out anything from the RECORD that I have not the moral courage to condemn by my vote. [Applause.]

There are precedents for this action, although, as has been said by others, there are not many. The House has censured men by condemning them. Is not this a falsification of the RECORD of the most flagrant kind? If the gentleman from Texas had seen fit to make a statement that might merely be questioned, nobody would complain. But I assert that any man who under the claim of revising his remarks inserts insulting language, charging another man with being actuated in his conduct by unworthy and private motives instead of the public good, commits a flagrant breach of the rules. I would rather have applied to me any other epithet on this floor than to be charged with looting the Treasury and voting against the public good for a private gain. [Applause.]

That is the reason why the gentleman from Texas gets letters commendatory of his conduct on this floor. That is the reason why men throughout this land stand up and criticize the House of Representatives, because too often there is disorder here, too often we forget that we here are the Representatives of the greatest people on earth, commissioned with the commission which the gentleman from Texas boasts he is proud of and which we are all proud of, and yet sometimes we forget the dignity and responsibility that go with that position and we do things that bring us into disrepute. I have protested against it with those with whom I have been in colloquy at times and I protest against it now. I would have protested if the offense had come from the gentleman from Pennsylvania and I would have done it if it had come from any gentleman from my own State—to so flagrantly falsify the RECORD, as has been done in this case.

Some gentlemen say this is not objectionable. I submitted it to the Speaker, and he has compared it with the stenographer's notes. The gentleman from Texas does not deny it. He justifies it. The offense was so flagrant; he not only interlined some statements, but he injected something bodily in there where he was not recognized and had not said a word. Do you call that a technical violation of the privileges of this House? Gentlemen, it may be a mere technical violation of propriety to charge a man with falsehood, but it is not so in my country. [Applause.] It is not a technical violation of propriety in west Texas either, and the gentleman from Texas boasts that it is not.

Let us see what kind of a proceeding is the action of the gentleman. Remember it is not what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] said it was—a colloquy on the floor of the House. I grant you, then, that it is primarily the duty of the man engaged in the colloquy to call the other man down. But in this case we had no opportunity to protest against this, because it was not spoken in our presence. It was put in the RECORD without our knowledge and spread to the world without our knowing anything about it.

Let us suppose that down in west Texas, where the gentleman has been a judge—and a man who has been a judge ought to be more cautious and discreet and is to be presumed to have learned something by his experience on the bench—let us suppose that a case had been brought before the gentleman from Texas in Texas, and the custom was there, as in every other jurisdiction, after the conclusion of a case the attorney for the successful litigant prepared the precept for the clerk to write up the judgment. Suppose in the gentleman's court the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] had appeared as the representative of the successful litigant and he had submitted the precept to the opposing counsel and the opposing counsel had O. K.'d it, and he had submitted it to the judge and the judge had O. K.'d it, and then later, in the quiet hours of the night, the gentleman from Ohio had decided that he wanted to put something else into that judgment before it was handed to the clerk to be written up. You know what would happen. The gentleman from Texas would not have waited for the membership of the bar to protest. He would as judge have directed the public prosecutor to file disbarment charges against the lawyer, and I can imagine the gentleman from Texas in his capacity as judge excoriating the culprit as he stood before the bar. You can imagine what that scene would have been. [Applause.] And yet the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] says it is a mere "technical violation." But you can not remedy this by merely striking it out of the permanent RECORD.

I want this House to do one of two things, either condemn this language or else let it stay. As far as I am concerned, if you vote the condemnation of a confessed wrong, I will never do anything more to try to protect the House, and I will tell you what will happen. Zealous men will say, "Oh, well, I can put this in. Maybe I can get by with it. Anyway, all they will do at the most is to strike it out." Let us serve notice on everybody that if a man tampers with the public record of this House by putting disorderly and insulting remarks into the RECORD, after the RECORD is made up and just before it goes to the printer, this House will condemn that conduct. That is what this vote means. On the other hand, if you want to say to every Member who in his zeal may overlook what I do not see how any man can overlook, that he can with impunity falsify the records of this House, then vote to accept the gentleman's proposition. I stand upon the proposition that we must condemn that which is confessed and that which is obviously wrong, and strike the wrongful matter from the RECORD.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLACK. Referring to the words—

Resolved, That it condemns the falsification of the records of its proceedings.

Does not the gentleman think that the word "falsification" is of itself a violation of the rules of the House?

Mr. WINGO. Oh, no. Suppose we bring a man before the bar of the House because he has been guilty of conduct such that we ought to expel him from the House. Suppose we accuse him of having been guilty of larceny; why certainly it is offensive to accuse a man of the thing that he has committed, but if he is guilty of it he ought to be accused. If he is innocent, let him show it. But in this case he confesses that he did the wrong charged, which was a falsification of the solemn written records of this House; and I for one am opposed to sitting quietly by and allowing a Member of this House to do that without condemnation.

Mr. BLACK. Does not the gentleman think it would be better to say that the House condemns the interlineations and additions to the remarks that were made? That, of course, would call attention to the fact that they were interlineations and additions, and would not put us in the attitude of condemning a Member for falsifying.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman from Texas knows I love him, and I can appreciate his viewpoint; but I have studied this matter carefully, and I for one have come to the point where I say the House ought either to assert its rights and condemn this falsification—because that is what it is—or else let the whole thing go, and let down the floodgates and have no protection against this sort of practice.

I move the previous question.

Mr. RUCKER. Before the gentleman moves the previous question I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. WINGO. I withhold the motion and yield to my friend.

The SPEAKER. How much time?

Mr. WINGO. I yield for a question.

Mr. RUCKER. I merely want to ask the gentleman a question. I have listened to the debate and the resolution, and it is not necessary for me to state any views I may have upon it; but I want to submit to the gentleman that some intemperance of language has been manifested here to-day, and some intensity of feeling by gentlemen on both sides of the aisle.

Mr. WINGO. I can not agree with the gentleman. There was no intemperance or intensity of feeling on my part, except the feeling that naturally comes to every honorable man when in the presence of reprehensible conduct.

Mr. RUCKER. A jury in court before passing upon questions so vital to the interests of one of our colleagues would retire for deliberation. The gentleman has invoked court procedure. Let me invoke it and ask him if he does not believe that the House would preserve every one of its rights and protect its records better by a more deliberate course, by moving that a special committee be appointed by the Speaker to consider these various matters and recommend to the House the elimination from the RECORD of such as are bad, and if any of them are not objectionable, leave those alone?

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman overlooks this fact which I call to his attention, that it is confessed that every bit of the language contained in the resolution was deliberately inserted in the RECORD without being spoken and that you can not point to a single bit of it that does not violate the rules of the House; and if it had been spoken on the floor, the Member referred to would have been entitled to call the Member to order for the utterance of such words. If there were anything for a committee to consider I would be in favor of letting them consider it; but the facts being confessed, the only thing for a committee to consider would be whether the House shall protect its rights and the rights of its Members, or whether we will vote—I will not say cowardly—whether we will vote to let the whole thing go and have no protection against such practices.

Mr. RUCKER. But consideration by the committee would be deliberate consideration by gentlemen chosen from both sides of the aisle, who would report back to the House their recommendation for its approval or disapproval.

Mr. WINGO. If there were denial of the facts, if there were any dispute about a question of fact, then I would want it to go to a committee; but there is not a dispute about a single question of fact. It is a question whether or not gentlemen are willing to condemn a confessed wrong that upon its face is a violation of the privileges of the House and a falsification of its records. That is the only question for gentlemen to vote upon.

Mr. RUCKER. Every gentleman is not as well acquainted with parliamentary law as is the gentleman who has the floor, and I suggest that to the gentleman as being the more deliberate course, and I believe the wiser course for the House to pursue.

Mr. WINGO. I move the previous question.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Will it be in order to offer an amendment?

The SPEAKER. It will, if the previous question is not ordered.

Mr. BLACK. Then I ask to be recognized to offer an amendment now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas has moved the previous question, and he is entitled to the floor. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, may we have the resolution reported?

Mr. GARD. I ask for a separate vote on each of the two subdivisions of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resolution will be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas in the record of the proceedings of the House of Representatives of September 5, 1919, as the same appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, on pages 4942 and 4943, there appears in the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] what purports to be statements made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], as follows, to wit:

"He is mad because I will not permit him to ruthlessly waste and misappropriate the people's money from the Treasury."

"I ask the Crair to keep the gentleman in order without forcing me to continually interrupt him. If he were not protected under the rules of this House, as construed by the present occupant of the chair, he would not dare to thus abuse me. He is now applauded by Members who have in their pockets private bills seeking to take public money out of the Treasury and put it into the pockets of private individuals and corporations without argument and without proper consideration, and they are all mad because I blocked the proceedings. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] imagines that he will injure me with my constituents. He does not know west Texans. They will size up his bunk, and in the next election I will get 10 votes to every 1 he gets."

"The gentleman's statement is untrue. He is mad because I have forced him to come to the House of Representatives occasionally."

"Against such childish abuse repeatedly continued in violation of the Chair's ruling and the rules of this House. The gentleman knows he is not stating the truth, for it was only by such objections that I prevented numerous pernicious and unmeritorious measures from passing, which angered certain friends of such legislation."

"Falsely and wrongly." "When he knows he is not stating the truth."

"The gentleman is maliciously and willfully abusing me personally when he would not dare do it off the floor of the House, and is willfully violating the rules of the House."

And

Whereas the said statements were not, as a matter of fact, made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] upon the floor, but were by him, without the knowledge of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT], and without the leave of the House, inserted by interlining the typewritten copy of the stenographer's notes furnished to the Government Printing Office; and

Whereas the greater part of said statements so injected were unparliamentary, out of order, and a violation of the privileges of the House, and if the same had been uttered upon the floor of the House would have been subject to a point of order: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives—

First. That it condemns the said falsification of the records of its proceedings; and,

Second. That the said remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] be stricken from the RECORD.

Mr. GARD. I ask for a separate vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands a division of the resolution.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I make the point of order that the two questions are not separable, that this is one resolution, and that the proper way to have accomplished what the gentleman from Ohio now seeks to accomplish would have been by amendment; that no such amendment was offered, and that the gentleman's request comes too late. I make the point of order that the vote must be had on the entire resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is disposed to think that this resolution is fairly divisible, that it presents two separate questions, each of which by itself would offer a distinct subject on which the House could vote, and that the House can properly have a division. Therefore the vote will come on the first proposition, which, without objection, the Clerk will report.

The Clerks read as follows:

First, that it condemns the said falsification of the record of its proceedings.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the second proposition, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Second, that the said remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] be stricken from the RECORD.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. WINGO, a motion to reconsider the two votes just taken were, upon his motion, laid on the table.

APPOINTMENT OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 270.

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the House of Representatives the following facts:

1. List of vacancies occurring in the position of postmaster at offices of the first, second, or third classes as the result of death, resignation, removal, or on the recommendation of the First Assistant Postmaster General, approved by the Postmaster General, to the effect that the efficiency or needs of the service requires that a change shall be made, since March 31, 1917, being the date of the Executive order directing the Postmaster General to submit to the President the name of the highest-qualified eligible for appointment as certified by the United States Civil Service Commission, and dates when such vacancies occurred.

2. List of such vacancies certified by the Postmaster General to the Civil Service Commission, in accordance with Executive order of March 31, 1917, and date of such certifications.

3. List of certifications of the result of examinations held to fill such vacancies by the Civil Service Commission, in accordance with said Executive order, and the dates when such certifications were received.

4. List of names and the offices to be filled submitted by the Postmaster General to the President, in accordance with Executive order of March 31, 1917.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this inquiry is to ascertain how widespread throughout the country is a condition that is detrimental to the efficiency of the Post Office Department, and which is the result of the willful and contumacious refusal of the Postmaster General to obey the order of the President of the United States.

On the 31st of March, 1917, the President of the United States promulgated the following order:

EXECUTIVE ORDER.

Hereafter when a vacancy occurs in the position of postmaster of any office for the first, second, or third class as the result of death, resignation, removal, or, on the recommendation of the First Assistant Postmaster General, approved by the Postmaster General, to the effect that the efficiency or needs of the service requires that a change shall be made, the Postmaster General shall certify the fact to the commission, which shall forthwith hold an open competitive examination to test the fitness of applicants to fill such vacancy, and when such examination has been held and the papers in connection therewith have been rated, the said commission shall certify the result thereof to the Postmaster General, who shall submit to the President the name of the highest qualified eligible for appointment to fill such vacancy unless it is established that the character or residence of such applicant disqualifies him for appointment. No person who has passed his sixty-fifth birthday shall be given the examination herein provided for.

WOODROW WILSON.

Dated March 31, 1917.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the purport of this order is that wherever by reason of death, resignation or removal, a vacancy is to be filled in the post office of first, second, and third class postmasters, the vacancies shall be certified to the Civil Service Commission, who after examination make up a list of eligibles. And it is mandatory on the Postmaster General to submit for appointment the name of the highest applicant, unless by reason of his residence or personal character he is disqualified. The order places it under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission to conduct examinations and make the ratings. It makes it mandatory on the Postmaster General to submit the highest name on that list for appointment.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. There has been a number of examinations in my district and I want to ask the gentleman whether or not there is any testimony before his committee where the Postmaster General appointed anyone who did not receive the highest rating of the Civil Service Commission, unless there was some question of loyalty or residence.

Mr. LEHLBACH. As a permanent appointment? I know of no such case where a permanent appointment has been made in violation of this order. Nor do I know of any instance where the appointment has been made in compliance with this order, and as a result there are hundreds of post offices now in charge of men not qualified to act as postmasters and not appointed as such throughout the country.

Mr. RAKER. Would not the gentleman amplify his last statement? I do not get it.

Mr. LEHLBACH. It is my purpose in taking the floor to amplify the situation under the facts disclosed in the committee.

Mr. RAKER. I will not take the gentleman's time, then, but it was my observation that in my district in every instance the man who stands highest in examination has got the office, and I wondered whether or not it was different in other districts.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. I understood the gentleman to say to the gentleman from California that he did not know of any case where a permanent appointment had been made in accordance with the Executive order of the President.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Oh, there are probably a few, but very few, scattered throughout the country.

Mr. RUCKER. In Brookfield, in Missouri, one of the best offices in my district, for a second-class office there were 10 applicants. Eight were Democrats and two were Republicans. One of the most cantankerous Republicans in that bailiwick made the highest rating. I fought him for years, but to-day he holds the postmastership under the appointment of President Wilson.

Mr. LEHLBACH. There are 10 vacancies in the State of New Jersey that have not been filled, where the offices are being administered by appointees of bondsmen of deceased postmasters.

Mr. RUCKER. For a number of years in my district, where vacancies have occurred since the order of the President, the appointment has been made in strict conformity with the order.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. I have an office in my district where it has been about 16 or 18 months since the examination was held, and the man who stands at the head of the list I have tried to get appointed. I have been told, I think by the First Assistant, that he would send in the name immediately, but "immediately" has never come up to the present date, and, as I said, I have done my best to get the man appointed.

Mr. RUBEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. RUBEY. The gentleman says he has no knowledge or no knowledge has come to his committee of any appointment having been made in accordance with the order.

Mr. LEHLBACH. May I interrupt the gentleman? The resolution of inquiry is for the purpose of inquiring where such appointments have been made, and there is no use in the gentleman taking up time in pointing out specific instances.

Mr. RUBEY. Let me give the gentleman three instances that occurred in my district. There are only three vacancies that have occurred there, presidential postmasters, and in each and every one of these cases the highest man has been appointed, and in each and every one of these cases the high man has been a Republican. As far as I am concerned, I do not object to the gentleman's getting the information, and I hope that it will result in getting rid of that sort of an order issued by our President. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, that the Postmaster General himself admits that he has no jurisdiction in revising the ratings made by the United States Civil Service Commission, and that the order to submit for appointment the highest man on the list is mandatory, is shown by a letter addressed to me by the Postmaster General under date of August 4, which I will read:

DEAR MR. LEHLBACH: This is to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of July 31, relating to the postmastership at Cedar Grove, N. J. The postmaster at Cedar Grove, as you no doubt know, died on July 17, and the Civil Service Commission will, in due time, give out at that office information regarding the examination which it will hold for the vacancy in the postmastership at that place; and upon receipt of a certification a postmaster will be appointed as required by the terms of the Executive order of March 31, 1917. Of course, in order to receive the appointment Mrs. Cowie will have to qualify and be first on the list of eligibles certified by the Civil Service Commission.

That is an acknowledgment that the Executive order necessitates a rating by the Civil Service Commission, and that the rating is binding, and that the submission of the name is mandatory upon the Postmaster General.

The Postmaster General is considering a vacancy in the post office in the city of Newark, in New Jersey, in my congressional district, and it is because of my knowledge of that situation that I was prompted to call the matter to the attention of my committee, and it is that which has prompted me to introduce this resolution of inquiry. The postmaster at Newark died on May 1, 1918. At the request of his bondsman, who went surety, his son, John F. Sinnott, was appointed temporary administrator of that office. The Civil Service Commission was notified of the vacancy, held an examination, and on February 17, 1919, certified a list of eligibles, with their ratings, to the Postmaster General. The list read as follows:

Frank J. Bock, 75; Charles A. Entemann, 74.40; Elwood S. Armitage, 74; John F. Sinnott, jr., the representative of his father's bondsman, who is at present temporarily in the office, 70.00—

The fourth man on the list.

From that time to this, although the order is plain, the Postmaster General has refused to submit the name of F. J. Bock for appointment. There is no question as to his eligibility, because he served a full term as postmaster in the city of Newark, the latter part of which was under the administration of Woodrow Wilson himself. The Postmaster General in writing to me in reference to the Newark situation, under date of August 23, 1919, said:

It is also contended by the First Assistant Postmaster General that the rating given Mr. Bock and Mr. Entemann do not accord with the papers on file in this case. Mr. Bock has a business rating of 75, which seems to have been given to him on the ground that he was formerly postmaster, and without any attempt to establish whether he personally discharged the duties of his position at that time, or whether the condition of the Newark post office was due to any work on his part. At the same time Mr. Charles A. Entemann, who has been post-office inspector for 24 years and is capable and efficient, was given a business rating by the commission of only 75, notwithstanding the fact that he was Mr. Bock's superior officer and had charge of the post offices of the district in which Newark is located.

In the judgment of the First Assistant Postmaster General—

In his judgment, mind you!—

these ratings can not be reconciled, and when attempting to secure the most competent for the position of postmaster to appoint one * * * who in the judgment of the department is not entitled to the highest rating would be to defeat the purposes for which the Executive order was issued. This matter has been taken up by the First Assistant Postmaster General in personal discussions with the commission, but they have adhered to their original ratings.

This is the situation. If the ratings fixed by the United States Civil Service Commission do not suit the Postmaster General, he submits them for rerating to the Civil Service Commission, and if the Civil Service Commission has the temerity to insist upon its ratings, he refuses to carry out the Executive order and submit the highest name on that list for appointment—in direct violation of the Executive order. That he knows that that course is wrong is shown in a statement which he issued on September 9, 1919, a copy of which was sent me by special messenger. I read a paragraph from this statement by the Postmaster General:

At no time has the Postmaster General addressed a communication to the Civil Service Commission with a view of improperly controlling a post-office appointment, and the Postmaster General has at no time spoken to the members of the commission with a purpose to control their action in filling a post-office vacancy.

Mr. Burleson solemnly in writing gives out that statement to the public and writes at the same time under date of August 23 with regard to the appointment of the Newark postmaster:

This matter has been taken up by the First Assistant Postmaster General in personal discussions with the commission, but they have adhered to their original ratings.

Therefore, this statement is deliberately, unqualifiedly false, that he has not taken up or his department has not taken up with the Civil Service Commission these ratings of prospective postmasters with a view of getting them to change them, to suit the views, convenience, and desires of the Post Office Department.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I understood the gentleman to read that the Postmaster General said that he had never taken this matter up with the Civil Service Commission with the idea of controlling or influencing their action.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Correct.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Does he state there in his letter to the gentleman that the First Assistant was discussing these matters with the Civil Service Commission for the purpose of controlling or influencing their action?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Exactly.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Read that part of it again, will you?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I have read, as the gentleman will recall, a long dissertation as to the respective ratings that ought to be given from business experience to Mr. Bock and Mr. Entemann. Bock got 75 and Entemann got 75. Still it was supposed that Entemann, being the post-office inspector at Newark, would rank Bock as his superior and therefore should have the highest rating. That is the subject matter that immediately precedes:

This matter has been taken up by the First Assistant Postmaster General in personal discussions with the commission, but they have adhered to their original rating.

Now, if that does not mean that this matter was taken up with a view of having them change their rating, I do not know what English means.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. But it does not say that; that is the gentleman's construction.

Mr. LEHLBACH. It does say that this matter has been discussed with the commission and they have adhered to their rating. Now, if the intention was not to make them change their rating, what was it? But it states that they have adhered to the rating notwithstanding our discussion with them.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Might not the discussion have been to the effect that the Post Office Department conceived that there had been too much percentage allowed one man for business reasons and not allowed another? Would the gentleman construe that to mean an attempt improperly to influence the commission?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I submit that the language of the Executive order is plain and instructs the Postmaster General with respect to the fact that the Civil Service Commission has sole and exclusive jurisdiction to make these ratings, and it is not within his province to make suggestions as to changes or criticisms of them at all. He is absolutely bound by them. He has no deliberative function and must take the persons as named by them.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Once more will the gentleman pardon me?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The gentleman's contention is that whenever they are examined under presidential order it is the duty of the Postmaster General to see that the high man is appointed?

Mr. LEHLBACH. That is the plain language of the Executive order. I am not discussing the merits of that order, but I say that is what the order is.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Suppose it should appear that the highest man according to the rating was of unfit character?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Oh, that is provided for in the Executive order.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Would the gentleman think that the Post Office Department, although that fact was known to them, should appoint that man anyhow, because the commission——

Mr. LEHLBACH. No; that is provided for in the Executive order. I have not the Executive order here; some one seems to have carried it off; but it says that unless said applicant is disqualified by reason of residence or character. Now, it is not alleged in this case, or in any other case that I know of, where the appointment is held up that there is anything against the personal character of the highest applicant.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. But this I want to call to the attention of the gentleman, because I understand he is taking the position that whenever an examination was held it was the duty of the Post Office Department to see that the high man was appointed.

Mr. LEHLBACH. It is, unless they know something against the personal character or if he is a nonresident of the postal district.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. They investigate that feature of it.

Mr. BRAND. Will the gentleman yield for a question for information?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. BRAND. Considering the question of character and residence, can the gentleman name a single case since that order was promulgated where the applicant who received the highest rating was turned down and it was given to one who did not receive the highest rating?

Mr. LEHLBACH. No; I do not say that in any case somebody else received the permanent appointment; but I do say that wherever the highest eligible under the civil service did not suit the Postmaster General he ignored the order and has made no appointment. As an illustration, the city of Newark, with a population of over 400,000, with a post office that pays $6,000 a year, has been without a permanent administrator of that office for one and a half years, a condition which makes for inefficiency in the service; a condition which the people of Newark are not entitled to have foisted upon them.

Mr. BRAND. I am not approving of that kind of postal procedure, but I have been told time and again at the department that the highest rating, whether it be a Democrat or a Republican, gets the appointment if there is nothing against his character.

Mr. LEHLBACH. My committee will know more when we receive an answer to this inquiry; but the informal information is that in a vast majority of instances when vacancies have occurred since March 31, 1917, the highest eligible has not received the appointment.

Mr. BRAND. The gentleman means by that there was no appointment made?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Where they can not appoint whom they like—some one who is satisfactory to the Post Office Department.

Mr. LUFKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I will.

Mr. LUFKIN. Has the gentleman any information with reference to the delay in the appointment of the postmaster at Boston?

Mr. LEHLBACH. It is in the same category with that of Newark, N. J.—the highest eligible does not suit, and therefore he refused to make the appointment. The office is being administered by the representative of the surety company which went on the deceased postmaster's bond.

Mr. LUFKIN. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that at Boston the postmaster died nearly a year ago; that an examination was subsequently ordered and held. There were something like from 15 to 18 people who entered to take the examination, but up to date no appointment has been made, and the newspapers have announced again and again that the papers were being reexamined and being revised. But the current report is that the three highest men, as the result of that examination, were all prominent Republicans in Boston, and the office is still vacant.

Mr. LEHLBACH. That is the information that comes to the committee and which we seek to have in official form by means of this resolution.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I will.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is this whole hullabaloo based on the one case up there in Newark?

Mr. LEHLBACH. No; there are 10 similar cases in New Jersey, and there is a case in Boston, Mass. The public press has stated the fact that there are over 200 such vacancies that are unfilled throughout the country, and as a result of the refusal to carry out the President's order by the Postmaster General we have a disrupted Civil Service Commission.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Another thing. Suppose you get this information, what are you going to do with it when you get it?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Well, we will cross the bridge when we get to it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You will cross it some time when you know what you are going to do.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Would not that depend somewhat on what the information discloses?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not know whether it would or not.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I think it would; and therefore we will consider, when we get the information, what course we ought to suggest to the House, if any.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask you another question.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Surely.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does not the gentleman know that the practice of the Post Office Department, right or wrong, is that where a man has discharged the duties of a postmaster acceptably he is reappointed in a kind of an automatic way?

Mr. LEHLBACH. This does not include reappointments at all. This is only where vacancies occur that are not to be filled by reappointment—either death, resignation, or removal for cause, or at the expiration of a term when it is deemed inexpedient to make the reappointment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is this man who is acting as postmaster ad interim up there at Newark making a good officer?

Mr. LEHLBACH. There is no question about the manner in which he is filling the office; nor is there a question as to his personal character; nor is there any dissatisfaction amongst the people of Newark. I am very glad to say that for him.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The whole thing resolves itself in the fact that a postmaster has not been appointed at Newark?

Mr. LEHLBACH. If the gentleman will permit, I will read what former Civil Service Commissioner Galloway said the other day:

> My resignation was forced because I would not cooperate with Postmaster General Burleson in debauching the civil service and making a sham of the merit system. Herman W. Craven, the Republican member, and I, a Democrat, were ousted from the commission because we were not willing that the commission should be a mere adjunct of the Post Office Department and subservient to it, especially with reference to the examinations for presidential postmasters under the Executive order of March 31, 1917.

Now, there is Democratic testimony from an official source as to why it is expedient or proper to get the information with regard to this deplorable situation throughout the entire country, and not at Newark alone.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is not that exactly the same kind of a squeal everybody puts up who is forced from the public trough?

Mr. LEHLBACH. If the gentleman will allow me, I will answer him in this way:

If this order has been reasonably carried out and if appointments have been made in accordance with the directions of the President, and the information received in response to this resolution so shows it, nobody will be harmed. If, on the other hand, it is a fact that the Postmaster General has debauched the service under him in violation and in contumacious insubordination to the President's order, for the purpose of playing politics, it is highly important the House should know it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the gentleman will permit me, I will state to him that this order has been enforced all over Missouri, which is considerable of a State, and Republicans have gotten into some of those places. I lost 16 votes at one small polling place because they put a Republican in, and lost 8 at another, and the truth is that order you are jumping on gave you this House and gave you the Senate [applause on the Democratic side], and instead of bullyragging Burleson for the order you ought to thank God for it.

Mr. LEHLBACH. If this were followed more strictly, we ought to have more in the Senate and in the House.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You ought to run the thing with some sense.

Mr. EMERSON and Mr. BEE rose.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EMERSON] first.

Mr. EMERSON. Under what rule of law, or why, do you appoint an administrator of these postmasters?

Mr. LEHLBACH. The bondsmen of a deceased postmaster have the right to suggest to the office the name of some one to administer the affairs of the deceased postmaster and protect their financial interests, and if the intermediary is acceptable, he is appointed until a permanent postmaster can take charge, but it is not contemplated that such a representative of the bondsmen shall administer the office for a year and a half, as is the case in the city of Newark.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEE].

Mr. BEE. I understand the gentleman's contention to be that the Postmaster General in not following this order of the President is disobeying the civil-service act?

Mr. LEHLBACH. In not submitting for appointment the highest names on the civil-service list.

Mr. BEE. Let me then ask the gentleman this question: In case your party should come into power completely, and I should be in Congress when the gentleman wants a postmaster appointed by the Republican President, will you ask to have your remarks on this occasion expunged?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I will not.

Mr. BRAND. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. BRAND. Is it not the rule of the Post Office Department in these appointments and filling of various vacancies in first, second, and third class post offices throughout the Nation to send them in only twice a pear, on the 1st of January and on the 1st of July?

Mr. LEHLBACH. No; it is not.

Mr. BRAND. Whenever there is a vacancy——

Mr. LEHLBACH. That applies to reappointments, I will tell the gentleman.

Mr. BRAND. Is it not also true that when there is a vacancy by death or resignation that the bondsmen select a man temporarily until a permanent one is appointed, and that the permanent appointment is not sent in until the 1st of January or the 1st of July?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Not necessarily, but his name is certainly submitted for appointment by the President.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman has before him the Executive order. Will he read that part of it that contains the exception? Then I want to ask him a question.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes. "Unless it is established that the character or the residence of such applicant disqualifies him for the appointment."

Mr. RAKER. Does the gentleman construe that, or does the Civil Service Commission construe it, solely and entirely as to the personal character of the man, or does it relate to his character as to business qualities as well as mental and moral qualities?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Certainly, it refers only to his personal character. Otherwise it makes a nullity of the preceding part of the order, which says that the technical fitness of the applicant should be determined by the examination of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. KREIDER. The civil-service examination has nothing to do with the character, because that is the only basis on which they can avoid appointing the highest rated man. The civil-service examination is supposed to be entirely free of politics. I was very glad to hear the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] state that so many men making the highest marks in the examination out in his district and State were Republicans. It only confirms my opinion of the intelligence of the Missourians, whom I have always held in high esteem. It shows how difficult it is for our Democratic friends to find Democrats that can pass these examinations. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. RAKER. That is hardly a fair question. We do not want to discuss that now.

Mr. KREIDER. I find it so in my county and in my town. They told me they could appoint one of three applicants. They delayed the matter until nearly two years had passed, and then they appointed a Republican because they had no Democrats in the town who could pass the examination. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, permit me to say to the House that there may be other legislation pending. I would like to cut this short, if possible, but I will yield for a question or two.

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. WELTY. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KREIDER] whether the examiners were not Republicans instead of Democrats?

Mr. KREIDER. Certainly, because it takes intelligent men. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. RAKER. I want to ask the gentleman a specific question on this matter.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Very well.

Mr. RAKER. It has been a question in my mind. The department, so far as my information has gone, has appointed the highest man, provided the character, business, and residence, and otherwise was all right. This does not say "personal character," so far as morals are concerned.

I want to ask the gentleman if it is not a fair interpretation that, notwithstanding the report of the Civil Service Commission, it may be ascertained whether the business character of the man is absolutely unfit for him to fill the position, and it ought to be the duty of the Postmaster General to ascertain as a matter of fact when the business character of the man is not such that he can do the work. Does not the gentleman believe that?

Mr. LEHLBACH. The gentleman addresses that question to my judgment, and I say unqualifiedly that it does not apply to his business capacity or business history or business qualification. It is his personal and moral character, simply and solely.

Mr. RAKER. Very well. I think it ought to come out here. What percentage in the rating does the Civil Service Commission give to a man's business experience?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Business experience 80 per cent, education 20 per cent, are the weights given to the two subjects broadly dealt with in the examination.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a short question as to the examination?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Does not that leave it practically to the arbitrary opinion of the examiners as to who should be placed first?

Mr. LEHLBACH. That is where the President's order leaves it. The gentleman is quarreling with the President's order if he does not like that feature of it.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I may say I have that quarrel, but I ask this question in order to elicit information. Does not the gentleman know that the examiners, all of them, with but one exception, are Republicans?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I can only answer that by saying that if toward the close of the second administration of the party in power they still have in inferior positions men who do not properly fulfill the duties of their offices and perform those duties to the detriment of the political welfare of the administration, it is a pitifully weak administration. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I will ask you if it is not a fact, and if that situation does not disclose it, that the Civil Service Commission had all been Republicanized before the Democratic administration came into power, and instead of a Democratic administration having done anything, as charged, to debauch the Civil Service Commission, the situation that still exists at the end of six years of the party in power shows that they have not even protected their own party by having any members of it placed in these positions?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I will answer that by saying that if the situation exists, as the gentleman suggests, it is plainly the province of the President to revoke the order by which such system is carried on under this administration.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman believe that in case his party should succeed in electing the next President one of the first official acts he would perform would be to annul that order?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I would say that if the President still adheres to this order, he has a contumacious Postmaster General whom he ought to discipline. On the other hand, if the President does not approve the order, he ought to be man enough to rescind it. That is the logic of the situation.

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. WELTY. Suppose there are three candidates for a post office; one is a rural mail carrier and another a clerk in the office at $45 a month; another one has been at the head of a large business concern for 10 years, and then the examiner—and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KREIDER] says they have intelligent examiners—the examiner says that the $45 man is eligible. Do you say that the commissioners should accept a conclusion of that kind?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I say that the Executive order of the President demands that the Postmaster General accept that conclusion. If you do not like the conclusion the order should be annulled.

Mr. WELTY. If the examiners are Republicans and they tried to get a Republican in who had not the necessary education?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Anybody who is guilty of malfeasance in office can be removed and should be removed at an instant's notice.

Mr. WELTY. Why not investigate the Civil Service Commission instead of the Post Office Department?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Because the Civil Service Commission is not in conflict with this order, while the Postmaster General is.

Mr. WELTY. Of course they can pass upon these facts, and then they can say a man is intelligent because of those things.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to transgress upon the time of the House longer, and unless some gentleman desires to have time I will move the previous question.

Mr. RUCKER. I should like to have five minutes.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Will my colleague yield to me for a question?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I will yield for a short question, and then I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] five minutes; and then, in deference to the expressed wish of a good many Members who desire to consider important legislation, I think I ought to move the previous question.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. The gentleman has stated, as I understood him, that acting postmasters are named by the bondsmen.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Is the bondsman very often a New York corporation?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. If the bondsman for a Missouri postmaster is a New York City corporation, that means that the acting postmaster in that Missouri post office is named by that New York corporation, does it?

Mr. LEHLBACH. The corporation has the right to do that subject to the approval of the Post Office Department.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. I should like to ask the gentleman from New Jersey whether it is his intention to move the previous question upon the conclusion of his remarks?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I just stated that if anyone wished me to yield him time I would be glad to yield time before moving the previous question; but I also stated that it was the desire of a good many Members of the House to consider important legislation, and I would not like to trespass too much on the time of the House. Of course, I will yield time to the gentleman if he desires it.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. I wish to state that just a few gentlemen on this side have asked for time.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the Chair inform me how much time I have remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 20 minutes remaining.

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. I suggest to the gentleman that he reserve 10 or 15 minutes for Members on this side who desire to speak.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I will do this, if it is agreeable: I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. GODWIN], ranking minority member of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FAIRFIELD], the ranking Republican member of the committee, and five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], who was first to request time; and at the conclusion I will reserve five minutes for myself, which I probably will not use, and then at the conclusion of the time will move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman first yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, during the course of the remarks of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] he used the term "contumacious" three different times with reference to the Postmaster General. If the Postmaster General is contumacious and willful in his disobedience of the President's order, that is a trouble of ours that the gentleman need not worry himself about. The gentleman a few moments ago made the statement plainly, as I understood him, that up to date his committee has no information that the Postmaster General in a single instance had conformed to the plain requirement of the President's order. I called his attention to one instance; my colleague, ex-Speaker CLARK, called his attention to others; my colleague, Mr. RUBEY, to other instances in which the Executive order has been literally obeyed; and I assume that this is true in every State in the land. But I want to say to the gentleman that if he means to denounce Gen. Burleson as guilty of "contumacious" conduct in putting off until the last hour the appointment of a Republican postmaster under a Democratic administration, then I for one applaud his act in doing it. If I were the Postmaster General I would put it off in every case until the 3d day of March after a Republican had been previously elected President before I would appoint a single darned Republican postmaster of any city in this country. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. Make it short.

Mr. LEHLBACH. To the detriment of the Postal Service——

Mr. RUCKER. Oh, no, no; of course not.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Does the gentleman think that a surety company in New York City is the best judge of who ought to be postmaster in a post office in Indiana?

Mr. RUCKER. No.

Mr. LEHLBACH. That is the result when the Postmaster General refuses to comply with the President's order.

Mr. RUCKER. Make your complaint against the acting postmaster, if you have cause for complaint. Let me say to you that in my district, in one of the best towns in it—and no gentleman will accuse me of harshness, because if there be any place under the shining sun where really good Republicans live, it is in my district. I eat with them. I visit in their homes. They are my friends, and I am proud of them, but every one of them knows that I am a Democrat and that I believe, the President's Executive order to the contrary notwithstanding, that under a Democratic administration we ought to have Democratic Federal officers; and, if I had the power, there never would be a Republican postmaster in Newark, N. J., but your postmaster there would be a Democrat of the most pronounced type—so pronounced that the gentleman [Mr. LEHLBACH] would not want to see him there. [Laughter.] Of all the President's official acts—most of which I applaud and approve—the only one I disapprove is his action in issuing that abominable order that you civil-service advocates have led him to issue.

I have protested against it, and protest against it now, and so far as I am concerned I would never willingly render obedience to it. I only submit to it because I have to. Gentlemen congratulate themselves that in my district and in the district of my friend CLARK and in the district of my friend RUBEY Republicans make the highest grades. But oh, my Lord, let me tell you there is something in it, gentlemen, and every one of you on the Republican side knows there is something in the fact that most of the inspectors are Republicans. Even my good friend, my genial young friend from Illinois, Uncle JOE, knows that it means something in this day and hour to be a Republican post-office inspector. Does it not, Uncle JOE? It means a whole lot.

Mr. CANNON. I do not think there are any in my district.

Mr. RUCKER. Oh, there is no occasion for them to go into your district.

Mr. CANNON. I am not kicking about the postmasters in my district.

Mr. RUCKER. Of course you are not. You are too loyal a partisan Republican to kick against it, because you are getting the benefit of the President's order. These men who go over the country inspecting and examining the qualifications of postmasters—every devil of them is a Republican. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I want to talk about five minutes more; this is the first chance I have had to speak on this subject.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I only have five minutes, and I have reserved that for myself.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes without taking it out of the time of the gentleman from New Jersey.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see how that can be done.

Mr. RUCKER. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New Jersey be extended 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New Jersey be extended 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUCKER. Now, will the gentleman give me five minutes?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I have 15 minutes remaining, then, and I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. RUCKER. In the city in my district to which I have referred there were several applicants. One of them started out in life as a school-teacher, and he taught three or four sessions of a district school, then served for a time as city mail carrier, then for several years as clerk in the post office. That was his business experience. Against him was a man who served as a school-teacher three or four different terms in the country and subsequently as teacher in the high school in his home city; then served with distinction for four or six years, consecutively, as prosecuting attorney of the county, followed by 10 or 15 years in active practice as a lawyer in all the courts, including the supreme court of the State, dealing with all of the problems and intricacies that would come up in such practice, and yet the Republican post-office inspector gave the highest grade to the applicant first described.

I have no single word of complaint against the personal character of the successful applicant. He is my personal friend, a splendid man, and no reason could be suggested in opposition to his appointment except his politics. No man stands better, and therefore no words can escape my lips assailing his personal character. It is as good as that of any man in the State. But he is a Republican. If Woodrow Wilson was a candidate for constable in that township against a Republican, even though he be a rather bad Republican, this man commissioned by Woodrow Wilson as a postmaster would vote for the Republican candidate.

Why should we, when the people of this country have decreed by their vote that the country shall be controlled for a few years by people of the Democratic faith, why should we fill all the post offices of the country with Republicans? In the case I speak of the high man was that young Republican, whose personal character is extremely good, but his political character is as bad if not the worst I ever knew. [Laughter and applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FAIRFIELD].

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Speaker, it is certainly very interesting to have a Democrat admit that the President is wrong in his judgment upon some things, at least, and particularly when it is something that interferes with his own personal desire.

Mr. RUCKER. Not personal desire, but personal sense of duty.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Now, seriously as to the question before us. From what I gather from the colloquy there has been an arraignment of the inspectorship of the Post Office Department. It is not only Republican but venal as well, and not content with that arraignment they have carried it up as far as the Civil Service Commission, accusing it perhaps not of venality, but at least of incompetency. These are very grave charges to make, gentlemen, against one of the most important departments of the Government. It would seem strange after nearly seven years of a Democratic administration that they have been so inefficient that the whole civil-service organization has been turned into a political organization to secure jobs for recalcitrant Republicans; to say the least, gentlemen, it is a humiliating statement to come from the other side.

Now, as a matter of fact, very few would take issue with the gentleman on the fact that at least the more important Federal offices should be administered by the party in power.

What we object to is perhaps not hypocritical intent, for I would not accuse the President or the Postmaster General of hypocrisy in the case, but that the party should undertake to get credit for unusual nonpartisanship, and yet every member of that party defends every act of the great head of the department in nullifying the very thing that was intended to protect the civil-service organization.

Personally I have long thought that it would be best for this country that never again should appointments in the post office become party spoils. It would be better for you men on the Democratic side and for you on the Republican side; but to trifle with it, to issue an Executive order which declares that so far as the examination is concerned, save with regard to residence and moral character, the certification of the Civil Service Commission shall be final, and then to state here boldly on the floor of the House that you stand behind the nullification of the law, is, in my judgment, unworthy of the men who are stating it. Never before, it seems to me, have we reached the time when it is so important that public officials should begin to say that whatever the law is they will enforce it, for if we do not, then the Republic is already gone. [Applause.]

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. GODWIN].

Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I see no objection to the resolution in its present form. I think it will tend to clarify and straighten out the whole situation. In my opinion the Executive order of the President of March 31, 1917, was a very serious mistake as it was issued. It attempted to put the appointment of presidential postmasters under the Civil Service Commission, whereas in fact it did not. Instead of putting presidential appointments under the civil service it put them under the post-office inspectors and representatives of the Civil Service Commission. I want to state as a fact here that the recommendations that are certified by the Civil Service Commission and the Post Office Department are themselves of nonassembled examinations. That means that the representatives of the Post Office Department and of the Civil Service Commission go to a city or town, remain there for a few days, making quiet investigations, and then report the result of their free will and their own opinion as to the suitability and fitness of the various candidates for the position. It simply means that the inspectors make the appointments. I would favor the appointment of presidential offices by a competitive civil-service examination. I believe they ought to be placed upon an examination that is not a sham and a delusion.

This resolution is the first step, in my opinion, to clarify the situation and adjust the entire difference between the Executive and the Civil Service Commission. The Executive order ought to be repealed immediately, or the President ought to strengthen the Executive order so as to put these examinations upon a competitive basis, in the open, and have the result certified according to the grade. Then the selection should be made from the three highest, and not from one man, regardless of his fitness or character.

I yield the remaining two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to oppose the resolution because I do not think any Member on this side has any objection to it. I am sure that the Post Office Department has none, but I think that some of the reasons that have been advanced in support of the resolution are not tenable and are not borne out by the facts. It is true that by order of the President on the 31st of March, 1917, it was required that the first-named eligible should be appointed unless some allegations were made against his character or personal standing. Are we to assume that that order is as unchangeable as the laws of the Medes and the Persians? If facts come to the knowledge of the Postmaster General that the ratings of the Civil Service Commission are erroneous, should he not make that fact known to the commission? It is but natural that when it is made known in the community as to who the first eligible is complaints shall begin to come in to the Postmaster General. If there are any, and when he investigates those complaints, if he finds that they are well founded, that the rating for business ability is not justified by the facts, it is not only his privilege but it is his duty to take that up with the Civil Service Commission and ask for another rating. That is all that the Postmaster General has done. The Postmaster General stated in the letter from which the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] read that he had not undertaken to improperly influence the Civil Service Commission, and I submit that not one fact or statement has been shown in this debate that the Postmaster General has attempted to improperly influence the Civil Service Commission. What he has done is this: When his investigation of the facts connected with the report of the post-office inspector and civil-service inspector, who made the report on the applicant, convinced him that the rating given the applicant on account of his previous experience was erroneous, he has then taken it up with the Civil Service Commission and asked that another rating be made. I submit that is proper, and shows a lively interest in the public service, and the man who does that is the kind of public servant that we ought to have in charge of the public business.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I hold no brief for the Executive order of March 31, 1917. I do not care whether in the judgment of the gentleman it should be modified. I know what it means as it stands to-day, and I have referred to the Postmaster General as being contumacious and insubordinate for the simple reason that I assume that when the President issues an order he means it, and I further assume that when the President changes his mind as to the desirability of carrying out an order he will say so and rescind the order. I do say, however, that either the order should be carried out or that it should be rescinded; but the difficulty lies in this, that because the order nominally exists, and because the appointments in conformity are not made, and because appointments in no other way can be made, there exists in numbers of communities in this country a situation where the post office is without a permanent administrator, and where it is in the hands of the representative of the bondsman or a subordinate employee of the post office who is administering the office in the interim. These places are entitled to a permanent postmaster, and either he should be appointed in compliance with the order or the order should be rescinded, and the appointment made in compliance with some other procedure which the President may prescribe; but they ought to fish or cut bait, one or the other, for the benefit of the communities that are entitled to postmasters.

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. ROMJUE. I understand the gentleman is criticizing because he believes the order is not being carried out. Am I correct in that?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. ROMJUE. I also understand that the gentleman criticizes about the bonding companies naming temporary postmasters.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Oh, no, I am not criticizing that procedure. I say that in a great many instances that is a fact, and I say that people in those localities are entitled to the appointment of a postmaster at the hands of the President.

Mr. ROMJUE. Does the gentleman not know that before the issuance of this order the postmaster was appointed directly and that no temporary postmaster was appointed until the order became effective, and that when the order became effective, as a part of the order it was required that the bonding company name the temporary postmaster pending the examination?

Mr. LEHLBACH. That is not part and parcel of the Executive order at all. That may be the procedure determined upon independent of the order or because of the order, but it is not part of the order. But I have to move the previous question in accordance with an agreement with other gentlemen—however, I will yield to the gentleman just for a question.

Mr. ROMJUE. I was just going to say to the gentleman that they could not appoint a permanent postmaster until the examination is made under the order, which would necessarily take some time and which of necessity taking some time requires the appointment of some temporary postmaster. That is left to the naming of the bonding company.

Mr. LEHLBACH. On the 17th day of February of this year the list of eligibles of the highest rating was certified to the Postmaster General regarding the vacancy in the city of Newark, N. J. It is the 11th of September, 1919, now, and the administration of the post office is still in the hands of the representative of the bondsmen and the examination was held seven months ago.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield just for a question?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I will.

Mr. CANNON. As near as I can get at it this is the situation: The administration, the President at the head of it, the House in harmony by word of mouth [laughter]; in other words, the condition here is that somehow or other in the administration they pretend one thing, and, to coin a new word that I once heard from a witness on the stand, they "protend" another. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

Mr. LEHLBACH. And pending that, Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a unanimous-consent request that I be permitted to amend the resolution by striking out the word "date," in line 1, page 2, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "dates."

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say to the gentleman that it is too late——

Mr. LEHLBACH. But I am asking unanimous consent, before proceeding to agree to the resolution, to make the word "date," in line 1, page 2, in the plural. It is a typographical error.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent for the amendment which the Clerk will report:

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 1, strike out the word "date" and insert in lieu thereof the word "dates."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House proceeded to divide; and the Chair announced that there were—ayes 81——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have a roll call on this, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present, and apparently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 246, nays 20, answered "present" 7, not voting 157, as follows:

The SPEAKER. He did not.

Mr. EMERSON. I am paired with my colleague [Mr. MOONEY], and I wish to withdraw my vote of "yea" and answer "present."

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to withdraw my vote of "yea" and answer "present." I am paired with Mr. BELL.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

On motion of Mr. LEHLBACH, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have transferred from the Committee on Appropriations the bill H. R. 447 to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. I have the consent of the two chairmen, and the parliamentary clerk agrees that the change ought to be made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to have the bill referred to transferred from the Committee on Appropriations to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, this with the consent of the chairmen of both committees. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, what is the bill about?

Mr. HAWLEY. It is about the construction of a dredge, and it belongs to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. VAILE. To make a unanimous-consent request. I ask unanimous consent that I be granted leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of an address given by my associate, Mr. HARDY, at Edmonton, Canada, on August 2.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, what is the request?

Mr. VAILE. To insert in the RECORD an address of my colleague, Mr. HARDY, at a meeting of the National Editorial Association at Edmonton, Canada, on August 2. There is nothing political in the address.

Mr. GARD. What is it about?

Mr. VAILE. About the relations between the United States and Canada.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

WAR-RISK INSURANCE.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8778.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8778. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] will take the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8778, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8778, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8778) to amend and modify the war-risk insurance act.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose yesterday section 5 had been read. It is now open to amendment.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. IGOE: Page 3, line 7, after the words "United States," insert "or any political subdivision thereof."

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the attention of the gentleman in charge of the bill. I would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] to the language of the bill as it is reported. These institutions would have to be conducted either by the United States or by a State or Territory.

Now, we have this situation in St. Louis: An asylum for the insane is maintained by the city of St. Louis. It is a large institution, perhaps one of the best in the country, and there are several thousand patients in that sanitarium, many of them soldiers who have been discharged from the service during this war. Now, as this bill reads and as it is reported by the committee, that institution could not be covered by the bill. The institution is a public institution, and these men are there, near their homes and near their friends, and it seems to me the committee ought to agree to extend the benefits of this section to institutions that are maintained by counties or by cities, because they come within the same class as those maintained by the States or by the United States.

Mr. SWEET. Let us hear the amendment again.

Mr. IGOE. The amendment is, after the words "United States," in line 7, to add "or any political subdivision thereof."

Mr. SWEET. I see no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. GARD. On page 4, line 4, after the word "if" and before the word "competent," insert the word "mentally." I presume that is what is intended. The word "mentally" is used in another part of the bill, and I suggest that it be used here.

Mr. SWEET. We have no objection to that, although I think the text is correct as it stands now.

Mr. GARD. The word "mentally" is used on the first line.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: On page 4, line 4, after the word "if" and before the word "competent," insert the word "mentally."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That the provisions of section 29 of the war-risk insurance act shall not be operative with respect to insurance converted under article 4 of such act.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, to strike out all the language in section 7.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Page 4, line 12, strike out all of section 7.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that every man in this House, every man in the Congress, and every good, thinking citizen of the United States, desires to afford every possible benefit to those who were in the military and naval service of the United States in the Great War in which the United States played such a prominent and victorious part. But I do not believe we should go so far as to include in any United States benefits those who were traitors or guilty of treason, mutiny, and spying, under any part of the insurance law. Section 29 of the existing law, which this section provides shall not be operative, says—

That the discharge or dismissal of any person from the military or naval forces on the ground that he is an enemy alien, conscientious objector, or a deserter, as guilty of mutiny, treason, spying, or any offense involving moral turpitude, or willful and persistent misconduct shall terminate any insurance granted on the life of such person under the provisions of article 4.

That is the existing law. In other words, the United States will give no benefit under these provisions to a man who is a traitor, to a deserter, or one who has been guilty of treason or spying or any offense involving moral turpitude. Now, it is stated here that insurance converted under article 4 shall not be affected by the provisions of section 29. In other words, if a man is a traitor, or if he be a spy in the interest of the enemy and procures converted insurance, or if he be a mutineer and he has insurance, then section 7 would provide that section shall not be operative.

Now, it is my idea that every honorable soldier and sailor in the war should be fully protected in this bill, but I do not think that the United States of America should go so far as to say that merely because one has converted a term insurance into an old-line insurance policy he should continue to have the benefits of the generosity of the United States. It is my idea that a man who deserts, who is a traitor, who is guilty of any kind of treason, is not only not deserving of anything in the United States, but he should not be permitted even to reside in the United States.

Mr. RAYBURN. Would the gentleman say that if a man were in the Army and owned a piece of property and was adjudged guilty of deserting or spying he should be deprived of the ownership of that property?

Mr. GARD. Oh, no.

Mr. RAYBURN. This question of converted insurance is entirely in line with that, if the gentleman will allow me to say it.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman's contention is that the ownership of real estate is a parallel case. I submit that it is not. A man owns real estate by a private contract. He buys a piece of real estate from John Jones. If he pays for it, it becomes his, and I submit that there is nothing which can deprive him of that except some alienation under process of law. But if a man takes out a policy of insurance with the United States, if the United States says to a man, "Because you were a soldier in the war I give you a policy of converted insurance for 30 per cent less than you can get it in an old-line company, which is a valuable thing for you to have simply because the United States makes it valuable for you and continues to levy a tax upon the people of the United States in order to provide cheap insurance for you," then I say it is not a parallel case that if that man be a traitor, if he be guilty of the highest and grossest treason, he should not have the benefit of this act; and therefore I insist that section 70 of the existing law should remain in force and that there should be no difference in regard to converted insurance.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Do I understand that if this insurance is converted and if the man is proven guilty of these offenses under the forms of law, then under your theory that conviction cancels this insurance?

Mr. GARD. I would say it should cancel it; yes.

Mr. BEE. I agree with the gentleman; but under those circumstances ought we not to remit to him the premium he has paid?

Mr. GARD. I am not exceedingly worried about remitting anything to men who are traitors to my country.

Mr. BEE. Except to keep the law straight by a proper amendment.

Mr. GARD. I think we can keep the law straight and the country straighter by keeping them out than by keeping them in.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, the question that I put to the gentleman from Ohio presents a question entirely parallel to this. Of course, when we were in war and when the Government was carrying 90 per cent of the risk on the man's life, when it was carrying all of the war risk, this should have applied, and the man really had a very small, if any, vested right in the policy. But now the war is over. A man instead of investing his money in a house or in bonds or in real estate, prefers to invest it in insurance. Will the gentleman, then, argue that after that man has gone along and paid the premiums on this policy for four or five years, and it is probably all the property he has, we can properly divest him of that property that he has paid for? We are not carrying any war risk whatever on the converted insurance. The only thing that makes the policy 15 or 20 per cent cheaper is that the Government carries the overhead charges. We are not carrying any war risk any longer. The man is paying exactly what the policy is worth minus the loading that the Government carries. I can see no reason why this restriction should be thrown around it, or why we should attempt to do a thing that I do not believe legally we can do. Certainly, in my opinion, we are trying to deprive the man of property, the same as if he owned a piece of real estate.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Does not the gentleman think that under our existing laws we not alone can, but ought to, deprive a man of any insurance benefits if he is openly and notoriously treasonable to his country?

Mr. RAYBURN. During war, yes; and when the Government was carrying all of the war risk, yes; but this man now has a contract with the Government for converted insurance, and whatever value that policy has is his and ought to remain his.

Mr. GARD. No traitor can have an honest contract with the Government.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will not be adopted. The House must remember that this is after the war and that this section applies solely to converted insurance. It does not apply to compensation or any other of the provisions of the war-risk insurance act. The reason that that section was put in the bill was because we looked upon converted insurance as an investment, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] has well explained, and it seems to me that under all the circumstances, the war being over and it being an investment, it is a proper section to be placed in this bill.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Even conceding that it is an investment, does the gentleman think it should be the policy of the United States to give its beneficial investment to men who are traitors to the country?

Mr. SWEET. At this time, when the war is over, it is difficult to have traitors.

Mr. GARD. But assuming that a man is affirmatively a traitor, then he should not, I take it, have a policy of insurance carried for him by the Government.

Mr. SWEET. As to the term insurance, I think the gentleman is right; but when the insurance is converted and the man has a property right in that policy, I do not think it should be taken from him.

Mr. GARD. Does the gentleman state that the individual's property right is greater than the right of his Nation?

Mr. SWEET. I do not; but here is a vested right, and I say the Government should not have the right to take away that property.

Mr. GARD. It certainly has that right.

Mr. HULINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. HULINGS. This whole scheme of insurance is a beneficence that the Government gives to the soldier by giving him reduced rates?

Mr. SWEET. The term insurance; yes.

Mr. HULINGS. Any part of it—it is a beneficence on the part of the Government, is it not?

Mr. SWEET. Not altogether. The soldier pays for it.

Mr. HULINGS. The Government gives him the insurance for less money than he can get it any place else. The Government undertakes by this bill to give the soldiers insurance at a less rate than they could get it from the old-line insurance companies, does it not?

Mr. SWEET. It does.

Mr. HULINGS. If the soldier was drafted and held himself out to be a loyal soldier and the Government engages to give him this benefit, would it not be the proper thing to call it off when they found out that he was disloyal?

Mr. SWEET. Does the gentleman believe that it is a proper thing for the Government to take the money that was paid by this man for the converted insurance?

Mr. HULINGS. Yes; if he has been a traitor.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOWELL. As I understand it, this insurance is given to the soldier because he was a soldier in the Great War, and that it is for his benefit especially, and that no other good loyal citizen can take this insurance, because it has been especially reserved for the soldier. He can only get the converted insurance by reason of the fact that he had term insurance. Does the gentleman believe that this Government ought to exclude all others except the soldier and then give the traitor the same benefits that it gives to the soldier who fought loyally for his country?

Mr. SWEET. This man has a vested right the same as if he owned real estate or any other property.

Mr. DOWELL. So far as I am concerned, I am not in favor of giving to the traitor any special benefits by the Government under any statute. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Would the gentleman be willing to cancel a man's insurance on the ground of misconduct?

Mr. DOWELL. I think that is another question.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman from Ohio has moved to strike out the whole section.

Mr. DOWELL. I believe that where a man has shown himself to be a traitor to his country the Government ought not to give him any special benefit whatever.

Mr. RAYBURN. It is not giving him any other benefit under the converted insurance.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, the original provision in section 29 denied the term insurance to such as are discharged and dismissed from the Army on the ground of being an enemy alien, conscientious objectors, and spies, and under conditions involving moral turpitude.

The war is over; the term insurance will be over under the terms of the original act within five years after the proclamation of peace. There can be now, therefore, no longer an enemy alien. There can be now no longer a conscientious objector. There can be now no longer a deserter or spy. This provision applies to the converted insurance, and converted insurance is a new contract. In that connection I wish to read the testimony given before the subcommittee of Mr. Macfarlane explaining the attitude of the War Risk Insurance Bureau on this project of insurance. Mr. Macfarlane said:

That provision in the act was a very good provision on the term insurance and during the war only, and the idea of the act in making that applicable to the converted insurance was this: A man has term insurance and he is in the Regular Army, an officer in the Regular Army; two years from now he applies for one of these ordinary life policies; he keeps it, say, for five years, and he has acquired an equity which the Government should not take away from him. Then he does one of these things, he deserts, or something of that kind, and we would have to cancel his insurance. Now, in effect, we want to issue an incontestible policy, because if that were not done some time in the future that man's equity might be taken from him, which would affect the whole program. That is the only effect it would have on the converted insurance; it really applies to men in the Regular Army who may apply for ordinary insurance and for which they are paying the full premium for the risk covered.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Under the law, under section 29, when he is discharged from the service as a traitor his insurance is canceled?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; his term insurance is gone.

Mr. DOWELL. Under the general law he has no right to the converted insurance except he held the term insurance?

Mr. ESCH. He makes a new contract.

Mr. DOWELL. But the policy has been canceled?

Mr. ESCH. The term policy has.

Mr. DOWELL. You reinstate the converted policy. He could not convert the term insurance, but you permit him to take other insurance, and it is a new enactment?

Mr. ESCH. He has nothing in the term insurance but has in the new policy.

Mr. DOWELL. Not until after it is permitted by a new law?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; he can take it at any time within five years.

Mr. DOWELL. Unless you permit him to take the other insurance he is excluded?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; but this gives him that right.

Mr. DOWELL. Does the gentleman believe that a traitor should be given any more consideration in another policy than he was given in the term insurance? You cancel the term insurance because he is a traitor, and now you let him come in and give him a right to take other insurance?

Mr. ESCH. This has application to the converted insurance, and we make it incontestable just as we make a policy in an old-line company incontestable.

Mr. DOWELL. You first cancel the policy because he is a traitor?

Mr. ESCH. No; the gentleman is wrong; he is discharged because he is a deserter.

Mr. DOWELL. He is barred from all rights of compensation after he is discharged?

Mr. RAYBURN. There can be no other policy issued to a man after he has been discharged on account of being a traitor and his insurance canceled.

Mr. DOWELL. Then why section 7?

Mr. RAYBURN. Because it might come up hereafter that the man had a policy and had never been guilty of any of these things.

Mr. DOWELL. Section 29 definitely defines whose policy shall be canceled, and if he is discharged because he is a traitor it is canceled. The gentleman now says that he can not get other insurance unless he has the term insurance.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is it; he has nothing to convert.

Mr. DOWELL. But under section 7 is he not permitted to do it?

Mr. RAYBURN. No.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This section 7 applies only to converted insurance; it has no application to any other kind. It does not affect section 29 with reference to any other kind of insurance, so that if the section was adopted as proposed in the bill it would merely provide that when a soldier had converted his insurance and still remained a soldier, after it became the same as property to him, he should not be deprived of the benefit of the insurance on account of the provisions of section 29.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Not now. Section 29 provides that the discharge or dismissal of any person from the military or naval forces on the ground that he is an enemy alien, a conscientious objector, and so forth, or any offense involving turpitude, shall terminate the insurance. His insurance is terminated, because he has been discharged upon the ground that he has been guilty of some of these offenses. He has not been given a trial in the ordinary sense of the word. Conditions have merely been found to exist in Army circles sufficient to authorize his discharge. Suppose some of the men in the Regular Army after this war is over should have been discharged upon the ground of offense involving moral turpitude. A man thus found guilty is discharged. Another man who has not the insurance is discharged for the same offense. Do we propose that the soldier shall have an additional penalty, depriving him of the property right in his insurance because he has taken the insurance? It is not only the protection of the soldier. This is for the protection of the dependents of the soldier to a large extent. Are we going to add additional penalties against the dependents of the soldier? They have nothing to do with the matter; they are entirely innocent. Are we going to penalize them in addition to the discharge of the soldier? Here is what would be called in ordinary criminal trials double punishment. Is it possible that we are going to establish the matter of double punishment when you do not even have the ordinary safeguards of a criminal trial? An Army officer is first tried and then discharged, and those trials very frequently are very summary. The fact is that it does not take much to cause a discharge in the Army. Then we propose by this law to add additional penalties against the soldier and his dependents.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition to take issue with the gentleman. I merely wanted to inquire a little further and make one point in the gentleman's position clear. My colleague [Mr. DOWELL] assumes that the effect of this provision would be to reinstate some of the soldiers' insurance which has heretofore been forfeited. I can not see how that could be done.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] is in error in that assumption. It applies only to converted insurance. It would not reinstate anybody and it does not apply to term insurance. He would have no right to convert his insurance unless he had such a record as would authorize him to convert it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. GARD. This is the position as I understand it. When term insurance is changed into converted insurance, then by this section 7 you make the converted insurance absolutely incontestible, although after he got the converted insurance a man be guilty of acts of the highest treason.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. GARD. That is what you intend to do?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. GARD. I do not think that should be done.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. And in further response to the gentleman, I call his attention to the fact that if he is guilty of treason he will be tried and convicted?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. And punishment will be given him. Should he be given any greater punishment because he has taken out this insurance than the man who has been tried and convicted and who has not taken out this insurance?

Mr. GARD. The man is found to be guilty of treason and put up against a wall and shot. I contend that he and any one under him should never have the benefit of insurance by the United States of America given to honorably discharged soldiers and sailors.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. If the gentleman from Ohio has that opinion, why did he not so frame his amendment as to reach that particular instance. The gentleman by his proposed amendment strikes out all of section 7, which would make all of section 29 apply to converted insurance.

Mr. GARD. Absolutely, just as it does to-day.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Following the suggestion the gentleman just made, why does not the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] confine it to treason and not have the man deprived of converted insurance who is charged with moral turpitude? Why should a man's family be disgraced and deprived of the support that they are entitled to because a man has been discharged from the Army on account of moral turpitude?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Why should a soldier have an additional penalty imposed?

Mr. BEE. I agree with the gentleman about treason, but not as to moral turpitude.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, there is only one case where the charge is treason in all of the 384,000 courts-martial and summary court cases, and that case is about to be reversed by the Judge Advocate General's office, because there is not sufficient testimony to substantiate the charge, and it was made against a volunteer. It is a theoretical argument that we are listening to here this afternoon.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, the confusion arising in the minds of gentlemen who are advocating the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] is just this: They confuse term insurance with converted insurance. Term insurance was for and during the period of the war, and applies to all men who were in the service, to wit, about 4,000,000. Converted insurance will apply to those men hereafter who go into the Regular Army or into the regular naval service. It will not apply to anyone else.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for just a question?

Mr. DEWALT. In just a moment. It will apply to those who had existing policies which were taken out and converted them during that time. Now, what does this amendment propose to do? Let us see the effect of it. A is in the Regular Army now. He had what we call "term" insurance during the period of the war. He proposes to convert that insurance into the old-life plan or, we will say, under the 20-year plan. He makes as his beneficiaries his wife and, we will say, two children, naming them specifically in the contract. Now, remember, gentlemen, you are dealing with a contract between the insuring company, to wit, the Government, and the insured. The insured pays his regular premium from time to time. For what? For the beneficence of his wife and his two children. He continues to pay those premiums for 19 years, and some time during the nineteenth or the twentieth year he is found guilty of moral turpitude or he is found guilty, if you please, by a court-martial of treasonable conduct, and by the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio you propose to say that in spite of the fact that he has been a good soldier for 19 years and has paid 19 years of premiums, only 20 per cent less than what he would have been obliged to pay in a regular company, that all the money that he has paid is lost and that his wife and two children are prevented from getting that beneficence in case of his death during the twentieth year.

Now, I agree as to the flat proposition that no man should receive any benefit from this Government who has been guilty of treason or of conduct unbecoming an officer which leads to a disorganization of the forces; but I can not for the life of me see as a lawyer how you can violate a contract that has been duly entered into by A and B by the subsequent act of B, which has no relation whatever to the contract as originally constituted.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Simply for information. If it should be written into the law to-day that if a man guilty of treasonable conduct can not collect the policy, would not that be one of the conditions in the policy at the time he took it out? Would it be any breach of contract on the part of the Government if it failed to pay the insurance if he had violated that condition?

Mr. DEWALT. The gentleman is entirely correct. That would be one of the terms of the policy then and a portion of the contract. It is certain that the Government could stand upon that.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The gentleman thinks, as a matter of fact, that it ought to go into this law somewhere?

Mr. DEWALT. I agree basicly that no such man should get the benefit given by the Government, but let us look at this proposition also. Here is a man paying within 20 per cent, according to the testimony of Mr. Macfarlane, of the established rate of one company in this country, the Traveler's Co., which is one of the cheapest and best they say, and he continues to pay that for 19 years, yet by conduct of his own his family is held responsible, his two children and his wife may be deprived of this benefit.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HASTINGS. I ask that the gentleman may be given two minutes so that I may ask him a question.

Mr. RUCKER. Make it three minutes, as I want to ask one myself.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HASTINGS. Now, the gentleman has been discussing the difference between "term" and "converted" insurance. Let me see if I am straight on the matter. As I understand term insurance was that in force during the war.

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. And converted insurance is, of course, for a longer period and since the war.

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. What is the difference in principle in the application of the Government toward a man for term insurance and converted insurance? As I understand it, so far as term insurance is concerned, he pays a smaller amount than he does for converted insurance. Now, you have section 29, which applies during the war. If he violates the terms, if he is convicted of moral turpitude, if he is dismissed from the Army, if he is convicted for treason, then his family is penalized and he suffers the "double jeopardy," as our friend from Indiana would have us believe. Now, I can not see a bit of difference in principle between term insurance and converted insurance, except one is a shorter and the other a longer term. For the term insurance you pay less and for the converted you pay more. You get the same benefit from the Government in either case, because the converted insurance costs the same as the old-line insurance with the overhead expenses taken off. In other words, you pay 25 or 30 per cent less for converted insurance, as has been explained here on the floor. Now, what is the difference in principle between the Government standing behind the man on term insurance and converted insurance, except one is short and the other is a longer term; that one pays less and the other pays slightly more; and where is the family penalized any more in the one case than the other?

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman allow me to interpose one thought?

Mr. HASTINGS. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SNYDER. Does the gentleman say, Where is the family penalized?

Mr. HASTINGS. Any more in one case than the other.

Mr. SNYDER. If a soldier had a wife and child during all the 19 years that he has been paying the insurance, the family would have been penalized during all of that period.

Mr. HASTINGS. Allow me to answer that. Suppose this war had been going on for 19 months; suppose under the short-term insurance he had paid for 18 months and suppose then he was discharged. Under section 29 the short-term policy is canceled. Where is the family penalized any more by the cancellation under the converted than it would be penalized by the cancellation under the short term? That is the point I am making.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 11, noes 48.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That a new section is hereby added to the war-risk insurance act, to be known as section 31, and to read as follows:

"SEC. 31. That no person is in active service in the military or naval forces of the United States within the meaning of this act until he has been examined by the proper medical officer or officers of such forces at the camp or other place of mobilization, and upon such examination, accepted and enrolled for active service: Provided, That if after induction by the local draft board, but before being accepted and enrolled for active service, the person dies or becomes disabled as a result of disease contracted or injury suffered in the line of duty and not due to his own willful misconduct, or as a result of the aggravation, in the line of duty and not because of his own willful misconduct, of an existing disease or injury, he or those entitled thereto shall receive the benefits of compensation payable under article 3: Provided further, That any insurance application made by a person after induction by the local draft board but before being accepted and enrolled for active service shall be deemed valid."

Mr. SNYDER and Mr. SWEET rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET], in charge of the bill, is recognized.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few corrective amendments to this section. These were made at the suggestion of my good friend from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS].

On page 4, line 18, strike out the word "is" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "shall be deemed to have been."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SWEET: Page 4, line 18, strike out the word "is," and insert in lieu thereof "shall be deemed to have been."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SWEET. On page 4, line 20, strike out the word "until" and insert in lieu thereof the word "unless."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SWEET: Page 4, line 20, strike out the word "until" and insert in lieu thereof the word "unless."

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the subject of this amendment, unless the gentleman wishes to press it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama wishes the floor, unless the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] wishes to take the time. If not, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] for five minutes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, this is a very important section of this bill, and one which should have the very careful consideration of every member of the committee of the House as well as the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Those of us who have had to do with the business of the Committee on Pensions, or who have had claims before the Pension Office, have been confronted many times with certification by the War Department in discharging a soldier that his disability was incurred before he entered the service. And that certification has defeated many righteous claims for pensions, for it is practically impossible for the claimant to overcome it by proof.

The tendency of the Pension Office, as it is in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, is to resolve doubts in favor of the Government, and that tendency has created a practice in the Pension Office and is creating it in the bureau, to put the burden of proof on a claimant to show that at the time he entered the service he was in sound physical condition. This proof is nearly always hard for the claimant to make, and because of that requirement many righteous claims for pensions have been defeated.

Now, the law as it was originally passed by Congress left the possibility for this kind of construction to the bureau. To cure that defect in the law, at the very first time that we started to amend the soldiers' and sailors' insurance act we changed the law so as to provide that the soldier should be held and taken to have been in sound physical condition at the time he was examined, accepted, and enrolled in the Army. And in that condition is the law to-day.

Now, I have gathered from what the members of the committee have said in their remarks on this bill that this is a composite bill, made up of suggestions that have come from a good many sources; that many gentlemen have had ideas as to what amendments should be made to this law, and have introduced bills embodying those ideas, and they have been formulated together into this bill. I venture to say that no Member of the House will take the responsibility of having introduced a bill to bring about this amendment embodied in section 31. And I venture to charge, from my knowledge of the subject and how these things are usually done, that this amendment comes from the bureau itself in response to that tendency, to which I have called attention, of these bureaus to justify their existence and these officers to show they are earning their salaries by standing between the claimant and the Government.

The purpose of section 31, I believe, is to take away the right secured by the first amendment that I referred to. I am sure that no Member of the House conceived the thought that he would put the burden of proof on these boys who were in the service to show that they were in sound physical condition at the time they were examined and sent to the front by the local boards. That, I imagine, is the conception of the bureau. Congress has all the while intended to show the greatest generosity to those who served our country in the Great War.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The timekeeper informs the Chair that the time has expired. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama for five minutes more? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Congress has always shown a disposition to deal with the claims of the soldiers with the greatest generosity. Congress has intended to be liberal, but we have always had to deal with these influences in the bureau that took away with one hand what Congress gave with the other. Sometimes they have had to relent, by virtue of the pressure of public opinion, but they inch up and inch up a little further from time to time to cut off a dependent family or a disabled soldier, with one technically specious reason or excuse after another. They are confronted with a statute passed by this House, that a man shall be considered to have been in good physical condition at the time he was sent to the front, and they come up here with an amendment which would put it in the law, so that the soldier will have to show, if he should be eventually turned down on his final examination at the camp, that in fact he was in good physical condition at the time he was inducted into the service.

Now, I have in mind the case of one of my own constituents. A soldier was examined and inducted into the Army, having been first duly examined by the physicians of the local board and found to be sound physically. He was sent to camp. On his way there he got wet in a rain, and as they had no way to take care of the boys adequately when they got there, there being a big crowd of boys sent in, he caught cold and suffered from some acute inflamation of the lungs, and was sent home when finally examined by the camp surgeon. Tuberculosis developed. He is now in the West trying to get well of this tuberculosis. He presented his claim to the bureau, and they say, "Oh, you were only in the service 11 days, and the presumption is that you had tuberculosis when you were sent to camp, notwithstanding the examination by the physician of the local board." His claim stands rejected.

Now then, these claims are being held up. That is not the only one. Eventually they have got to allow them, because the law requires that that shall be done. But they are being held up, and in the meantime here comes this amendment, which will cut off that soldier, or which will put the burden on him of showing that he did not have in him the seeds of tuberculosis when he was sent to camp—that he was sound.

You all know that the bureau when it comes to make a decision of his case upon issue thus made up will make decision against him. I plead for him, and I plead for all others similarly situated. I contend that there should arise a strong presumption, when the soldier is inducted into the service, when he is sent into camp, having been pronounced sound by the medical officer of the local board and fit to enter the service of his country—a strong presumption ought to be indulged that he was fit for service, and that the disease from which he suffers is a thing of later occurrence and development. The burden of proof should not be on him to show that he got his disease after he was sent to camp. That is the thing I insist on.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. VAILE. I think the gentleman's remarks are sound and admirable, and I agree with all that he has said. I want to add that the soldier is in the service as long as he is notified that his services are required. He could be tried by a court-martial.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes; and he is guilty of desertion if he fails to show up in response to the order of the local board.

Mr. VAILE. Yes; and he is construed to be in the service for every purpose.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes; for every purpose except for receiving the benefit of the generosity of the people and the Congress of the United States.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Without discussing the merits of the proposition of which the gentleman speaks, I do not understand how this changes the provision of the law. It provides that there shall be an examination.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I will explain to the gentleman how it does. Under the present law when a soldier is inducted into service he is conclusively presumed to be in sound physical condition, and although he should subsequently, in consequence of another examination, be rejected from the service, he is entitled to compensation. That is the law as it now is. The burden of proof will be on the soldier under the provisions of this section of the bill to show that he was in sound physical condition at the time he was inducted into the service if it shall develop at the time of his final examination in camp that he has a disease and is unfit for the service. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] that sometimes several weeks elapse between the time when a man is sent to camp and the time he is finally examined and assigned for service. In the particular case I have cited 11 days elapsed. I know of cases where more than a month had elapsed. But in all these cases it is proposed to put the burden on the soldier, who was examined by the local board through its physicians at home and pronounced sound and fit—it is proposed to put the burden on him to show that he was actually and in point of fact sound and fit. I submit there should arise a presumption in his favor and that the burden of proof ought to be on the Government to show that in fact when he was inducted he had the physical disability for which he was finally discharged.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. I fail to get the gentleman's viewpoint. This does not change the law.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. What I have said has no relation to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET]. What I want to do is to get this matter before the House at the beginning.

Mr. RAYBURN. I am talking about all of section 31.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired. The time is in charge of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET].

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I would like to dispose of these amendments before we take up other amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can proceed in a parliamentary way. The gentleman does not need to be instructed by the Chair.

Mr. SWEET. I have offered an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa has offered an amendment, and the debate is exhausted on that amendment.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to abridge the debate on the present amendment, but I would like to offer an amendment before the section is disposed of by the committee. I understand the gentleman from Iowa has several corrective amendments, and I would like to have them all placed before the committee, in order that the committee might have exactly in mind what the purpose is as sought by the gentleman.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I ask that they be considered, because they are all related.

Mr. ROGERS. I suggest to the gentleman, if he will permit, that they be offered for information, and then that discussion be had before the amendments are disposed of. I am not sure that the current amendment is anything more than verbal.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa prefer a unanimous request that these amendments be read for information?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SNYDER. That will not stop a further amendment to the whole section?

The CHAIRMAN. It will not. Only one amendment can be pending at a time, and one is now pending. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that a series of amendments to perfect the text may be read for the information of the committee. Is there objection?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman what his disposition is to allowing somewhat liberal debate on other amendments?

Mr. SWEET. There will be plenty of opportunity for other amendments.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The other day I was cut off.

Mr. SWEET. I realize that. It was not intentional on my part.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I have an amendment that I want to submit.

Mr. SWEET The gentleman will have the opportunity.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa will submit the amendments he proposes to make.

Mr. SWEET. On page 4, line 20, I move to strike out the word "has" and insert in lieu thereof the words "shall have."

Page 4, line 25, strike out the word "dies" and insert in lieu thereof the word "died."

Page 5, line 1, strike out the word "becomes" and insert in lieu thereof the word "became."

That simply changes the tense of the verbs.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET].

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. During the course of the general debate I sought to learn from the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] what was intended to be accomplished by the first portion of this new section 31, namely, that portion which provides—

That no person is in active service in the military or naval forces of the United States within the meaning of this act until he has been examined by the proper medical officer or officers of such forces at the camp or other place of mobilization, and upon such examination, accepted and enrolled for active service.

The substance of the answer of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT], who, as we all know, is very well informed, was that that substantive provision meant little or nothing, and that the real meat of this section was to be found in the proviso. It seems to me it is of great importance that we be precise and scientific in our use of language in a matter of this nature, and certainly we ought to have a uniform rule, so that we may know whether a man at a given moment is in the military service of the United States or is not in the military service of the United States. This provision says that a man is not in the military service of the United States, under this act at least, until he has been medically examined at a camp and has been accepted. I have in my hand a copy of an order of induction into the military service of the United States, which is very brief, and which I will read in this connection:

ORDER OF INDUCTION INTO MILITARY SERVICE OF THE UNITED STATES.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

To _____ Order No._____ Serial No._____

Greeting: Having submitted yourself to a local board composed of your neighbors for the purpose of determining the place and time in which you can best serve the United States in the present emergency, you are hereby notified that you have now been selected for immediate military service.

You will, therefore, report to the local board named below at _____, at_____m., on the_____day of_____, 19—, for military duty.

From and after the day and hour just named you will be a soldier in the military service of the United States.

*Member of Local Board for*_____ Report to local board for_____

_____

Date_____

That is the official order of induction into the military service which was used by the Adjutant General and his subordinates throughout the war. That says that a soldier was in the military service from the moment of his induction. This bill says that the soldier was not in the military service until a period which might easily be weeks after the moment when he was inducted. My inquiry is, What is the purpose of the subcommittee in making that extreme distinction between the two kinds of commencement of military service?

Mr. SWEET. In answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts I will say that the War Risk Insurance Bureau, in administering the act, laid down the rule as provided in this bill, and the question whether a man was in the service or not was determined along the lines stated in this bill. Now, in order to cover the period from the induction of the soldier by the draft board, when he was first taken by the Government, up to the time that he came into the active service, it was necessary to define in the act what the Bureau of War Risk Insurance had determined upon as constituting active service. After having determined that we then put two provisos in the bill. The first relates to compensation and covers the period between induction by the local draft board and the time intervening before being accepted and enrolled for active service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWEET. And in that connection the same position is taken relative to the second proviso, which relates to insurance. Now, if during that period, between the induction by the local draft board and the time intervening before he was accepted and enrolled for active service, as defined in this act, application was made by the soldier for insurance, he will be entitled to the insurance.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. Wherein does the status of a soldier under the war-risk insurance act differ, before he has been examined physically at the point of mobilization and after he has been examined physically at the point of mobilization?

Mr. SWEET. He is inducted into the active service at the place of mobilization; but when the draft law went into effect, he was passed upon by the draft board and transported some distance, perhaps, to the camp or place of mobilization where he was examined, accepted, and enrolled for active service.

Mr. ROGERS. But are his financial privileges or other privileges increased under the war-risk act at the moment when he is physically accepted at the point of mobilization?

Mr. SWEET. The moment that he was examined, accepted, and enrolled for active service at the camp or place of mobilization he was entitled to the benefits of the war-risk insurance act, provided he desired to take advantage of the same. Before that time he was not entitled to avail himself of the benefits of the act under the law as it now exists.

Mr. ROGERS. I think I understand the gentleman's contention; but if my reading of this section and my understanding of the facts is correct, the meaning of this section will be precisely the same if you begin to read after the word "if," in line 23, and eliminate the first six lines of the section altogether. In other words, it seems to me that the effect of your substantive statement at the outset of the paragraph is completely wiped out by your provisos, and therefore it would be in the interest of clarity in framing this law if we, in pursuance of the meaning, eliminated the substantive provision and leave only the provisos.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. It seems to me, in reply to the gentleman, that it leaves the law in great uncertainty because in this bill we define what active service is, taking the soldier at the time he is inducted by the local draft board to the time he enters active service. If active service were undefined in the bill it would leave it in great uncertainty.

Mr. ROGERS. As the bill now stands, there will be a worse condition than uncertainty; there will be a square conflict between the War Department and the War Risk Bureau as to when "military service" shall be deemed to have begun.

Mr. SWEET. The question of what constitutes active service, as far as war-risk insurance is concerned, is absolutely settled in this bill.

Mr. ROGERS. I think we ought to deem the man actually in the military service at the same moment, both in the view of the war-risk law and of the general military law.

Mr. IGOE. They are not all inducted by the local boards.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman from Massachusetts will notice that there is a difference in the wording. It speaks of the military service, and the term used in the first part of this section is "active service." I have always understood, and I think correctly, that there is quite a difference from being in the military service and being in the active service. When I first read the section I got the same idea that the gentleman from Massachusetts has, that the first part might as well be omitted and the language of the proviso alone used.

Mr. ROGERS. In answer to the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa, a distinguished member of the subcommittee, Mr. DEWALT, said in answer to my question that as far as he could see, the first part of the section meant nothing, and that all the meaning was in the provisos. What the fact is I do not know. I did not suppose anyone would seek to draw so narrow a line as that suggested by the gentleman from Iowa, namely, between active service, on the one hand, and military service, on the other. I do not think there is or ought to be any such line of demarcation.

Mr. ANDERSON. An officer when commissioned is in the service but he is not in the active service until called.

Mr. ROGERS. My thought is that from the moment of the induction the man is to be entitled to all the benefits of the war-risk insurance. I am not at all clear what this section really means to do, but I do not think that is the fact. If it is a fact, I am perfectly satisfied.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question of the chairman. I am not certain about this proposition. These boys went into the service not of their own volition. Are they protected? Suppose a young man left town to go to a mobilization camp and the train was wrecked, or something happened to incapacitate him. I do not know that there was a train wreck but there may have been; plenty of things happen where he might be incapacitated. Is such a boy protected?

Mr. SWEET. He is.

Mr. BEGG. Then I am satisfied, but from the way it reads to me he is not.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. In what way is he protected?

Mr. SWEET. Because this section provides—

That if after induction by the local draft board, but before being accepted and enrolled for active service, the person dies or becomes disabled as a result of disease contracted or injury suffered in the line of duty and not due to his own willful misconduct, or as a result of the aggravation, in the line of duty and not because of his own willful misconduct, of an existing disease or injury, he or those entitled thereto shall receive the benefits of compensation payable under article 3.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas (reading)—

Provided further, That any insurance application made by a person after induction by the local draft board but before being accepted and enrolled for active service shall be deemed valid.

The gentleman is right as far as that is concerned but suppose, as the gentleman from Ohio suggested, on the way to mobilization, before he was regularly inducted, perhaps before the medical examination provided for, he has been injured and loses a limb?

Mr. SWEET. That is the very proposition we are carrying. This proviso takes care of these men between the time and up to the time they are in active service. For instance, if a young man left his home town and was going to the mobilization camp for examination and the train was wrecked and he was under military orders to go there he would be entitled to compensation. If during that period before being taken into active service he made an application for insurance the application would be good. It is good in case he is disabled, and we have another provision which carries automatic insurance.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, the point I would like to bring out further than that is, if what the chairman of this committee said is an actual fact—and I do not mean to say that I do not absolutely think what he says to be true—but if that be the fact, what is wrong in saying that active service shall begin at the time the draft board ordered him to a demobilization point. Then there will be no question and no doubt about the man's service. I can see nothing in this proposition, unless it is, as the gentleman from Alabama says, to make it more difficult for the man who is actually injured in this service to secure some kind of an adjustment.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. What is the meaning of "induction by the local draft board?" In rural counties the draft board was located at the county seat. The boy is ordered by such an order as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] read to go from say some 10 or 12 miles to the county seat to report to the local draft board. He is injured on the way to the county seat. He has not been inducted into the service?

Mr. BEGG. In my judgment he has not.

Mr. RAMSEYER. So if anything happens on the way to the local draft board——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAMSEYER. So, if the young man is on his way from his home under order of the military authorities to the local draft board and becomes injured, he would not be protected?

Mr. BEGG. He would not be. That is the way that I interpret it. Mr. Chairman, before the two minutes are gone I call the attention of the committee to another phase of this proposition. The most bitter time in the life of the boy and of his parents was the time when he was compelled to leave his home, and if there is a time when he is deserving the consideration and the protection of this Government it is at that time before he had really become hardened to military life. I can see no excuse nor any reason for not making it specific that his time of active service begun the very minute that he reported at the place he was ordered to report. As far as I am concerned, I am not in sympathy with the difference between active service and inactive service. For the purpose of the boys in this Army there were no moments of inactive service. The hour he reported was the most active hour of his whole military career, not even excepting the zero hour when he went over the top, if I am able to understand the feelings of these boys and of the parents in going about the country as I did, seeing thousands of them leave. I am not in sympathy with anything that leaves even a question of doubt, and I know it can be made clear if you will use the word I have suggested that the active service begins the hour that he was ordered to report to the local draft board.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has again expired.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment already pending, and the gentleman's amendment can not be considered at this time.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word on the amendment.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama has already been heard upon this proposition and the Chair will, therefore, recognize the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. VAILE].

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the House to what I think is dangerous language in the use of this term "active service." The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] has said appropriately that there ought not to be any distinction, for the purpose of this act, between active and inactive service. We have an example upon this very subject. Take the act providing pensions for Spanish War Veterans. The substance of the language is this, that the widows of volunteers in the Spanish War get pensions no matter where they served, but as construed by the Pension Department—and probably correctly under the wording of the act—the widows of the Regulars do not get the pensions unless they were in active service, which they call service at the front. For instance, I was a soldier in the Spanish-American War, a volunteer. Friends of mine enlisted in the Regulars for the purpose of serving in that war. My widow could have obtained a pension if I had left a widow at that time, whereas the widows of these other boys could not, because the term "active service," as construed by the Pension Department, meant service at the front. We are injecting into this bill the same kind of statement which may be construed in the same way. Why should there be a distinction between active and inactive service when the soldier is bound to perform any service that may be required of him, from the moment that he is ordered to report for duty after his induction notice? It has been developed in this discussion that everything that every one wants is in those particular lines in this section following the proviso.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VAILE. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. The suggestion has been made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE] that that is not true, because the provisos of this section refer only to draft men, whereas the substantive part of the provision at the beginning of the section refers to men who came into the service by voluntary enlistment, and therefore something like the first language of section 31 is necessary to take care of those men who volunteered and the beginning of whose service it is necessary to establish.

Mr. VAILE. I think the gentleman is correct in that criticism, but at all events the commencement of the soldier's service should be the time the man is first ordered to report for duty under the order of the draft board.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VAILE. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. I got a letter from a man who was sent down to camp and who was immediately rejected, and he thinks that he is entitled to the bonus.

Mr. VAILE. He would be entitled to it, because he would have been subject to trial and to imprisonment on the ground of desertion if he had not answered the call.

Mr. PLATT. Why should he get $60 for riding on a train as far as the camp? If he was injured, I agree that he should have been compensated, but he was not.

Mr. VAILE. It may possibly be urged that we should have limited that proviso to apply only to those who had given 3 months or 10 months of service, but, as a matter of fact, it was intended to apply to all soldiers.

Mr. PLATT. But he was not a soldier until he was accepted by the organization that he was sent to.

Mr. VAILE. He was a soldier from the minute that he got that notice, because he could have been tried by court-martial and imprisoned for desertion.

Mr. PLATT. He was not a soldier until he was accepted by the organization that he was sent to.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to suggest a concrete case, which came to my notice? A boy was sent by the local board to the place of mobilization. On his way there the armistice was signed. He made application for the $00 bonus but was refused, because he was not inducted into the service.

The boy arriving at the camp an hour previous to the signing of the armistice received the $60 bonus. The question is whether the boy who was en route for the place of demobilization was inducted into the service according to the gentleman's philosophy.

Mr. VAILE. According to my philosophy he was a soldier from the minute he was ordered.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. And should he not receive the $60 bonus?

Mr. VAILE. And he should receive the compensation. It is not his fault if he did not render service.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. The bureau has denied such cases.

Mr. VAILE. I think the bureau is wrong.

Mr. EMERSON. I understand the $60 bonus was not paid to a man unless he had been sent by the draft board to the place of mobilization and was accepted.

Mr. VAILE. That may be correct but it ought not to be. He is a soldier from the minute he gets that notice.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. The Judge Advocate General has made a decision as to when a soldier is held to be in the service and in making that decision has referred to the selective-service regulations, sections numbered 159D and 174. He holds, in substance, that from the moment the local board enters in column 24 of the classification list the time when the drafted man is to report for entrainment and mails to him notice to report, as required by the selected-service regulations, that from that moment, not from the receipt of the notice, not from the actual entraining, but from that moment, he is a soldier of the United States Army and is subject to orders just as any other soldier and is liable as a deserter if he fails to obey the order to appear for entrainment. Now, that makes a certain definite time at which the registrant becomes a soldier, and the point I am insisting on, whether I have made it clear or not, is that from that moment there should arise the presumption that the soldier was in sound physical condition and that he is entitled to compensation for any disability which may subsequently develop. Of course, it may be that his disability previously existed; it may be that the medical officer of the local board did not make a thorough examination; but there should at least arise from that moment the presumption that he was in sound physical condition when he is sent to the camp; and some weeks or maybe a month afterwards, when he has undergone the hardships referred to by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] and is then found to be physically disqualified, he ought not to be turned out unprotected, as this bill would leave him, unless he is able to make affirmative proof that his disability was incurred after he was inducted into the service. I simply want to make myself clear on that point, and I hope I have done so.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Does the gentleman think the burden of proof would be on the soldier if this language were adopted?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I do indeed; and I say further to the gentleman that if the gentleman will observe the language of the proviso it protects merely the drafted man so far as it protects anybody. There is no protection in section 31 for the man who volunteers. He may be on his way to camp, suffer disability, and yet under that language the man who volunteers unless he is actually examined and enrolled at the camp is cut off entirely and can not get any compensation for his injury or from any disability which he may be found to be suffering from upon his final examination.

Mr. HASTINGS. I was not making any distinction——

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I know; but I wanted to call attention to that defect because it is a most glaring defect in this section and shows we ought not to adopt it. I am in favor of making a change in the language of that section along the line suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] and strike out that part preceding the proviso and substitute therefor something like this: "A person shall be deemed to be in the active service from the time he is inducted, or if he volunteers, from the time he entrains for camp under order of the recruiting officer." That seems to me to be fair.

Mr. IGOE. The difficulty is the gentleman may go too far by simply saying "induction." There have been cases of induction where a man was allowed to remain at home for 30 days.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. No; induction carries with it the order to entrain.

Mr. IGOE. Not necessarily.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. There can not be an induction as held by the Judge Advocate General unless the man is ordered to entrain. That is what it takes to make induction.

Mr. IGOE. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. No; no, indeed; that is right, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. BEGG. I should like to read this amendment, which I shall offer if I get the opportunity, to see if it does not cover the very point the gentleman is talking about. Strike out, in line 18, the word "no" and insert "a." "That a person"——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BEGG. I ask that the gentleman be given two minutes. I want to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BEGG. Then I would insert the word "a," and I will read it. "That a person is in active service in the military or naval forces of the United States within the meaning of this act," and then strike out further down the provisio, and insert this: "At the hour when he presents himself to his local draft board for transportation to the mobilization camp."

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I think that is excellent; much better than what I have suggested.

But I would suggest to the gentleman that he compare his language there and find out whether or not it is consistent with the amendments that have already been offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET]. He has introduced some language to this section, I do not know exactly what it is, and it may be that the language proposed by the gentleman is not consistent with it. I would be very glad to have the gentleman offer the amendment. I hope it will be adopted, because I am afraid we will do a very serious injury to a great number of men, patriotic and fine fellows, unless we make some such provision for them.

The decision of the Judge Advocate General to which I have referred is contained in a letter which I recently received from the Adjutant General.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, September 5, 1919.

Hon. GEORGE HUDDLESTON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. HUDDLESTON: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter of August 20 1919, addressed to the Judge Advocate General requesting information as to when a drafted soldier becomes a member of the Army, and to inform you that section 3 of the act of May 18, 1917, provides in part as follows:

"All persons drafted into the service of the United States and all officers accepting commissions in the forces herein provided for shall, from the date of said draft or acceptance, be subject to the laws and regulations governing the Regular Army, except as to promotions, * * *."

Sections 159D and 174 of the selective-service regulations (2d ed.) provide:

"SEC. 159D. Induction by local boards is accomplished by entering in column 24 of the classification list opposite the name of each registrant to be called for entrainment the day and hour on which the registrant is to report to the local board and by mailing, at the same time, to each such registrant an order (Form 1028, sec. 301, p. 250) to report to the local board for military duty at the hour, day, and place specified in said order, which shall be the same as that appearing in column 24 of the classification list after the name of such registrant. From and after the day and hour thus specified each such registrant will be in the military service of the United States, and either the entry of such date after the name of any such registrant on the classification list or the mailing to any such registrant of the order into military service shall constitute the giving of notice to such registrant that from and after such day and hour he will be in the military service of the United States."

"SEC. 174. Persons inducted into military service who fail to report to their local boards for military duty when ordered by their local board to do so or who shall absent themselves from entrainment or from their party en route to a mobilization camp are deserters and shall be proceeded against under section 140."

Beyond thus quoting the statute and regulations as above, little, if anything, by way of pertinent reply can be said, for every case of the nature suggested must be determined with due regard to all the peculiar facts and circumstances involved.

Very respectfully, yours,

P. C. HARRIS,
The Adjutant General.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, it seems there should be no difficulty in determining the exact date upon which the activity of the soldier should be considered as having begun. That is very clearly set forth in the notice that was read by some gentleman just a few minutes ago, when he stated that the soldier's induction into the military service occurred on a certain day and hour mentioned in the notice. Now, from that very minute the soldier was absolutely out of control of the draft board. There was no authority in any State, unless it might be The Adjutant General, that could reach him. I presume that every member here has had more or less experience in trying to get some of the boys out of the military service after their induction, but found it was absolutely impossible. When they were once inducted into the service they were in the active service to all intents and purposes, as much as after they had gone to camp and passed examination and been assigned to some company. Now, if the young men were in the service at that moment, why should not all their benefits under this insurance act date back to the date of their induction into the military service, and why should not the act very clearly and specifically make that statement?

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. I quite agree that there is no difficulty in determining when a draftee's military service began, but will the gentleman tell me how we can determine the moment of the beginning of the military service in the case of a voluntary enlistment?

Mr. SHREVE. I am talking about the young man inducted into the service by way of the draft board.

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman does not want to discriminate against the voluntary enlistment man, does he?

Mr. SHREVE. That is a different case entirely. I am speaking of the young man that is drafted, and I believe he is as much in the military service on the day and hour shown in his notice of induction as he ever was or will be in all his life. And then why should not all of his benefits under this act begin from the day and hour of his induction into the military service?

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HULINGS. I wish to oppose the amendment. Everybody is getting a crack at this, and I think I will take a crack at it, too. My suggestion would be that we amend this thirty-first section so that it shall read:

That no person is in active service in the military or naval forces of the United States within the meaning of this act until he has received notice to report to the local draft board for induction and has in fact reported to said board, or, in case of a volunteer, from the moment he is sworn into the service.

It seems to me that would clear up this question. The Adjutant General in his decision as to when a person is in the military service is right in line with the notice which the President served on all these draftees, that at the time they served that notice they were in the military service, and the distinction brought up here between active service and inactive service I have never heard before. I have heard of a man being in the military service or in the retired service, but as to a man who is part in the service and part not in the service, inactive, I do not understand the distinction. I wish to bring to the attention of the committee his amendment, which I shall offer when an opportunity is given.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves an amendment, and is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DOWELL. I desire only a moment. I want to make an inquiry of the committee. I notice the section under consideration merely applies to those inducted into the military service by the local draft board. When is a person in the service who volunteers his service? Is there a ruling upon that question to determine definitely when he comes within this act?

Mr. SWEET. That question does not arise, because if a man volunteers he is immediately inducted into the active service. He is examined and put into the active service; he goes immediately into that service. But in connection with the draft law he went before the draft board; and then, of course, he was inducted by the local draft board. He was then transported to the camp or other place of mobilization, where he was examined, accepted, and enrolled for active service.

Mr. DOWELL. This does not apply to anyone except in the draft. What I am inquiring about is where does the one who volunteers come in?

Mr. SWEET. He is inducted directly into the active service, and then comes under the provisions of the war-risk insurance act.

Mr. DOWELL. As soon as he takes the oath?

Mr. SWEET. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET].

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, let us have it reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SWEET: Page 4, line 20, after the word "he" strike out "has" and insert "shall have."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 25, after the word "person" strike out the word "dies" and insert in lieu thereof the word "died."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 1, strike out "becomes" and insert "became."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I have offered an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SNYDER: Page 5, line 10, after the word "valid" insert "Provided further, That every person inducted by the local draft board after October 11, 1918, who subsequently was rejected and not enrolled for active service at the place of mobilization, or who was recalled before acceptance and enrollment by reason of the signing of the armistice, shall, for the purposes of this act, be deemed to have been in active service for the period between such induction and rejection or recall."

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that if the opinion of the gentlemen present here is correct there should be some provision made for the class of men mentioned in the amendment I offer. They are men who were called, possibly on the 9th of November, and who were entrained and traveled part of the way to camp, and were then returned and discharged from the service without opportunity to take out insurance or without opportunity, on account of their short period in the service, to make application for compensation for any accident which might have occurred to them on their way back and forth. It also contemplates taking care of a man who had some accident befall him after he had been received at camp and rejected.

I do not understand that this section 31 takes care of this type of man except in a limited way. In other words, if a draftee had opportunity and had taken advantage of it and applied for insurance between the 18 or 20 hours he was on the train going to the camp, he would be entitled to be an applicant for this governmental insurance, but not having taken advantage of that, or not having had opportunity to take advantage of it at that time, he is now estopped for applying for that insurance.

Now, I had some boys in this war, and there were a good many boys up in my country who went, and it is my belief that up to this discussion here and now every single mother and father or sister or daughter of a man who went believed that he was a soldier of the United States Government the minute he was called by the draft board and sworn in.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes.

Mr. SWEET. What date has the gentleman placed in the amendment?

Mr. SNYDER. The date I have placed in the amendment, so far as it shall be retroactive, is one month previous to the signing of the armistice.

Mr. SWEET. That would be October 11, 1918.

Mr. SNYDER. Yes; October 11, 1918, one month previous to the signing of the armistice. I would make it retroactive to that extent only.

Mr. SWEET. And your amendment, as I understand it, simply relates to insurance?

Mr. SNYDER. No; it relates to insurance and also to compensation. I do not attempt to define what was active service or when a man is a soldier, as interpreted by the War Department. But I desire to have these two types of men which I have mentioned placed in the attitude in regard to this bill where they would have been if they had been actual soldiers under the ruling of the War Department.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Would they be entitled to the bonus?

Mr. SNYDER. No; they would not be entitled to the bonus unless some other act should pass to place them in the same position as my amendment would. They would be then entitled to the bonus.

I want to say here it is my judgment and belief that the people of this country would be pleased if the Congress would put those men who were drafted and sent to camp, even if they were recalled before they reached it, in the position where they might receive the bonus the same as those who went to war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, so far as the purpose of the gentleman's amendment is concerned, I am not particularly opposed to it; but the gentleman's amendment says that "the persons covered by the proviso shall be deemed to be in the active service," while those named in the proviso as it stands are not in active service; also, others under the military law are not in active service.

Mr. SNYDER. If the gentleman will yield, I may say I am not responsible for what is in the bill now, but I am trying to correct what is in the bill by my amendment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman's amendment provided that the persons named in his proviso should be entitled to compensation or insurance—whichever it may be—or both, as may be indicated, I do not know that I would oppose it. But as it stands now, it simply upsets all military law and all rules and regulations that we have now; and it would produce all sorts of confusion.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. So far as insurance is concerned, I will say to my colleague from Iowa that the first class of persons is covered by section 401, on pages 10 and 11.

Mr. SNYDER. It does not cover that.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] calls my attention to the same thing, so that this amendment covers that matter. It may be in conflict with some other provision.

Mr. SNYDER. It may be in conflict, but this amendment does not do what my amendment proposes to do.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to the gentleman that the inconsistency he has pointed out in this part of the amendment would be cured by an amendment that I have to offer.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Is it an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. HULINGS. No; it is not an amendment to the amendment. It is in the first part of the bill, whereas the gentleman's amendment is to add it to the bill. Section 31 should be amended so that a person shall be deemed to be in the active service in the military or naval forces of the United States within the meaning of this act who has received notice from the local draft board for induction, and who has in fact reported to said board, or in the case of a volunteer, from the moment he is sworn into the service.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The question I wanted to come to is this—and I regard it as very important: I do not think we ought to meddle with this matter of active service. It is not necessary to determine whether the soldier is entitled to insurance or not that we should use the term "active service" at all.

We could fix the time when he would be entitled to compensation or insurance; and I say that time ought to be as soon as he received any order from the Government, or as soon as he acted under orders from the Government. From that time he should be entitled to compensation and insurance while acting in pursuance of those orders.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If I have time.

Mr. BEGG. This question should be addressed to the Chair as a parliamentary inquiry: Is it possible to offer another amendment, that I think does what you want to do, before this question is disposed of?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I understand—although the Chair is the final authority—that the adoption or rejection of these amendments will not prevent the offering of other amendments, unless they are absolutely in conflict with an amendment already adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will answer the gentleman's parliamentary inquiry by saying that no amendment can be offered, except an amendment by way of substitute, until the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER] is disposed of.

Mr. ROGERS. I have an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. My time is slipping away, and I want a word more on this subject. It really seems to me as if this whole section ought to be redrafted, and that it would be a good plan to pass it over for that purpose. I doubt whether the section is as broad as the majority of the members of the committee would like to have it, and it could be expressed in very simple language, that the right of the soldier to insurance or compensation was to begin from the moment that he was acting under any orders from the Government.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute by Mr. ROGERS: Strike out all of lines 18 to 25, inclusive, on page 4, and all of lines 1 to 10, inclusive, on page 5, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That an inducted person shall be deemed to have been in active service in the military or naval service of the United States within the meaning of this act from and after the moment of induction."

Mr. ANDERSON. I make the point of order that that is not a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON. Let us have a vote on the pending amendment.

Mr. HULINGS. I offer the following substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. No vote can be taken on the amendment of the gentleman from New York as long as substitutes are properly presented. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. HULINGS: Page 4, line 20, after the word "have," strike out all down to the word "Provided," in line 23, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Received notice to report to the local draft board for induction, and has in fact reported to said board, or in case of a volunteer, from the moment he is sworn into the service."

Mr. ANDERSON. I make the point of order that the amendment is not in order as a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER].

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. SNYDER was rejected.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to offer.

Mr. HULINGS. I now offer my amendment.

Mr. BEGG. That was offered as a substitute.

Mr. HULINGS. I now offer it as an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HULINGS: Page 4, line 20, after the word "have," strike out all down to the word "Provided," in line 23, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Received notice to report to the local draft board for induction, and has in fact reported to said board, or in case of a volunteer, from the moment he is sworn into the service."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SWEET: Page 4, line 18, after the words "section 31," strike out all down to and including the word "Provided," in line 23, page 4.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, this will take out of the discussion all matter with reference to active service.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. Is the gentleman quite sure that by doing that he will take care of volunteers other than drafted men—officers and volunteers?

Mr. SWEET. Yes; I will say to the gentleman that I took this matter up with the Treasury Department as to whether this section applies simply to drafted men, and was informed that the question would not arise as to a man enlisting in the Navy or as to a volunteer in the Army, for the moment he took the examination he was inducted into the active service. That was the statement made to me.

Mr. OSBORNE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. OSBORNE. I ask for information. Every discharged soldier has a discharge which shows on its face when he enlisted and when he was discharged. Does this bill in any way mix up those dates? Would not the date which shows on the face of the discharge be the date that would control in this matter?

Mr. SWEET. I do not think that would affect it.

Mr. OSBORNE. In other words, the War Department has a method of deciding when a man went into the military service, and that date should be the controlling date and they ought not to be mixed up.

Mr. SWEET. That is not for the purposes of this act; that is for military purposes.

Mr. OSBORNE. Then I understand that the date upon which certain rights accrue under this bill might be a different date from that which the department certifies is the date of the man's entering into the service?

Mr. SWEET. Yes; it might.

Mr. OSBORNE. I should think that would be very awkward.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. In case the gentleman's amendment prevail and that part of the section be stricken out, whether or not a man who, on his way either to the camp or back from the camp, in case he was recalled before he had an opportunity to be inducted into mobilization, was injured, whether or not he would have an opportunity under this act to make application for compensation?

Mr. SWEET. I do not think it interferes with it at all.

Mr. SNYDER. Would he have the right to do so?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Would he have the right to apply for insurance?

Mr. SWEET. No; but if he had made application for insurance during that period it would be valid under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. SNYDER. That was the very point of my amendment.

Mr. SWEET. The gentleman must remember that every enlisted man had 120 days to apply for insurance, and if he did not apply he is not entitled to it.

Mr. SNYDER. But the man who was drafted and sent to camp and returned without being inducted into mobilization did not have 120 days to apply for insurance.

Mr. SWEET. That is true; but if he made application between the time of induction by the local draft board and before being accepted and enrolled for active service, then that insurance application is good. We further provide for automatic insurance during that period if he died or was totally disabled, and his dependents will get $25 a month in case of his death.

Mr. SNYDER. The thing I am trying to cover, and this does not seem to do it, is of a man who was called back by the armistice, and who during the day and night he was on his way had no opportunity to make application for insurance, and now he has got out of it.

Mr. SWEET. The gentleman is trying to make provision for men on the way to camp on the 11th of November, 1918?

Mr. SNYDER. That is the point; I think any man that was called at that time and put into the service is entitled to have at this late day the right to make application for Government insurance.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa, if his amendment prevails, if the proviso will change existing law; and if so, in what way? If the gentleman's amendment prevails, there will be portions of the sections which are now provisos but which will become substantive. Wherein will that portion of the section change existing law?

Mr. SWEET. At the present time the War Risk Insurance Bureau in administering the act holds that a man is in the active service as defined in the provision that I am about to strike out. That is the rule they follow. When the rest of this section is adopted, when it is passed, it will take care of men between the time they were inducted into the service by the local draft board up to the time they entered active service as construed by the War Risk Insurance Bureau.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to say by way of apology that I hesitate to oppose anything that comes from the chairman of any committee, but it strikes me as rather ludicrous to offer a section in any bill that seeks to point out the kind of application, if you please, or the remedy for some ill or injury suffered, then to incorporate in that paragraph two provisos making an exception, and then finally to have the chairman offer an amendment to cut out everything except the two provisos. I do not believe, if you cut out everything except the provisos, that you have done what you are trying to do. By the provisos you at least place the burden of proof upon the soldiers, and I do not believe that any further proof is needed than to show that the soldier has been examined by his local draft board and has been accepted and ordered to report at a certain place at a certain hour for a definite purpose. It seems to me that that ought to be absolute and conclusive proof, while on page 5 and in both of your provisos you say, provided he can prove that it was not due to willful neglect on his part. I do not believe that is accomplishing what we want to do.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. Yes.

Mr. DALLINGER. Suppose the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa is adopted and then an amendment is offered, which I had intended to offer, striking out the words "contracted or injury suffered in the line of duty," leaving in simply the words "not due to his own willful misconduct," and striking out all of the words beginning with "or" down to "injury" in the fifth line, so that it would read:

the person dies or becomes disabled as a result of disease not due to his own willful misconduct those entitled thereto shall receive the benefit.

And so forth. Would not that answer the very purpose we are after?

Mr. BEGG. That might answer it, but it seems to me there can not be anything any simpler than this proposition, and I want to say to the gentlemen of the committee, if the defining of what is "active service" is a bugaboo and is something we should not tamper with, we can leave it out and leave the language in the first part, providing that any person who is in the military service subject to the provisions of compensation and insurance and so on down to the word "act," and then insert "at the hour when he presents himself to his local draft board for transportation to the mobilization camp." If you do that, you do not leave a question of doubt, if I can understand the English language, and you have covered every case that you have been talking about, and you have not eliminated any of them, nor is the language complex or capable of being contested and interpreted in two or three different ways. I believe you are making a mistake if you hurriedly go into this thing and cut out the whole of the proposition and leave your proviso. That seems to me to be absolutely wrong and contrary to all of the practices that we have studied in composition.

Mr. HULINGS. Does that provide for the enlisted man, the volunteer?

Mr. BEGG. The volunteer is taken care of in the language—that any person shall be deemed to be in the military service subject to the provisions—

And so forth.

Mr. HULINGS. But the volunteers did not report to any board.

Mr. BEGG. They reported to somebody.

Mr. HULINGS. But you say the board.

Mr. BEGG. I do not say that. I say "at the hour when he presents himself for transportation to his mobilization camp."

Mr. HULINGS. The bulk of the volunteers belonged to organizations and half of the organizations were taken in intact and sworn in, and they were then in the service.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. FESS. In two minutes.

Mr. ESCH. Make it in two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin that all debate upon the section and all amendments thereto close in two minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending. The gentleman can present his amendment after debate is exhausted. Does the gentleman wish to speak to the amendment?

Mr. REED of New York. I would just like to speak about two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be read for the information of the committee.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. REED of New York: On page 5, line 3, after the word "misconduct," insert the words "involving moral turpitude"; and insert after the word "misconduct," in line 4, the words "involving moral turpitude."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I can see that it is the wish of every Member of this House to do absolute justice to the soldier. I am satisfied that there is no man here who wants to split hairs. As the language of the bill now reads, there is likely to be a great injustice done. Under the law, as it now reads, considerable injustice has been done. We know that the American boy has initiative and we know for that reason that he often transgresses the rules, which, of course, is construed as willful misconduct, if it results in disability under this act. I want to give just two examples: In France they had a rule that boys could not leave a train, but when they came into a small town many of them would leave the train and run across the way to get a sandwich. One of the boys was a little late in getting back, the door was closed on him, and both legs were cut off at the hip. Under the law, as it now reads, that accident resulting in disability happened as the result of his own willful misconduct and he was absolutely cut off from insurance or compensation. Another case on the other side was where an American boy was flying. They had established a certain zone near the front and beyond which he should not fly. He happened to get over the line, fell a thousand feet, and there was a total disability. Under the wording of the law he could not receive any compensation, he could not receive any insurance. Now, I have known cases, and there will be any number of them, where boys have transgressed the rules, not involving moral turpitude, which deprives them of the benefit of this law. I believe there should be some discretion given in such cases, and by agreeing to this amendment you will see that justice is done in a great many cases, which will not affect discipline now that the war is over. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 3, after the word "misconduct," insert the words "involving moral turpitude"; and after the word "misconduct," in line 4, insert the words "involving moral turpitude."

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. RAYBURN) there were—ayes 35, noes 13.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment on page 5 line 7, to strike out the word "further."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 7, after the word "Provided," strike out the word "further."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I have been trying for about an hour to get this amendment before the committee, and I would like to have it reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 7, after the numeral "III," insert:

"Provided, That if any person after registration, but prior to induction, shall die or become disabled as the result of a surgical operation submitted to by order of a local draft board, or whose physical disability is aggravated by reason of such surgical operation, he or those entitled thereto shall receive the benefits of compensation payable under Article III."

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. IGOE) there were—ayes 19, noes 32.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DALLINGER: Page 5, line 1, after the word "disease," strike out "contracted or injury suffered in the line of duty and," and in line 3, after the word "misconduct," strike out the words "or as a result of the aggravation in the line of duty and not because of his own willful misconduct, of an existing disease or injury."

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That the second paragraph of section 204 of the war-risk insurance act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"The family allowance shall be paid from the time of enlistment to death in or one month after discharge from the service, but not for more than four months after the termination of the present war emergency. No family allowance shall be made for any period preceding November 1, 1917. The payment shall be subject to such regulations as may be prescribed relative to cases of desertion and imprisonment and of missing men."

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HUDDLESTON: Page 5, line 16, after the words "the service," strike out the remainder of the sentence "but not for more than four months after the termination of the present war emergency."

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this section as it is reported by the committee is to cut out the present allowance and allotment feature of the soldiers' and sailors' insurance act. In other words, after the expiration of four months after the present emergency no allowance would be paid to a soldier's dependents. That is the purpose of the bill as reported by the committee. The purpose of my amendment is to retain that allowance feature during the future.

We have 110,000 men who have enlisted since the armistice was signed. A great many of those men went into the service having dependents. Practically every one of these went into the service with the expectation that during his period of service his dependents would receive the allowances given by the Government as provided by the existing law. If we cut off allowances to the dependents of all those soldiers, a great deal of suffering will result. A great many of these soldiers are men who served during the emergency, who were taken into the service as volunteers or as conscripted men. They re-enlisted, and have expected to continue to derive the same benefit they enjoyed theretofore, and to get the Government allowance for their dependents. There was a promise of these allowances held up to these men to induce them to enlist, and they enlisted in the expectation of getting them. There is a moral contract between the Government and these men who have enlisted under the existing law to pay these allowances to their dependents during the existence of their present period of enlistment. If we take away these allowances from these men who have enlisted, we will not only work a great hardship upon their dependents and cause a great deal of suffering among their wives, children, and mothers, but we will have broken the faith of our Government with these men. We will violate the implied pledge that we made them; we will change the terms of their contract; we will take away thereby a part of the compensation which they expected to get and which they would get under the existing law.

I submit we can not afford to take away these allowances unless we give these men who enlisted with the expectation of receiving them for their families the option of receiving their discharges. We ought to put them back in the same situation as when they enlisted. If we change that moral obligation, whether we violate a legal contract or not, we will do violence to good faith, and that we can not afford to do. These men may be called upon to undergo arduous service, perhaps to suffer a great deal. Their dependents at home will be caused to suffer by taking away these benefits that they had the right to count on. So that it seems to me we can not afford to put this law upon the books.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the answer to the argument by the gentleman from Alabama is found by merely reading the part of the old law that is proposed to be amended. The law as it exists at present is as follows:

The family allowance shall be paid from the time of enlistment to death in or one month after discharge from the service, but not for more than one month after the termination of the present war emergency.

The gentleman has appealed to us that we want to keep our contract, the agreement of our Government, with the soldier. Now, the gentlemen who prepared this bill not only proposed to keep our contract with the soldiers, but they went further and provided in the present proposed section, in the place of one month, the following:

But not for more than four months after the termination of the present war emergency.

So that the mere reading of the old section and the present proposed amendment answers all of the argument of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I have yielded the floor, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks for a division.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 6, noes 78.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HULINGS: Page 5, line 15, strike out all after the word "enlistment," in line 15, down to and including the words "to death in," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "until one month after the death of the soldier while in service."

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the section as it is presented here permits the family allowance to be paid in case of death up until that time, but if a soldier remains in the service the family allowance is paid for one month after his discharge, so that if the amendment should be adopted the section would read as follows: "The family allowance shall be paid from the time of enlistment until one month after the death of the soldier or after his discharge from the service," putting both the cases, one in case of death and the other in case of survival, on the same ground exactly.

Mr. ESCH. This is the language of the statute.

Mr. HULINGS. We are making a statute here now.

Mr. ESCH. Let us see if we are.

Mr. HULINGS. I suppose if the committee does not favor this very sensible and practical amendment it will go out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That a new section is hereby added to article 2 of the war-risk insurance act, to be known as section 211, and to read as follows:

"SEC. 211. That all family allowances and allotments payable by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance under the authority of this article shall be discontinued at the end of the fourth calendar month after the termination of the present war emergency, as declared by proclamation of the President of the United States, and thereafter all allotments of pay shall be voluntary and shall be made under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, respectively."

Mr. WEBSTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WEBSTER: Page 6, line 9, after the word "respectively," insert "Sec. 10½. That the second paragraph of subdivision (g) of section 301 of the war-risk insurance act is hereby amended to read as follows: 'If death occur or shall have occurred subsequent to April 6, 1917, and before discharge or resignation from service, the United States shall pay for funeral expenses and the return of the body to his home a sum not to exceed $100, as may be fixed by regulations.'"

Mr. WEBSTER. Mr. Chairman, the second paragraph of subdivision (g) of section 301 of the war-risk insurance act as it now stands reads as follows:

If the death occur before discharge or resignation from service the United States shall pay for burial expenses and the return of body to his home a sum not to exceed $100, as may be fixed by regulations.

It will be noted that this language is prospective in its operation only. The Bureau of War Risk Insurance very properly has held that it is not retroactive, and that in order for these funeral expenses to be allowed or awarded the death must have occurred subsequent to the taking effect of this act, which was on October 6, 1917. By that ruling there is an interim of six months between the declaration of war and the taking effect of the war-risk insurance act, where no funeral benefit is allowed, so that we have this incongruous situation: In cases where the soldier died subsequent to October 6, 1917, the Government makes this award not to exceed $100. If he died in the service of his country subsequent to the declaration of war but prior to October 6, 1917, no award is made.

It seems to me that if it is the policy of the Government to see to it that those men who died in the service of their country are afforded a suitable burial, there should be no discrimination, but the law should be made applicable to every soldier who gave up his life in the service of the country. The amendment proposed accomplishes this purpose.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBSTER. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman's amendment appears to me at first blush to be a very proper one, and I want to ask if it is a committee amendment, or if it is accepted by the committee?

Mr. WEBSTER. I have submitted the amendment to the chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. SWEET], to the ranking minority member [Mr. RAYBURN], to the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce [Mr. ESCH], and it meets with their approval.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, we have no objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WEBSTER].

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TREADWAY: Insert after line 9, page 6, the following:

"SEC. 10a. That a new section is hereby added to article 2 of the war-risk insurance act, to be known as section 212, and to read as follows:

"SEC. 212. That whenever an application for family allowance has been, or shall hereafter be, presented to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance by or on behalf of any person within class A, and it shall after due investigation be determined that the necessary relationship existed between such person and an enlisted man in the active military or naval service at the time when the application was made, and that compulsory allotment has not been waived or exemption therefrom granted, a family allowance shall be awarded and paid for the full period defined in section 204 hereof or for such part of said period as it shall be shown that the relationship existed, notwithstanding the fact that no deductions from the pay of the enlisted man for compulsory allotment in favor of such person have been made, and notwithstanding the further fact that the enlisted man has been discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States. (Wherever it appears that an enlisted man has been discharged from the service without having had deducted from his pay all or any part of the allotment which is made compulsory by the terms of the act, the amount of such allotment shall nevertheless be paid by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance to the person or persons entitled thereto out of any appropriation which may hereafter be made for the purpose of paying such allotments.) Any awards heretofore made which are inconsistent with the provisions of this section may upon application be reopened and made to conform herewith."

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to accomplish what I also tried to accomplish through the submission of a claims bill some weeks ago. That claims bill was presented by the chairman of the Committee on Claims [Mr. EDMONDS] to the department, and received an indorsement from the Secretary of the Treasury, from which I should like to read extracts.

Perhaps I should first explain the circumstances. They are these: A man entered the service about the time the war broke out. He had had a quarrel with his family. He left a wife and four children. He made no allotment to his wife. The wife claimed the compulsory allotment under class A. The marriage certificate, as well as the birth certificates of the children, were submitted to the department, and I have copies of them here. The pay—$15 per month—which should have been allotted to the wife would have carried with it the family allowance, the proper allowance according to law for the wife and children. The man's commanding officer was notified twice to check this compulsory allotment against the man's pay, the law providing, as you well know, that the allowance could not be paid unless the allotment was first deducted. For some unknown reason that allotment was never checked against the man's pay, and he was discharged in May last without a cent having been deducted for the allotment as provided by law.

The Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Carter Glass, under date of September 6, goes very minutely into the details of this case, and for the purpose of explaining the amendment which I have presented I will read the conclusion of his letter. If any Member desires the whole letter inserted in the RECORD I shall be very glad to put it all in. Secretary Glass says:

In conclusion, I would say that the bureau has before it quite a number of cases similar to that of Mrs. Beaudry, and of no less merit respecting the facts, and I would call to your attention H. R. 8074, which was introduced by Mr. TREADWAY on July 31, 1919, and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The bill purports to give relief in all cases such as the one under consideration, and it would seem that if relief were to be granted in cases of this nature it would be more appropriate and just to do so by a general act rather than by separate bills covering only individual cases.

Perhaps I should also read one other extract in reference to the notification sent by the department to check against the man's pay:

The delay from September 25, 1918, when proofs of relationship were completed, to March 24, 1919, when notice was sent to check Beaudry's pay for allotment to his family, was, it must be admitted, in part without apparent excuse.

Now, all the time this man was in the service his wife was deprived not alone of the allotment which under the law was compulsory to be made, but also of the family allowance, through no fault of hers.

The Secretary of the Treasury confirms the fact that the delay was, in part, without apparent excuse. He also says that instead of presenting the claim such as I did, by special bill, it would be fairer and more in keeping to present a general bill to cover all such similar cases. Consequently I asked for a further opinion from the Secretary of the Treasury, and I have this letter:

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, September 11, 1919.

Hon. ALLEN T. TREADWAY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN:

(1) H. R. 8151 for the relief of Mrs. Emma Beaudry.

(2) As to general amendment to war-risk insurance act to cover Beaudry and similar cases.

Responding to your request, by telephone, that I inform you respecting my views as to the advisability of an amendment to the war-risk insurance act which would give relief in all cases similar to that above noted, allow me to say:

1. That in my judgment such an amendment would afford relief to many worthy persons whose claims to allotment and allowance lack merit in law only and not in fact, and hence is desirable as a matter of justice.

2. That while H. R. 8074 is appropriate in a measure to accomplish the result above indicated as being desirable, yet it is not entirely so, nor in some respects is it aptly worded; and that if you so desire I shall take pleasure in having drawn and in submitting to you an amendment such as, in my judgment, would more adequately and appropriately meet the situation.

Sincerely, yours,
CARTER GLASS.

Conforming to the letter of the Secretary I have introduced an amendment prepared by his office. It was submitted to me this morning with the following letter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, September 11, 1919.

Hon. ALLEN T. TREADWAY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. TREADWAY: I am forwarding to you herewith a draft of a proposed amendment to H. R. 8778, to take the place of a typewritten amendment which, I understand, was drafted by Mr. SWEET and submitted to the Treasury Department this morning. The draft submitted is intended to accomplish the same purpose, but is believed to meet the situation more adequately and definitely. It is very broad in its terms and imposes a liability upon the United States, which is much broader than that imposed by the war-risk insurance act as it has been interpreted in the past by the bureau. It is not broader than it should be in order to do justice in such cases as the Beaudry case and others of a similar nature.

Very truly, yours,
R. H. HALLETT,
Acting Director.

The amendment I have submitted, Mr. Chairman, is the one referred to by Acting Director Hallett, and which, in his letter, he says is no broader than justice of such cases as this requires.

I have submitted these papers to the subcommittee—perhaps I have overburdened them in regard to this matter, but in a sense it seems quite important. The only question of difference between the subcommittee and myself is whether or not the allowance and the allotment should both be included in this form of an amendment. I claim they both should be included, because the beneficiary is entitled to the allotment from the soldier, and the papers of the department very clearly show in this case, as quite likely they do in similar cases to which it refers, that it is no fault of the beneficiary that the allotment has not been deducted and checked against the soldier's pay.

The whole question involved is whether or not we will protect the Government to the extent of not paying that allotment twice, or whether we would see that justice is done to such a woman as the wife to whom I have referred and to whom the department says payment should now be made. Therefore I submit the amendment in the form that it was drawn by the department for consideration by the committee.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK to the amendment of Mr. TREADWAY: After the words "United States" strike out the following language: "Wherever it appears that an enlisted man has been discharged from the service without having deducted from his pay all or any part of the allotment that is made compulsory by the terms of the act, the amount of such allotment shall, nevertheless, be paid by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance to the person or persons entitled to it out of any appropriation which may hereafter be made for the purpose of paying such allotment."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I am in thorough and hearty accord with the first part of the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], but I think the second paragraph of the amendment, which provides that the Government shall pay the compulsory allotment that was not deducted from the pay of the soldier and that was paid to him at the time of his discharge should be stricken out. In many cases this amount had been withheld from the soldier until the time of his discharge, but it was then included in the final settlement and, according to the view I take, became a closed transaction. I do not think there is any difference of opinion among any of us that the Government allowance ought to be paid to the wife and children, notwithstanding the soldier made no compulsory allotment and notwithstanding that fact was not discovered until he was released from the service. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] cites a case that makes rather a strong appeal, where there was an estrangement between the wife and husband, and he willfully failed to make an allotment, and there was no checkage against his pay, and none could be made after his discharge, and therefore under present law no allowance can be paid to the wife and children. That would be one of the classes of cases that we would expect to come up under an amendment of this kind, but I have a case in my own district that presents an entirely different phase of the matter, and which phase ought to be considered in determining whether or not we adopt this amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts or amend it as I propose. The case that was brought to my attention was a case of this kind: The soldier went into the Army in July, 1918. On July 30, 1918, he filed his allotment application and stated he had no dependents. He married August 25, 1918, after he had gone into the service, and of course under the law the wife was entitled to receive a compulsory allotment and a Government allowance, and the young man executed, so he says, a supplementary application in which he disclosed that he was married, but it seems the application was lost and never reached the War Risk Insurance Bureau. Finally the young fellow went overseas with the American Expeditionary Forces, and still the wife received no allotment and allowance, and in December, 1918, she took the matter up with me as her Congressman and asked me to assist her in getting it straightened out. I promptly brought the case to the attention of the War Risk Insurance Bureau. They looked up their files and found no allotment had been made and that the only application they had on file in his case was the one of July 30, 1918, which stated he was unmarried. They communicated with his officer over there in France about the checkage of his pay.

Along in January and again in February I wrote again and still no report, and letters passed to and fro between the War Risk Insurance Bureau and the War Department until finally in May, 1919, the soldier was discharged, paid off, and went back home to his wife, and inasmuch as there had been no deduction from his pay to pay allotment to his wife, there can now be no payment of the Government allowance until an amendment is adopted authorizing it. He has been paid, and yet if we adopt this amendment without my amendment the Government of the United States will pay the allotment, notwithstanding it has no fund belonging to the soldier to pay it from. There was no estrangement between the wife and the husband. There was no effort on his part to evade the payment. The Government, through the combination of facts which I have stated, did not succeed in making a check-up on his pay, and no allotment and allowance was paid, and the soldier received all of the money that was due him and went home to his wife and presumably took the money home that was paid him on final settlement. Are we to say that the Government ought to make an appropriation to pay that compulsory allotment for each and every month that the soldier was in the service after the marriage relation was assumed?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK. The position I take is this: All that the Government owed as a debt was the allowance. It unquestionably owed that. The money that it should have paid as an allotment was the money that the soldier owed. The Government of the United States owed it to the soldier and the soldier owed it to his wife, and the Government stood there as the custodian of the fund, and would have paid it over as a compulsory allotment but for the fact that it was one of those cases that were not straightened out until after the soldier's discharge.

Cases have arisen of the two kinds that we have mentioned where the soldier willfully failed to do his duty, and cases where errors crept in, and of course there may be other cases of still a different combination of facts; but my contention is that all that the Government is morally responsible for, and it unquestionably is responsible for that, is to pay the allowance from the very time that the wife and children were entitled to receive it.

Under the law in the case cited by the gentleman from Massachusetts, the wife and four children would be entitled to receive, I believe, $52.50 as Government allowance per month.

Mr. TREADWAY. That would include the allotment, would it not?

Mr. BLACK. Possibly so. I am not exactly clear about the amount unless I should take the time to refer to the act, but any way, whatever it is, the Government ought to go back and make a checkage of it and pay the entire allowance. I do not think there is any dispute about that. The only effect of the amendment I have offered would be to so change the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] that the War Risk Insurance Bureau would go back and check up all of these cases and pay the Government allowance, but would not undertake to pay the compulsory allotment that has already been paid to the soldier in his final settlement at time of his discharge.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. As I understand the gentleman, the law allowed this to the wife? The wife was entitled to receive the allotment under the law?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But the Government did not pay it to the wife because of the construction they put on the law at the War Risk Insurance Bureau? Why did they not pay it to the wife?

Mr. BLACK. If the gentleman will permit me, the situation is this: The Government did not pay the allowance, because it had no authority under the law to pay the allowance unless the compulsory allotment was made. Many cases were like this: The soldier went into the Army a single man and filed his application, showing that he had no dependents, and then subsequently he married. Also there were cases where the soldier deliberately concealed the fact that he had a wife or children. There were probably not many cases of that sort, but there were some.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The law only allowed on the application.

Mr. BLACK. No; the allotment was compulsory to wife and children, but unless the soldier disclosed these relations in his application the War Risk Bureau had no way of knowing. The truth of the matter is that the wife should not be cut out of the allowance; that is quite clear.

Mr. MACCRATE. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. MACCRATE. I ask that the gentleman may have two more minutes to answer a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MACCRATE. Does not the gentleman think that a wise limitation on all of these payments would be to put in a provision that no money shall be paid to anyone if they have made no claim during the war?

Mr. BLACK. I do not. I think the wife very clearly and unmistakably is entitled to the allowance, unless the soldier was granted an exemption from compulsory allotment in accordance with provision of the present law. Of course, there are cases where the soldier was entitled to exemption and she should not benefit——

Mr. MACCRATE. The gentleman does not quite understand. If the Government has already paid to some one else the allotment, and the wife, as in the case of the gentleman from Massachusetts, made a claim, she certainly should get it, but had she made no claim during the period where the money had been paid to some one else, does the gentleman think the Government ought to make a duplicate payment?

Mr. BLACK. My position is this: I think if a man was legally married and did not have the right to be exempt from compulsory allotment, the wife and the children are absolutely entitled to the Government allowance without qualification.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, my colleague has so thoroughly covered this proposition that I do not desire to take up the time of the committee very long, but I do seriously urge upon the committee the consideration of this proposition and I do trust that the amendment of the gentleman from Texas to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] will be adopted. Now, if this amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts is adopted in toto, then it matters not. The man and his wife may not be living separate after he comes back from the war and he has drawn $30 a month and spent it. If this is enacted into law, then he and his wife, when they get back together, will draw $15 a month more pay from the Government for every month he served added to the allowance they would have gotten from the beginning at the time that the award should have been made and further proof made. It seems to me as if we were becoming just a little bit reckless here in passing money around.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. RAYBURN. I will.

Mr. TREADWAY. It is largely based on the statement made by his colleague from Texas relative to the payment to a man being his wages. I personally would like to ask the gentleman's view as to whether or not he considers the law providing that this money, $15 a month, must be taken out of his pay for his wife and family is the man's pay? I do not so consider it. I consider she as the wife has a lien on that amount of his wages. We raised the pay of the men during the war for the purpose of caring for their families at home.

Mr. RAYBURN. But the wife did not get the money.

Mr. TREADWAY. Through no fault of hers.

Mr. RAYBURN. The Government does not have the money; the man got the money and spent it; therefore I do not see why the further allowance provided in the first part of the gentleman's amendment should be paid by the Government, but the House can do as it pleases about this matter; I am simply calling attention to the matter that we are a little reckless.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The Government merely became the agent of the soldier by which this part of his pay was transferred to his wife?

Mr. RAYBURN. That is true.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Now that the man spent all of the money and did not use the Government as his agent, ought it to be retroactive?

Mr. RAYBURN. I think not.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. FIELDS. To oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has already been exhausted. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

The question was then taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I think I would like to ask for a division on that.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes 6.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The vote is on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I rise to offer an amendment to section 10, offering it as a new section.

Mr. SWEET. Mr Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. With the understanding, of course, that this amendment can be offered to-morrow.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will be in the same position as he is now in, so far as that is concerned. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET], that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8778) to amend and modify the war-risk insurance act. had come to no resolution thereon.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. GOOD, from the Committee on Appropriations, presented a bill (H. R. 9205) making appropriations to supply deficiencies for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, which, with the accompanying report was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. BLANTON reserved all points of order.

RECEPTION TO GEN. PERSHING.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to present a report of the joint committee appointed to arrange a joint session of the House and Senate to welcome Gen. Pershing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to present a report of the joint committee referred to. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MONDELL presented the following report from the joint committee appointed to arrange for a welcome to Gen. John J. Pershing.

The joint committee appointed in accordance with the provisions of House concurrent resolution 29, consisting of five Members of the United States Senate and seven Members of the House of Representatives, for the purpose of making arrangements for appropriate exercises in welcome of Gen. John J. Pershing, general of the Armies of the United States and commander in chief of the American Expeditionary Forces during the World War, with instructions to report to the Senate and House of Representatives such program and procedure as the joint committee deems fitting and appropriate, begs leave to report as follows:

The joint committee recommends that there be held, in the Hall of the House of Representatives, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon of Thursday, September 18, 1919, a joint session of the Congress, at which session it is suggested that the Vice President, or in his enforced absence, the President pro tempore of the Senate, shall make an address of welcome on the part of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall make an address of welcome on the part of the House. It is further suggested that in the event of the passage of the pending resolution authorizing the gift by the Congress of a sword of honor to Gen. Pershing, the Hon. CHAMP CLARK, a Member from the State of Missouri and former Speaker of the House of Representatives, be selected to make an address of presentation.

The joint committee suggests that invitations be extended to the President of the United States, the members of the Cabinet, the Chief Justice and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court, and such officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps as the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, respectively, may suggest. The joint committee further recommends the adoption of a concurrent resolution which will permit the completion of the arrangements for the holding of the joint session.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution to carry out the recommendation of the joint committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 31.

Resolved, etc., That a joint session of the Senate and House of Representatives be held in the Hall of the House of Representatives at 2 o'clock on the afternoon of Thursday, September 18, 1919, in welcome of John J. Pershing, General of the Armies of the United States and Commander in Chief of the American Expeditionary Forces of the World War. That the program and procedure at such joint session shall be in accordance with the report of the joint committee of the Senate and House appointed under House concurrent resolution 29. That the said committee is hereby authorized to make all necessary arrangements for such joint session, and that all expenses incurred by the committee in the execution of the provisions of this resolution shall be paid, one-half from the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is necessary to discuss the resolution at length. It is simple and clear in its provisions and I do not care to detain the House unless some gentleman desires to make inquiries with regard to it.

Mr. RAYBURN. One question, Mr. Speaker. There is in that resolution or in the report something about the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy inviting folks here. We have been getting one ticket to the gallery, and if they invite everybody who seeks to be invited by them, I do not know where we are going to put them.

Mr. MONDELL. I would say for the information of the gentleman that the chairman of the joint committee has addressed a communication to each of the Secretaries—has written such a communication and will send to each of the Secretaries if the House adopts this resolution a letter—advising these gentlemen of the action of the House and suggesting that they name a specified number of officers. Those officers will be provided for on the floor of the House. They will not occupy seats in the galleries.

Mr. RAYBURN. One other question. We have been getting one ticket heretofore on the average—each one of us gets one ticket—and somebody has 100 or 200 tickets over each time. It looks to me as if these galleries might be big enough to permit two tickets to be given each Member of the House and Senate. There are not enough seats to seat that number of people, but each time I see people standing in the galleries, and I thought those people who stood in the galleries might as well come in on our tickets as on the tickets of some one not a Member of the House.

Mr. MONDELL. The resolution as presented, of course, has nothing to do with the gallery seats.

Mr. RAYBURN. I understand. I thought I would just make that suggestion.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman knows that the seating capacity of the galleries covers exactly one seat for each Member and each Senator, or nearly exactly. I believe there are two seats over or two seats short; I have forgotten which. In addition there are at times and have been at times some extra tickets issued, with a view to having a certain number of people occupy seats in the aisles.

Mr. Speaker, I ask for the consideration of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. DEWALT, for five days, on account of important business.

To Mr. JOHN W. RAINEY, at the request of Mr. GALLAGHER, indefinitely, on account of death and sickness in his family.

To Mr. SABATH, for five days, on account of death in his family.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SLEMP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of my trip to France.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of his trip to France. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

OBSERVANCE OF LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is there any parliamentary method properly to be pursued to prevent the insertion in the RECORD, under leave to print, of a matter clearly without the conditions of the consent granted by the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not certain. Of course, ordinarily that rests with the honor and conscience of the gentleman who has the leave. At the same time, if the question were raised, the House could equally prevent it, presumably. Inasmuch as the House can certainly strike from the RECORD any violation of the leave, it strikes the Chair at first blush that if it is brought to the attention of the House the House could equally prevent it. At the time the House gives the leave to print, it is given with a condition, and it is presumed, I suppose, that the Members would observe that condition. I do not see how it could be proved that a Member did not intend to observe it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Suppose it comes to the knowledge of a Member of the House that a matter is intended to be printed in the RECORD that is clearly without and outside of the conditions whereunder express leave is granted. Has a Member no remedy until the time that matter shall appear printed in the RECORD? Is there no way of preventing the clear violation not only of the rules but of the consent given to the Member by the House of Representatives, and so stated by the Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes the House could prevent anything being printed in the RECORD. The Chair would say that at first blush.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, would it not be much easier for the Chair to rule, and very much more to the enlightenment of the House, if a concrete case were actually before the Speaker and the House—such a case as the gentleman from Ohio obviously has in mind?

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly it would.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The "gentleman from Ohio" will be glad to state what he has in mind. The recollection of the gentleman is very clear, although he has not that part of the record before him, where consent was given to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] to print certain matters in connection with the speech he was delivering, to wit, the speech criticizing the conduct of the Department of Labor and referring to a number of persons connected with the Department of Labor and to the persecution which he alleged he was being subjected to by officials of that department. He thereupon asked consent, in order not to take up the time of the House, to print certain matters relative to the matter which he was discussing. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] thereupon arose and objected, whereupon the gentleman from Texas hoped that the gentleman would not object because he only intended, as he said, to print such matters, letters, figures, and facts as related to the speech that he was making.

After some little debate the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] withdrew his objection, in consideration of the fact that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] agreed to print only such matters as related to his speech, consisting of facts, figures, and letters, and, as I understood it, not mentioning any Member of the House. The Speaker thereupon said, "Under such conditions leave is granted." If I am wrong about that, I shall be glad to be corrected.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. I have not my notes, but I have been trying to get them since the gentleman has raised the question. If the gentleman will show me anything to which he objects in the part of my speech that was not delivered on the floor, I will gladly eliminate it. I thought I had cut out every single thing to which the gentleman could possibly take exception.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will say to the gentleman that this is not a personal matter with me.

Mr. BLANTON. If there is anything in there that the gentleman does not like, I will gladly eliminate it.

Mr. MONDELL. This is not a question of "anything the gentleman from Ohio does not like."

Mr. LONGWORTH. This is a matter far beyond any personal feeling. I have no personal grievance in the matter, absolutely none. My only interest is as a Member of this House to see that the rules and etiquette of debate are preserved, particularly in the matter of the extension of remarks in the RECORD, where the House gives a Member leave to print certain things, specifying them, and eliminating others, which leave is a courtesy to the Member. Under those circumstances I think gentlemen should be most scrupulous in carrying out not only the letter but the spirit of the consent granted by the House.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from Ohio a copy of the part which violates the rule?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I have one paragraph.

Mr. BLANTON. I should like to know what there is that the gentleman states is without the rule. I should like to have him put me on notice of the indictment he makes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I shall be very glad to read it, or I will show it to the gentleman and leave it for him to determine.

Mr. BLANTON. If you will just show it to me, I will be glad——

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think the House ought to know about it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if the gentleman reads it it will go into the RECORD.

Mr. BLANTON. That is the reason——

The SPEAKER. That is the very thing the gentleman is endeavoring to prevent.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Then I will move to strike it out of the RECORD.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will submit it to me, I will gladly eliminate it if it is wrong.

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair that that would be the easiest way.

Mr. BLANTON. In eliminating this, I do it at the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio; but in so doing I do not admit that it in any way violated the rule or the consent, because I believe the Chair would hold that it comes within the terms of the consent as limited by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO]; but to meet the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio I will gladly eliminate it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That will be satisfactory to me.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 57 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Friday, September 12, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

By Mr. WOOD of Indiana: Petition of sundry citizens of Whiting and Hammond, Ind., protesting against the enactment of the Smith-Towner educational bills into law; to the Committee on Education.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, September 12, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we thank Thee for giving to us the supreme privilege of living under a banner that stands for Thy thought in human life and human government. Thou hast given our fathers wisdom to guide the affairs of this State, and we pray that Thou wilt give to us the same wisdom, that with due regard to the unchanging principles of righteousness as Thou has revealed them unto us we may conduct the business of this Nation, and thus lift humanity to higher levels of life. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in order to save time by having the routine morning business transacted at once, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	Nelson	Stanley
Ball	Harris	Newberry	Sterling
Bankhead	Harrison	Nugent	Thomas
Capper	Henderson	Overman	Townsend
Chamberlain	Johnson, S. Dak.	Page	Trammell
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Phipps	Underwood
Culberson	Kellogg	Pomerene	Wadsworth
Dillingham	Keyes	Robinson	Walsh, Mass.
Edge	Kirby	Sheppard	Watson
Fletcher	McCumber	Sherman	Williams
France	McKellar	Smith, Ga.	Wolcott
Frelinghuysen	McLean	Smoot
Gerry	Myers	Spencer

Mr. SMOOT. I was requested to announce the absence of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] on official business. I wish also to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is detained by illness in his family.

Mr. FRANCE. I desire to announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] are absent on official business, engaged in committee work.

Mr. KIRBY. I announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] on official business.

Mr. GERRY. I wish to announce that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is detained by illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day. I wish also to announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] is necessarily absent from the Senate on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution providing that a joint session of the Senate and House of Representatives be held in the Hall of the House of Representatives at 2 o'clock on the afternoon of Thursday, September 18, 1919, in welcome of John J. Pershing, General of the Armies of the United States and Commander in Chief of the American Expeditionary Forces of the World War, etc.; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a memorial of the governors' conference at Salt Lake City, Utah, relative to Federal aid for highway construction, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present resolutions of the Grand Lodge of Maryland, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, relating to the holiday to be declared in honor of Gen. Pershing, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it resolved, That we, the Grand Lodge of Maryland of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, on behalf of the entire Order of Odd Fellows, a fraternal organization founded on the Bible and representative of every trade, craft, and calling, do hereby in the true spirit of the order as enunciated by the moral precepts of friendship, love, and truth and those of its component bodies manifesting themselves in a spirit of malice toward none and love toward all do petition the Congress of the United States to set aside the 18th day of September, A. D. 1919, as a legal holiday for the purpose of paying homage and tribute in the true American spirit to Gen. Pershing and the heroes of the First Division.

Done this 10th day of September, A. D. 1919, and the one hundred and forty-third year of the Declaration of Independence. Whereas we have hereunto set our hands and seal.

JOHN B. SPENCE, Grand Master.

Attest:
WILLIAM A. JONES,
Grand Secretary.

Mr. SHERMAN. I also present three letters which I wish to have printed in the RECORD without reading them. They are all dated September 10, 1919. One is from Mr. E. de St. Giles, special agent of the Massachusetts Mutual Life Insurance Co., of Springfield, Mass. Another is from H. S. Vail & Sons, of Chicago, Ill. They are life insurance actuaries. The other is from Simon S. Day & Co., of Chicago, who are grain, stock, and provision brokers of that city. These three letters, two of them coming from widely different points in the United States, relate to the same subject, to wit, the immediate ratification of the peace treaty.

I call attention to the singular coincidence of two human minds so widely separated as Springfield, Mass., and Chicago, Ill., writing letters to me couched in precisely the same language. I am not so much a believer in telepathy or in the mysterious communications of the human mind yet unsolved by modern science, but this is a most remarkable piece of evidence that something of that kind must exist which has not yet been solved by psychology. I present these three letters for telepathists hereafter to take note of.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., September 10, 1919.

Hon. LAWRENCE Y. SHERMAN,
United States Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: In our business we come in contact daily with those citizens who earn an income above necessary expenditure. We have peculiar opportunities for learning the opinions of successful men, and in the light of our gathered information we have no hesitancy in saying that in the opinion of men of affairs in Chicago the supreme need of the hour is the ratification of the peace treaty.

The peace treaty may not be perfect, but it is the utmost that could have been obtained. Necessarily, it arose from compromises, but its main purpose is clear, and that purpose is to prevent future wars.

We conceive it to be the duty of the constructive statesmen to support what can not be met with an alternative of higher value. There is no such alternative to the peace treaty. What the people demand is an absence of partisanship and prompt action by the Senate.

We call upon you as one of our Senators to use your power to the utmost to secure the ratification of this treaty by the Senate of the United States without alteration or amendment that may threaten its adoption by the other powers.

May we rely upon you to do your utmost to bring about this result?

Yours, very truly,

E. DE ST. GILES.

J. GEO. R. GRAHAM.
WINFIELD S. DAY.

Mr. CAPPER presented memorials of sundry citizens of McDonald, Hartford, Jewell, and Crawford counties, all in the State of Kansas, remonstrating against universal military training, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented petitions of sundry postal clerks and letter carriers of Escanaba, Mich., Port Arthur, Tex., and of the Wisconsin Rural Letter Carriers' Association, praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. KEYES presented a petition of sundry citizens of Berlin, N. H., praying for the repeal of the tax on ice cream, sodas, and soft drinks, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PAGE presented a petition of Local Grange No. 321, Patrons of Husbandry, of Chester, Vt., praying for the ratification of the league of nations treaty, which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. JONES of Washington, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 102) to equalize the pay and allowances of commissioned officers, warrant officers, and enlisted men of the Coast Guard with those of the Navy, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 181) thereon.

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1448) for the relief of Jacob Nice, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report (No. 183) thereon.

CHINCOTEAGUE ISLAND (VA.) BRIDGES.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce, I report back favorably, with amendments, the bill (S. 2961) authorizing the county of Accomac, Va., to construct certain bridges to connect Chincoteague Island and the mainland, and I sumit a report (No. 184) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendments were, in line 4, after the word "operate," to insert ", at points suitable to the interests of navigation"; in line 6, after the words "Cockle Creek," to strike out "Queens Sound" and insert "Queen Sound"; and in line 7, after the word "and," to strike out "Blacks Narrows" and insert "Black Narrows," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the county of Accomac, in the State of Virginia, be, and it is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate, at points suitable to the interests of navigation, six highway bridges and approaches thereto across Mosquito Creek, Cockle Creek, Queen Sound, Wire Narrows, Black Narrows, and Chincoteague Channel for the purpose of connecting Chincoteague Island to the mainland, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEVELOPMENT OF WATER POWER.

Mr. JONES of Washington. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably with amendments the bill (H. R. 3184) to create a Federal Power Commission and to define its powers and duties, to provide for the improvement of navigation, for the development of water power, for the use of lands of the United States in relation thereto, to repeal section 18 of "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved August 8, 1917, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 180) thereon.

I desire to give notice that at the first opportunity I shall call up the bill for consideration, and if necessary try to make it the unfinished business, so that if there should be any time when the league of nations is not being considered we might consider this proposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

LOAN OF TENTS.

Mr. KIRBY. I report from the Committee on Military Affairs the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 95) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the city of Atlanta, Ga., tents, cots, horses, and saddle equipments for the use of United Confederate Veterans in their convention from October 7 to 10, 1919, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. It provides for the loaning of tents and other equipment to the Confederate reunion to be held in Atlanta, Ga. I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution may be immediately considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the amendment of the committee be read.

The amendment was to strike out all after the resolving clause and to insert:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to loan, in his discretion, under such rules and regulations, including a cash deposit, should the Secretary deem such necessary, as the Secretary may prescribe, to the reunion executive committee of Atlanta, for the use of the United Confederate Veterans, in their encampment to be held in Atlanta from October 7 to October 10, 1919, such tents, cots, blankets, and other camp equipment as the Secretary of War, in his discretion, deems sufficient for the purpose of the encampment: Provided, That no expense shall be caused the United States Government by delivery and return of said property, the same to be delivered to said committee at such time prior to the holding of said encampment as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of War and the chairman and treasurer of said committee: Provided further, That the Secretary of War, before delivering said cots, tents, blankets, and other camp equipment to the committee, shall take from the chairman and treasurer of said reunion executive committee of Atlanta a bond with good and sufficient security for the safe return of said property in good order and condition, the same to be without expense to the United States Government.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I hope there will be no objection upon the part of any Senator to the consideration of the joint resolution. This is probably the last time we shall ever come before the Senate with a request for such legislation. Last year in my campaign in Georgia for the Senate loyalty to the Government was the issue, and in a hundred counties I challenge any man to show that the son or the grandson of a Confederate soldier was a slacker or in sympathy with a slacker. I hope the joint resolution will pass without any objection.

Mr. SMOOT. I merely want to ask one question of the Senator reporting the joint resolution. I notice it includes a provision for the loan of blankets. Are blankets generally included in such resolutions?

Mr. KIRBY. Not generally, but the idea was that there is secondhand equipment at a cantonment in that vicinity which can be used. It is provided that the Secretary of War may lend them because there is no possibility of holding the reunion unless blankets can be provided. The town is full, and the reunion could not otherwise be held. The Secretary of War may require a cash deposit for the renovation of the blankets that are to be used if they are loaned and to cover any damage that may be done to them.

Mr. SMOOT. I want the Senator to know that I have no objection at all to the joint resolution covering tents and such other supplies, but in former resolutions we have, I think, never included the loan of blankets.

Mr. KIRBY. They are only to be used under the provisions of the joint resolution, which requires a cash deposit.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, there are several instances where that has been done. I have copies of similar resolutions.

Mr. SMOOT. I can not recall any of them.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have two or three of them here before me.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not going to question it. I take it for granted that if the blankets are loaned whatever damage may be done to them may be repaired under the cash deposit.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The committee in charge of the reunion are required to make a deposit of cash which will avoid any trouble that might ensue if bond merely was required, and anything that is found to be lacking after the reunion is over can be replaced from their deposit.

Mr. KIRBY. That is the idea.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SIOUX INDIAN CLAIMS.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. From the Committee on Indian Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 1018) authorizing the Sioux Tribe of Indians to submit claims to the Court of Claims, and I submit a report (No. 185) thereon. There is no objection anywhere to the bill, which has been delayed in the committee for three months on account of inadvertence on my part. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to ask the Senator reporting the bill if there has been a favorable report on it submitted by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Yes; the bill has been favorably reported upon by the Secretary of the Interior, and has passed the Senate twice heretofore.

Mr. SMOOT. I wondered whether this was the bill that passed the Senate previously.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. It is the same bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, and it was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all claims of whatsoever nature which the Sioux Tribe of Indians may have against the United States, which have not heretofore been determined by the Court of Claims, may be submitted to the Court of Claims, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States by either party, for determination of the amount, if any, due said tribe from the United States under any treaties, agreements, or laws of Congress, or for the misappropriation of any of the funds of said tribe, or for the failure of the United States to pay said tribe any money or other property due; and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the Court of Calims, with the right of either party to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, to hear and determine all legal and equitable claims, if any, of said tribe against the United States, and to enter judgment thereon.

SEC. 2. That if any claim or claims be submitted to said courts they shall settle the rights therein, both legal and equitable, of each and all the parties thereto notwithstanding lapse of time or statutes of limitation, and any payment which may have been made upon any claim so submitted shall not be pleaded as an estoppel, but may be pleaded as an offset in such suits or actions, and the United States shall be allowed credit for all sums heretofore paid or expended for the benefit of said tribe or any band thereof. The claim or claims of the tribe or band or bands thereof may be presented separately or jointly by petition, subject, however, to amendment, suit to be filed within five years after the passage of this act; and such action shall make the petitioner or petitioners party plaintiff or plaintiffs and the United States party defendant, and any band or bands of said tribe or any other tribe or band of Indians the court may deem necessary to a final determination of such suit or suits may be joined therein as the court may order. Such petition, which shall be verified by the attorney or attorneys employed by said Sioux Tribe or any bands thereof, shall set forth all the facts on which the claims for recovery are based, and said petition shall be signed by the attorney or attorneys employed, and no other verification shall be necessary. Official letters, papers, documents, and public records, or certified copies thereof, may be used in evidence, and the departments of the Government shall give access to the attorney or attorneys of said tribe or bands thereof to such treaties, papers, correspondence, or records as may be needed by the attorney or attorneys for said tribe or bands of Indians.

SEC. 3. That upon the final determination of such suit, cause, or action the Court of Claims shall decree such fees as it shall find reasonable to be paid the attorney or attorneys employed therein by said tribe or bands of Indians under contracts negotiated and approved as provided by existing law, and in no case shall the fee decreed by said Court of Claims be in excess of the amounts stipulated in the contracts approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior, and no attorney shall have a right to represent the said tribe or any band thereof in any suit, cause, or action under the provisions of this act until his contract shall have been approved as herein provided. The fees decreed by the court to the attorney or attorneys of record shall be paid out of any sum or sums recovered in such suits or actions, and no part of such fees shall be taken from any money in the Treasury of the United States belonging to such tribe or bands of Indians in whose behalf the suit is brought unless specifically authorized in the contract approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior as herein provided: Provided, That in no case shall the fees decreed by said court amount to more than 10 per cent of the amount of the judgment recovered in such cause.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REGULATION OF STEAM VESSELS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I submit a favorable report from the Committee on Commerce on a bill of considerable importance, but one that is very simple.

Under title 52 of the navigation laws the ships of the merchant marine navigating in waters of the United States are subjected to certain forms of inspection. A controversy has arisen as to whether or not the ships owned and controlled and operated by the Shipping Board are subject to these regulations. These are merchant ships, doing merchant business, and there is no reason why they should not be subjected to the same restrictions and the same limitations in the interest of protecting life and property as similar ships doing the same kind of business in private hands. The bill that I am reporting is a bill that subjects them to these provisions. I will say that the bill has the hearty approval of the Shipping Board and also of the Department of Commerce; and therefore I ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington makes a favorable report on a bill, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 633) extending the provisions for the regulation of steam vessels to vessels owned or operated by the United States Shipping Board, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all steam vessels owned or operated by the United States Shipping Board, or any corporation organized or controlled by it, shall be subject to all the provisions of title 52 of the Revised States of the United States for the regulation of steam vessels and acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN:

A bill (S. 2993) authorizing the payment of certain sums of money to Michael Bohle, Allen P. Myers, Alexander L. McMillan, Edward N. Riley, E. S. Tucker, Harry B. Landgraf, and Christopher Lehmkuhl; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 2994) to provide revenue, and for the regulation and supervision of cold-storage warehouses, and the conservation, storage, sale, and distribution of food and food products; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. CAPPER:

A bill (S. 2995) granting an increase of pension to Susan A. Hackett (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WALSH of Montana:

A bill (S. 2996) granting a pension to Johanna Mary McElliott; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McKELLAR:

A bill (S. 2997) to provide quarters or commutation thereof to commissioned officers in certain cases; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

COUNCIL AND ASSEMBLY OF LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. ASHURST. I ask that the bill I introduced yesterday be now given its second reading.

The bill (S. 2986) to provide for the election of the representatives of the United States on the council and the assembly of the league of nations, and for other purposes, was read the second time by its title and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

EMPLOYMENT OF STENOGRAPHER.

Mr. McNARY submitted the following resolution, S. Res. 185, which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-sixth Congress to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate.

RAILROAD PASSES.

Mr. SHERMAN. I also present—I had almost overlooked it—the news item, dated August 30, 1919, taken from the Washington Star, announcing the sad misadventure of Robert H. McAdoo, whose railroad pass over the steam railways of the United States and his Pullman pass were by some sacrilegious thief stolen and have been in constant use at various points in the United States since then. He is not connected, so far as I know, with the railway service, and it seems to be a case of governmental favoritism which the rest of us do not receive. I thought it ought to be noted. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"TOURS WEST DE LUXE ON RAILROAD PASS STOLEN FROM M'ADOO.

"PHILADELPHIA, August 30, 1919.

"Somebody is having an extended vacation on a railroad pass stolen from Robert H. McAdoo, son of the former Director of Railroads. When last heard of the thief was visiting the Grand Canyon of Arizona. Earlier in the season he was in the Yellowstone and Yosemite Parks. He was traveling in a Pullman, too, for he had not failed to take the pasteboard that gave Robert the right to ride apart from plebeians.

"Believing the thief will not consider his vacation itinerary complete without a visit to Atlantic City the Railroad Administration has posted notices in conductors' rooms in the Camden terminals to be on the lookout for the stolen passes.

"In the meantime Robert has had issued to him another pass that gives him the right to ride free over the railroads."

RAILROAD CONTROL.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I present the article, which I send to the desk, on transportation, national ownership, and private operation, which I desire to have referred to the Committee on Printing with a view to having it printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

INDUSTRIAL WORKERS OF THE WORLD.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I have before me a communication from counsel of one of the large industrial plants of New Jersey calling attention to a general strike which was ordered in that plant by the Industrial Workers of the World. It has resulted in a complete shutdown of this industry. In the letter from my correspondent is inclosed a copy of the application for membership in the organization referred to. I send it to the desk and ask to have the Secretary read it for the information of the Senate. In presenting it I quote a portion of the letter from the lawyer, who writes me as follows:

I send you herewith copy of the application for membership which is being circulated among the employees. So far as we can ascertain trouble of this kind comes chiefly from aliens. If there is any hesitation upon the part of Congress about adopting a strict deportation law, applications of this kind ought to convince them that we are playing with fire.

We have appealed to the Department of Justice in Perth Amboy and also in New York, but they feel that the matter is one for the local police and that no Federal law is being violated. The general purport of the application seems to me to be an appeal to the workingman to destroy property; that is, to overthrow capital.

I ask that the application blank referred to may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

APPLICATION FOR MEMBERSHIP.

[Application No. —. Membership Card No. —.]

Date ——— ———, 19—.

The working class and the employing class have nothing in common. There can be no peace so long as hunger and want are found among millions of working people and the few who make up the employing class have all the good things of life.

Between these two classes struggle must go on until the workers of the world organize a class, take possession of the earth and the machinery of production, and abolish the wage system.

We find that the centering of the management of industries into fewer and fewer hands makes the trade-unions unable to cope with the ever-growing power of the employing class. The trade-unions foster a state of affairs which allows one set of workers to be pitted against another set of workers in the same industry, thereby helping defeat one another in wage wars. Moreover, the trade-unions aid the employing class to mislead the workers into the belief that the working class have interests in common with their employers.

These conditions can be changed and the interest of the working class upheld only by an organization formed in such a way that all its members in any one industry, or in all industries if necessary, cease work whenever a strike or lockout is on in any department thereof, thus making an injury to one an injury to all.

Instead of the conservative motto, "A fair day's wages for a fair day's work," we must inscribe on our banner the revolutionary watchword, "Abolition of the wage system."

It is the historic mission of the working class to do away with capitalism. The army of production must be organized, not only for the everyday struggle with the capitalists, but also to carry on production when capitalism shall have been overthrown. By organizing industrially we are forming the structure of the new society within the shell of the old.

Do you agree to abide by the constitution and regulations of this organization?

Will you diligently study its principles and make yourselves acquainted with its purposes?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, that circular is the old familiar one of the I. W. W. The information which was conveyed to the Senator from New Jersey of the activities of aliens in this propaganda is doubtless correct, but it is not confined to aliens, by any means. Nearly all of the promoters of the I. W. W. were Americans, and its principal leadership is of native origin. The circular is, I think, in common use with that organization and has been for a number of years. No doubt in these troublous times it appeals more readily to discontent than heretofore; but the thought which I rose to express was that while we should, in the revision of our immigration laws, take note of these things and prevent this country in the future from becoming a dumping ground for nondesirable classes, we should not overlook the fact that the same poison is working with American-born citizens, and that they, too, must be taken note of in such legislation as we may see fit to enact upon the subject.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, a few days ago upon the floor of the Senate Chamber I expressed the opinion that the unionization of Government employees had already gone too far. In this morning's Washington Post I find an article which is headed:

FEDERAL EMPLOYEES BACK POLICE UNION—MORAL AND FINANCIAL AID PROMISED.

The article in question is, in part, as follows:

The Federal Employees' Union, with a membership of 35,000 Government workers, will give the Washington City Policemen's Union "undivided and unswerving support," that organization was told at a meeting last night in Musicians' Hall, 1006 E Street NW.

B. W. Payne, representing the Federal Employees' Union in the Central Labor Union of the District, urged the policemen to continue their fight to preserve their affiliation with the American Federation of Labor.

Payne told the members of the policemen's union that his organization will support the police "morally and financially."

If that does not breathe defiance and insubordination, I do not know what would. With an era of crime, an orgy of looting, criminality of all kinds rampant, hoodlumism, rowdyism, lawbreaking of every character, a state of terrorization and of law defiance prevailing in the city of Boston, we are told by one of their spokesmen that 35,000 unionized Government employees of this city are in favor of bringing about a condition in the District of Columbia that might give rise at any time to the same state of affairs in this city.

It is claimed that the charter which has been granted by the American Federation of Labor to the policemen's union of this city is a nonstrike charter; but that charter could be amended at any time so as to make it a strike charter, and, if permitted to stand, if the policemen's union of the city be permitted to continue under that charter, I predict that within 60 days thereafter it will be so amended as to be a strike charter.

It is said that the Boston policemen's union had a nonstrike charter, but the policemen struck. I affirm that the action of the policemen's union in Boston in going on a strike with almost no notice and subjecting the people of that city to an orgy of crime, looting, rapine, terrorization, destruction of property and life, and lawbreaking of all kinds, is one of the most dastardly acts of infamy that has occurred in this country since the days of Benedict Arnold; and yet we are told that the unionized employees of this city to the number of 35,000, affiliated with a labor organization of a superior character, are in favor of bringing about in the District of Columbia a condition which might give rise any day to a like state of anarchy in this city. Even so good a friend of union labor as is the President of the United States says that it is wrong for a policemen's union to strike; but we are told that the employees of this Government, who are paid by Government money, favor having here a policemen's union affiliated with a dominating body of organized labor—a condition which might bring about at any time the same state of terrorization that to-day prevails in Boston, to the shame and disgrace of this country.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. MYERS. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I want to ask the Senator from Montana, or any other Senator on the floor who is better posted than I am on those things, if in his judgment the Government employees, in taking the position which this report claims they have taken, are not committing treason?

Mr. MYERS. I would not regard it as treason under the definition of the Constitution, Mr. President; but I think such conduct is highly improper and partakes of insubordination and defiance of law and order; and I think it amply vindicates my assertion, made on the floor of this Chamber a few days ago, that the unionization of Government employees had already gone too far.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MYERS. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. STANLEY. Does the Senator believe that the Government employees would attempt any such thing as that, or take any such liberties as that with the patience of Congress, were it not that they feel that civil service has put them in a status where they can do no wrong?

Mr. MYERS. I do not think the civil-service law is any justification for such a stand as has been taken by the spokesman of the 35,000 unionized Government employees of this District.

Mr. STANLEY. If the Senator will pardon me, have they not carried the civil service to such a point that it means practical life tenure, and they feel absolutely secure behind that cloak to take any position they please on any matter, without regard to fear of losing their positions?

Mr. MYERS. Oh, I think the Senator is absolutely correct in that. I did not at first understand his question. I think he is undoubtedly correct; Government employees under the civil service feel absolutely safe. Yet these 35,000 Government employees in the District of Columbia, who are reported by their spokesman to have taken this defiant stand, are continually besieging Congress for concessions and favors in the way of increased wages, shorter hours of work, Saturday half holidays the year around, civil-service pensions, and other concessions. I will say, for one, that in taking such a stand as they are reported to have taken, they are taking the wrong course to get any further concessions by my vote. I think what the city of Boston needs is an Ole Hanson for mayor, and I think there needs to be a few Ole Hansons in the Congress of the United States. I think a few Ole Hansons in the Senate of the United States would improve this body.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there further morning business? [A pause.] Morning business is closed.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I desire to state that on Monday next, after the routine morning business, I shall submit some remarks on the league of nations, and I should like to have the attention of the Senate at that time.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7478) to amend sections 5200 and 5202 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by acts of June 22, 1906, and September 24, 1918.

Mr. POMERENE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gerry	McKellar	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Hale	McNary	Smoot
Beckham	Harding	Myers	Spencer
Capper	Harrison	Newberry	Stanley
Colt	Henderson	Nugent	Swanson
Culberson	Johnson, S. Dak.	Phipps	Thomas
Dillingham	Jones, N. Mex.	Pomerene	Walsh, Mass.
Edge	Jones, Wash.	Robinson	Walsh, Mont.
Fletcher	Kellogg	Sheppard	Watson
France	Keyes	Sherman	Williams
Frelinghuysen	Kirby	Simmons

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] are detained from the Senate on public business. The junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY] is absent on business of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. PAGE answered to his name when called.

Mr. CUMMINS, Mr. TOWNSEND, Mr. WOLCOTT, Mr. HARRIS, Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. KNOX, Mr. GRONNA, and Mr. MCLEAN entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-two Senators having answered to the roll call, there is a quorum present. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 7478.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7478) to amend sections 5200 and 5202 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by acts of June 22, 1906, and September 24, 1918.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to ask the Senator from Georgia if there is another print of the bill other than the calendar print, No. 126? I ask the question, I will say to the Senator from Georgia, because the digest of the Library of Congress upon the bill does not conform to the calendar print, and I was wondering whether the Senator has a different print.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is House bill 7478.

Mr. SMOOT. H. R. 7478 was reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency August 15, 1919. That is the calendar print referred to at the top, and then in their digest the first is "Addition of clause beginning with 'including,' page 1, line 14." There is no line 14 on page 1, but I find it has reference to the word "including" on page 2, line 2, and no suggested amendment as reported by the legislative reference service conforms to the calendar print. I wondered whether there was another print that is not noted on the calendar.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have in my hand the print in the report of the Committee on Banking and Currency by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], and I also have H. R. 7478, the bill to which you refer, calendar No. 146.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the print I have. The legislative reference service in their digest of the bill do not conform to the print before us.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have not any other print except these two.

Mr. SMOOT. I was wondering whether the Senator had another print.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

Mr. SMOOT. I will have to go through the bill and mark it up according to the report of the legislative reference service.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The chairman of the committee, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], has entered the Chamber, and I will yield to him, if he prefers. I wish to say to the Senator from Connecticut that in his absence, and with his approval already given, I have called up House bill 7478, and if he desires to explain it to the Senate I will yield to him.

Mr. MCLEAN. No; I prefer that the Senator from Georgia should continue his explanation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, Mr. President, I wish to say that this bill embodies certain recommendations made by the Federal Reserve Board. It was reported favorably by the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House and passed the House, and is now before the Senate on a favorable report from the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate.

The first addition contained in the bill to existing law is found in the report of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], on page 2. The law as it now reads is that—

> The discount of bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actually existing values—

Shall not be counted as a part of the 10 per cent of the capital stock and surplus loaned by any national bank to a single individual, firm, or corporation. To that language is added:

> Including drafts and bills of exchange secured by shipping documents conveying or securing title to goods shipped, and including demand obligations when secured by documents covering commodities in actual process of shipment, and also including bankers' acceptances of the kinds described in section 13 of the Federal reserve act.

Those securities in section 13 are already exempt, and this is merely a definition and explanation, as I regard it, of the meaning of the term already in the banking law, which is that—

> The discount of bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actually existing values—

Shall not be counted as part of the 10 per cent of the capital stock and surplus limit.

The next amendment to the existing law, No. 2, as found in the pending bill, is the existing law:

> The discount of commercial or business paper actually owned by the person, company, corporation, or firm negotiating the same.

The existing law provides that that shall not be charged as a part of the 10 per cent of capital stock and surplus which limit loans. The additional language is—

> (3) the discount of notes secured by shipping documents, warehouse receipts, or other such documents conveying or securing title covering readily marketable nonperishable staples, including live stock, when the actual market value of the property securing the obligations is not at any time less than 10 per cent of the face amount of the bills secured by such documents and when such property is fully covered by insurance.

As a part also of that provision, we must go further down to the provision that—> the total liabilities to any association of any person or of any company, corporation, or firm for money borrowed, including the liabilities upon bills and notes secured in the manner described under (3) hereof, shall not at any time exceed 25 per cent of the amount of the association's paid-in and unimpaired capital stock and surplus. The exception made under (3) hereof shall not apply to the bills or notes of any one person, company, corporation, or firm for more than 6 months in any consecutive 12 months.

That is to say, all the latter language is a limitation of the third provision, which limits the amount of the total loaned by any bank even on agricultural products secured by warehouse certificates of 110 per cent of the value of the loan, to 25 per cent of the bank's capital stock, and it can only continue for six months in any one year. That is practically the whole of the amendment provided by the bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, I propose an amendment to the bill, which I send to the desk and ask that the Secretary may read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all of section 1 and insert:

> That section 5200 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by the acts of June 22, 1906, and September 24, 1918, be further amended to read as follows:
> "SEC. 5200. The total liabilities to any association of any person or of any company, corporation, or firm for money borrowed, including in the liabilities of a company or firm the liabilities of the several members thereof, shall at no time exceed 10 per cent of the amount of the capital stock of such association, actually paid in and unimpaired, and 10 per cent of its unimpared surplus fund: Provided, however, That (1) the discount of bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actually existing values, including drafts and bills of exchange secured by shipping documents conveying or pledging title to goods shipped, and including demand obligations when secured by documents covering commodities in actual process of shipment, and also including bankers' acceptances of the kinds described in section 13 of the Federal reserve act; (2) the discount of commercial or business paper actually owned by the person, company, corporation, or firm negotiating the same; (3) the discount of notes secured by warehouse receipts or other such documents conveying or pledging title covering readily marketable nonperishable staples, including live stock, if the actual market value of such staples is not at any time during the continuance of the liabilities secured thereby less than 110 per cent of the face amount of such notes, and if such staples, other than live stock, are fully covered by fire insurance; and (4) the discount of any note or notes secured by not less than a like face amount of bonds or notes of the United States issued since April 24, 1917, or certificates of indebtedness of the United States, shall not be considered as money borrowed within the meaning of this section; but the total liabilities to any association, of any person, or of any company, corporation, or firm upon any note or notes discounted by such association and secured by such bonds, notes, or certificates of indebtedness, shall not exceed (except to the extent permitted by rules and regulations prescribed by the Comptroller of the Currency, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury) 10 per cent of such capital stock and surplus fund of the association, and the total liabilities of any association, of any person, or of any company, corporation, or firm for money borrowed, including the liabilities upon notes secured in the manner described under (3) hereof shall not at any time exceed 25 per cent of such capital stock and surplus fund of the association. The exception made under (3) hereof shall not apply to the notes of any one person, company, corporation, or firm for more than 6 months in any consecutive 12 months."

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I regret exceedingly that this bill is presented. In its present form, however, it gives an opportunity for an amendment to the Federal reserve act, which perhaps may be justified. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to these changes and to take a few minutes of the time of the Senate to analyze the bill.

It will be noticed that the first part of the bill is a reenactment of the old law, which limits the amount that a borrower can get from the bank to 10 per cent of the paid-in capital stock and surplus. Then there is added a proviso which seeks to take away a good many of the safeguards which are given to the depositors by the first paragraph, to which I have just referred.

There are four classes of paper subject to discount by this proposed amendment. The paragraph designated (1) relates to the discount of bills of exchange. The old law contained this language:

(1) The discount of bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actually existing values.

That is the old law as it now is. To that the draftsman has added the following language:

Including drafts and bills of exchange secured by shipping documents conveying or securing title to goods shipped, and including demand obligations when secured by documents covering commodities in actual process of shipment, and also including bankers' acceptances of the kinds described in section 13 of the Federal reserve act.

All of that is new matter. Paragraph 2, as I recall, is a reenactment of the old provision:

The discount of commercial or business paper actually owned by the person, company, corporation, or firm negotiating the same.

Paragraph 3 is entirely new. It relates to—the discount of notes secured by shipping documents, warehouse receipts, or other such documents conveying or securing title covering readily marketable nonperishable staples, including live stock, when the actual market value of the property securing the obligations is not at any time less than 110 per cent of the face amount of the notes secured by such documents, and when such property is fully covered by insurance.

This gives practically the same privileges to the discount of notes that are given to the discount of bills of exchange defined in paragraph 1, except that it carries a 25 per cent limitation later in the section.

Paragraph 4 is substantially a reenactment, possibly a reenactment of paragraph 3 as contained in the present law.

Last year or the year before we sought to extend the borrowing privileges of the borrower when he could furnish Government bonds or certificates as collateral. Then we provided thus:

The discount of any note or notes secured by not less than a like face amount of bonds or notes of the United States issued since April 24, 1917, or certificates of indebtedness of the United States.

When thus secured they were not to be included within the limitation of 10 per cent of the capital stock and surplus of the banks; but there was added a further limitation to the borrower even when he had United States bonds as collateral. No. 4, which was No. 3 in the old law, provides:

The total liabilities to any association, of any person, or of any company, corporation, or firm upon any note or notes purchased or discounted by such association and secured by bonds, notes, or certificates of indebtedness as described in (4) hereof shall not exceed (except to the extent permitted by rules and regulations prescribed by the Comptroller of the Currency, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury) 10 per cent of such capital stock and surplus fund of such association.

The situation is this: The ordinary borrower can go to the bank and can only get 10 per cent of the capital stock and the surplus; but if he goes with collateral in the form of United States bonds, by permission of the Congress—I mean the legislative permission of Congress—he can get an additional 10 per cent of the capital and surplus. In other words, he is limited to 20 per cent; but under the provisions authorizing the Comptroller of the Currency and the Secretary of the Treasury to extend this privilege, it has been since extended so that one may borrow $100 for every $105 of bonds which he hypothecates at the time he makes the loan. That is done by administrative processes.

But now think of this situation: If one takes to a bank a draft or a bill of exchange such as is defined in section 1, he can get 100 per cent not only of the capital and surplus but 100 per cent of the deposits as well by the mere discount of that kind of paper, if it comes to the paper discounted under paragraph 2. Again, the only limitation upon one's borrowing capacity is the contents of the vault of the bank—100 per cent, less of course legal revenues.

When it comes to paragraph 3, a limitation is provided which is 25 per cent of the amount of the capital stock and surplus; but the borrower must give $110 worth of security, which may be of cotton or of wool, which may or may not be correctly graded; or it may be a bunch of mavericks from the West which are being shipped, and he can get 25 per cent of the capital stock and surplus.

It may be said that as this is drawn against existing values the risk is negligible. I beg to differ in that behalf from my friends who are advocating this measure, and I want to say just a word in that regard. I confess to something of a pride in the Federal reserve act. In a very modest way I served on the committee that had in charge that legislation. I thought we had secured everybody, including the depositors. I recognize that that legislation is susceptible of a perfecting process as we go along; but I submit that we ought not to decrease the safeguards which the banks should observe when it comes to the loaning of the money of the depositor.

I want to appeal to Senators with the thought that we are now going through a day of inflation, and there is the risk. The Federal reserve act was so good——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, these provisions were in the old national-bank act.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not care where they have been. You are extending them; you are spreading them out. It is true that a part of them have been in the law for some time, and I propose to say something about that.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to me?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I am led to ask the question by the Senator's suggestion that we are passing through days of inflation, a consideration which I think ought to appeal to all of us; but even if we admit, for the sake of argument, that all of the new provisions of this proposed law are absolutely correct, still would it not follow, even after that admission is made, that the result of this legislation would be a great deal of inflation?

Mr. POMERENE. It will add to the process of inflation.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that is what I mean.

Mr. POMERENE. There can not be any doubt about it.

Now, Mr. President, just think of this situation. The Congress allows an increase of the amount of money that one can borrow on Government bonds to 20 per cent—the comptroller has seen fit to increase that amount, as I stated a moment ago—but when it comes to the discounting of notes secured by bills of lading, it may be by warehouse receipts; then one can get 25 per cent plus the 10 per cent, or 35 per cent in all. In other words, we are depreciating the value of Government bonds as collateral and increasing the value of warehouse receipts and bills of lading. That is one objection to this bill in its present form.

Now, let us see where we are leading to. Several years ago I introduced here the bill-of-lading bill which later became the law of the land. I remember very well when we had the extensive hearings upon that subject that those who were most insistent upon legislation of that character were the chambers of commerce from the South and the West. Why? Because at that time commercial men were going through the South and through the West buying cotton, or cattle it may have been, and then going to freight agents, and, by one means or another, persuading the freight agent to issue a bill of lading before the freight was actually delivered to the carrier. Then they would go to a bank and discount such paper. The Supreme Court held in the Friedlander case that because such bills of lading were issued ultra vires by the freight agent, therefore there was no liability on the part of the common carrier to the banker who may have been defrauded by discounting such a draft with a bill of lading attached. That has been corrected, so that if a bill of lading is issued within the apparent scope of the authority of the freight agent the common carrier is liable to the holder of the draft which is secured by that bill of lading; but it does not do away with the possibility of extensive forgeries. Let me illustrate: Within a year last past the grand jury in the southern district of Ohio indicted one of these gentlemen who goes about the country defrauding people and forging bills of lading. One such individual went to a bank and cashed a draft with a bill of lading attached. He was indicted by the grand jury; but the United States District Court for the Southern District of Ohio sustained a demurrer to that indictment, because, as the court held, that provision of the bill-of-lading act was unconstitutional. Later the case went to the Supreme Court, and within the last 60 days that court handed down a decision sustaining the constitutionality of that act and remanded the case for further proceedings; but the man who cashed that draft got $30,000 of the bank's money.

I refer to that for this reason: There is not any limitation placed in this bill or in the old law upon the amount of money that one of these fellows can get if he goes to a bank with a draft or a note and has attached to it a bill of lading or warehouse receipt. Still Senators come in here and attempt to let down the bars so that an agreement can be made between the man who presents the draft and the cashier of the bank to accept that kind of paper.

Mr. President, it is said that we can not finance our crops if we do not let down the bars. Let me say that, while this legislation is being urged by those who come from one section of the country, it is neither more nor less important to them than it is to any other section of the country. It is not a question of cotton raising or cotton selling or wheat raising or wheat selling; it is a question of sound banking. That is the only question that we should consider here. I have been told by Senators—and I have no doubt we will hear the argument urged—that when it comes to the buying of wheat or the buying of cotton the purchaser goes around and makes an arrangement at one bank to present his drafts with bills of lading attached, and then can discount paper of that kind to an extent limited only by the deposits of the bank.

Now, Senators, if you are more interested in helping along some cotton or wheat buyer than you are in security for your depositors, then I can understand your position.

Let me call attention to another significant fact. My very good friend the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] and my very good friend the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] repeatedly on the floor of the Senate have called attention to the manner in which the South suffered because of the gambling on the cotton exchanges, because their cotton was not properly graded, because cotton is up one day and down another day. While I never follow the markets, I am told that in the last few days or few weeks, at least, there has been a substantial decline in cotton. That will occur, as it has occurred in the past; and now if there is some difficulty about the grading of cotton or if the value of the cotton declines because of the manipulation of the cotton exchanges, what is going to happen to the small bank that has all its money tied up in that kind of security? What is going to happen to the bank in the West that has all of its funds tied up by some cattle buyer? What is going to happen to the bank in my own State when the manufacturer presents his drafts, with bills of lading attached, representing certain machinery?

Why, Mr. President, I dare say there is not a prosperous county in the South that has not two or three or four banks in it. If your cotton buyer or you wheat buyer or your stock buyer can not get all the financial accommodation that he wants at one bank, is there any serious embarrassment to him, after he has carefully established his line of credit, in dividing up and going to one bank and getting 50 per cent of his accommodation there and 50 per cent of it at another bank?

Mr. President, I do not know what the Senate is going to do with this bill, but I suggest that if there is to be any change in this law at all the 25 per cent limitation ought to apply to class 1 and class 2 as well as class 3; and I understand that there will not be any serious objection to that even from the Federal reserve officials.

We are talking now throughout the country about the value of the dollar. Its purchasing power has decreased materially. We are, as I said a moment ago, in an era of inflation. Now, let us see what the situation may be.

Let us assume that we have a bank with $100,000 capital and $100,000 surplus and $1,000,000 of deposits. Under the general provisions of the law the borrower can get $20,000. Under this paragraph 3 the man who is buying cotton or wheat or hogs can get 25 per cent of the $200,000, or $50,000, in addition to the $20,000, or $70,000; but if he has a draft or a bill of exchange of the class described in paragraph 1 or paragraph 2, if the bank has all of its funds in cash in its vaults, it can get $1,200,000, less legal reserves, simply by discounting that paper. I do not believe in that kind of banking.

The Congress was so careful about this law when it was first adopted that when it came to the sale of the vast amount of bonds necessary for the purpose of carrying on the World War, Congress said: "We will only increase the 10 per cent loans allowed by the law by another 10 per cent, though we will allow the Comptroller of the Currency and the Secretary of the Treasury to expand that amount if they wish; but when it comes to the dealings described in the new paragraph 3"—which is entirely new so far as the old law is concerned—"we are going to let you have 25 per cent, provided you give a 10 per cent margin on the kind of collateral that you are shipping."

Mr. President, that may be sound banking. It may be that I do not comprehend it, but I think I know what the depositors in your banks will say about it. There is not any bank in the world that is interested in having one borrower only. That bank is safest that distributes its funds around and has many borrowers.

For the reasons that I have suggested, Mr. President—and I do not care to occupy the time of the Senate further—I shall oppose the bill.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat, I should like to ask him if he knows of any other country in the world that puts any limit on the amount of a loan that shall be given to one individual or corporation?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have not studied the lines of loans which are made by banks in other countries, but I think I know our civilization, and I think I know the risks of the banking proposition; and I do not think you have heard of very many borrowers or very many merchants who have not been able to get all the money they want, and all that they need, if they have proper collateral.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator said, as I understood him, that there was no other country in the world that would permit such a large loan to a single individual.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not think I referred to any other country; did I?

Mr. McLEAN. I understood the Senator to say so.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not think I did.

Mr. McLEAN. My impression is that there is no other country than the United States that puts any limit on the amount of loans to a single individual.

Mr. POMERENE. I think the Senator was the only one who referred to any other country. I am sure I did not in that way. I did not even have it in mind.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question of which I am reminded by the suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I think we will agree, probably—at least, I want to ask the Senator if that is not his idea—that this limitation of the amount of money that can be loaned by a bank to one individual has two objects in view. One the Senator has mentioned, and that is that it goes toward the safety of the bank, and it is better to have the bank loan its money to many men than to put it all in one basket. But is it not true also that the law has another object in view, and that is that every bank is a semipublic institution, and one of the reasons why we legislate about it and surround it with laws and regulations is that it may perform its function in the community, and do its part in carrying on the business of the community, and that by loaning all of the funds to one man it is failing to perform its commercial function in the community where it exists and that this limitation has a tendency to keep alive? In other words, if all of its funds could be loaned to one man, a bank might be organized by some one for the purpose of borrowing the depositors' money.

Mr. POMERENE. If I may answer the Senator in my own way, I will suggest that some years ago a very elegant and a very pious gentleman said, when it came to the formation of combinations, that it was a very good thing to have them, just as it was a very good thing to pinch off all the rosebuds that were on a given bush so as to make the one full rose a perfect bloom. Now, there may be some people who think it is very wise to have one great big man in one community who can borrow all the money of the bank, when the other little fellows can get nothing. That may be so, but I doubt the wisdom of it.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, may I call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the fact that if his fears in the line he has just suggested are well founded I think it would be well for him to have the laws of his own State amended, because I think that under the statutes of Ohio all the State banks are permitted to loan to a single individual to the extent of 25 per cent of their capital and surplus.

Mr. POMERENE. Twenty-five per cent?

Mr. McLEAN. Twenty-five per cent.

Mr. POMERENE. Well, if that is true, the law has been changed very recently.

Mr. McLEAN. More than that, Mr. President, I think the average throughout the country is from 20 to 25 per cent. I am sure that the New York limit is 25 per cent, and the same is true in all the large States.

Mr. POMERENE. I have not had occasion to look at the Ohio banking law for some time, but I think the Senator from Connecticut is mistaken.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to ask the Senator from Connecticut, if that is true, and if that is an indication of good banking, as I judge he thinks it is from his asking the question, would it not be wise for Congress, then, to limit in this bill the amount that can be loaned to one person to 25 per cent? This goes away beyond that.

Mr. McLEAN. To what portion of the bill does the Senator refer?

Mr. NORRIS. I am not going to discuss the bill.

Mr. McLEAN. I understand the contention of the Senator from Ohio is directed to the clause which extends the present limit from 10 to 25 per cent of the capital and surplus.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Ohio has clearly pointed out that some of the securities could run to 100 per cent and would not be limited to 25 or 10.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I will reply very briefly to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]. There are really two amendments to this bill that are important. The first is a description of a provision now in the law, and it does not really extend the credits of the bank. The law now provides that the discount of bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actually existing values shall not be counted as a part of the 10 per cent of the capital loaned. Why? Because it is not really a loan; it is not really a credit. The cattle owner in the West ships his cattle to Chicago and draws his sight draft with a bill of lading attached, which is paid in Chicago at once and goes to the credit of the local bank in the Chicago bank.

The wheat owner ships his wheat to St. Paul or Minneapolis or Kansas City and draws his sight draft with a bill of lading attached, which is cashed at once by his bank, the bank sends it on, and the amount of the credit at this central distributing point is placed to the credit of the bank cashing the draft.

The cotton holder in the South ships his cotton, perhaps, to Savannah or to New York or to Boston and draws his sight draft with bill of lading attached. It is not a loan to him. It is a cashing of a sight draft. That is practically what it is. That is practically all of section 1.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if the language of description adds nothing to the scope of section 1, why is it there?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Because the view has grown up recently in the comptroller's office that broader language is necessary. That practice has been in existence for years and the drafts have been cashed. But a recent view of the comptroller's office questions the soundness of the policy, and the language is recommended by the Federal Reserve Board and by the comptroller to make it clear.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Georgia also says that when money is gotten from the banks it is not really a loan. Of course, one of two things may happen: The draft may be paid, and if it is paid, then the bank sustains no loss. But suppose the draft is not paid; then what?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then the bank would sustain a loss. But, Mr. President, there is the bill of lading attached. A good bank, if it had the slightest doubt about the man who drew the draft or about the party at the other end, would telegraph to know whether the draft was good.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator desires to ask me a question, well and good. I have only 10 minutes.

Mr. POMERENE. All I wanted to do was to ask the Senator a question. The thought has been suggested to me—and, of course, it is quite apparent—that this may happen: Suppose a trainload of cattle is sent from Texas, or it may be from one of the far-western mountain States. It is valued at the time of the shipment at $100,000. By the time it gets to Chicago it may be worth only $80,000. It may be that the credit is extended solely because of the bill of lading. If so, then there is a difference of $20,000 between the amount of credit granted the borrower and the amount which is realized upon his shipment.

Mr. McLEAN. It is insured.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, that might be true. The Senator from Ohio says that one of these bills of lading might be forged. Any indorser's name might be forged on a note. The Senator from Ohio is afraid of a forgery. That is a matter that every bank has to watch in all of its transactions. It does not apply to a transaction of this kind any more than it does to any other.

Mr. POMERENE. No; but, Mr. President, it limits the amount of the money which he can get on forged paper.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But, Mr. President, ordinary paper is not secured as this paper is. Ordinary paper is not a sight draft. The distinction between a sight draft and a paper due at 60 or 90 days or 6 months makes all the difference. These drafts simply are drawn without any care by the bank where the bank knows they will be cashed. With the ease of communication by telegraph, no bank properly managed would cash a draft unless its officers knew the money was at the other end to meet it or that the drawer of the draft was good for the amount. It is a line of business that has been going on for years. It is essential to move the crops of the country, and I have heard nothing of any losses in this line of business by the banks in any way greater than in their ordinary business.

It is not a loan. I deny that it is a loan. It is the cashing of a sight draft. It is the transfer of the money at the bank to some central point, as a rule. Smaller banks throughout the country draw with bills of lading on neighboring distributing points.

Who has the best knowledge of this business? The Federal Reserve Board and the comptroller. Our original banking law contained a provision which largely covered it. It is only an explanation and a clarifying of existing language.

I come now, Mr. President, to the second provision. That is contained in number 3. Number 2 is a mere recitation of the existing rules. Number 2 is that the discount of commercial or business paper actually owned by a person, company, corporation, or firm negotiating the same shall not be counted as a part of the 10 per cent.

This third provision is intended really to facilitate the handling of farm products. Let us see what it is. It does not add the 25 per cent to the 10 per cent and make it 35 per cent, as I understood the Senator from Ohio to state.

Mr. POMERENE. I so said.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not understand that it means anything of the kind. It limits specifically the total amount to the 25 per cent.

What is the effect of that language? It provides:

> The discount of notes secured by shipping documents, warehouse receipts, or other such documents conveying or securing title covering readily marketable nonperishable staples, including live stock, when the actual market value of the property securing the obligation is not at any time less than 110 per cent of the face amount of the notes secured by such documents and when such property is fully covered by insurance.

What further is contained in the bill? A limitation of that privilege in advance. It says—

> Shall not exceed * * * 10 per cent of such capital stock and surplus fund of such association.

That is the old language. This provides that—

> The total liabilities to any association, of any person or of any company, corporation, or firm for money borrowed, including the liabilities upon notes secured in the manner described under (3) hereof, shall not at any time exceed 25 per cent of the amount of the association's paid-in and unimpaired capital stock and surplus.

So not only the amount borrowed under section 3, with the warehouse receipt as security, but the total amount, this provision declares, of the money borrowed by a particular company or person or individual, including other loans and the loan made with the warehouse receipt attached, shall not exceed 25 per cent. The total can not exceed 25 per cent. It further provides that—

> The exception made under (3) hereof shall not apply to the notes of any one person, company, corporation, or firm for more than 6 months in any consecutive 12 months.

The limitation is made of 25 per cent for total loans to not more than 6 months in any 12 months. That provision was put in to make certain the fact that the borrower did not run a continuous loan, but that he settled up. He must sell his agricultural product that he has given in the shape of a warehouse receipt as security. He must sell out and close up, and can not more than 6 months in any 12 months make these loans.

But the Senator says that banks were only permitted to advance on Government bonds to the extent of 20 per cent of their capital stock, and that was wise and prudent. The Government bond held by a purchaser is something that he may not sell at all. It facilitates a continuous and long-time loan. These staples, warehoused, are for sale. The one means something in the nature of a permanent loan, a continuous loan. The other is upon a commodity that the owner will dispose of and rapidly change into cash.

The Government bonds are perfect security. They do not take the shape of commercial transactions, as this class of security provided in title 3 takes. The holder of these securities covered by title 3 contemplates sale. They are intended for sale. They are going into commerce, and lest there should be any doubt about their going into commerce, the bill provides that these loans shall not be for more than six months in a year, the total time. There is no such restriction as to an advance on bonds. I do not think I have paid the bank with which I do business all the note that I gave for the first Liberty bonds that I bought. I certainly owe in bank for part of the bonds I bought. I paid them enough to make the bonds good. And that is the case with a great many people.

Mr. POMERENE. The bank no doubt regards it as an exceptional asset to have the Senator's name there, and that is the reason for it. It is better than the bond.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator flatters me. I am afraid that is not true. I mentioned that simply to show the difference in the nature of the loans. The loans on the Government bonds are not commercial transactions. They are made to help the customers of the bank to carry the bonds, and the bank that sells needs the protection of the limitation of the quantity, while these warehouse receipts are commercial paper, and will undoubtedly change into cash speedily, and that they may certainly be made to change to cash speedily this provision has been added to at the close:

The exception made under (3) hereof shall not apply to the notes of any one person, company, corporation, or firm for more than 6 months in any consecutive 12 months.

That is to say, you must close out your goods in the warehouse and pay up your bank if you borrow under title 3. You can not run it, as most of us have run our loans, secured by Liberty bonds.

Mr. President, 25 per cent of the capital stock as a loan, as has been suggested by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], is the rule in a great many States as to the State banks. This is a measure that is deemed advisable by the Federal reserve bank and the Comptroller of the Treasury to aid and facilitate the handling of crops.

The one in which my section is especially interested, much more than in this, is the sight draft. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] dwells upon cotton, seeming to think that cotton being interested perhaps Senators from other States would be prejudiced against the measure.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, Mr. President, the Senator has no right——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 8624) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, Mr. President, I simply desire to say, in answer to what the Senator stated in that behalf, that he placed a wrong construction upon what I said; and he is not justified in it. I referred in the same way to wheat and to live stock from the West and to the industrial products of my own State.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator is mistaken when he says he referred to them in the same way. When the record of his remarks is read to-morrow morning he will find that he did not refer to them in the same way. He emphasized the one, which was cotton, and finally brought the others in incidentally. I am glad to hear him state that it was not his purpose, by the manner in which he made the reference, to create any prejudice in that way, because I was not gratified at the manner of his speech.

Mr. President, I have finished what I desired to say on this subject. I have called attention to the fact there are only two propositions in the bill. There is nothing of inflation about it, nothing whatever. The first facilitates, by more specific description, the power already in the law of the banks cashing a sight draft with bill of lading attached. I think they can do it now, but there has been some question about it at the office of the comptroller, and this language makes it clear.

The second was intended to take care of farm products, and to permit, with wise restriction, loans up to the extent of 25 per cent where warehouse receipts to the extent of 110 per cent of the amount of the note secure the loan, and to keep the bank in use of quick assets the transaction must be closed out, and not more than for 6 months in any 12 months can the borrower use this basis of credit to extend his loan beyond 10 per cent of the capital stock of the bank making the loan.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, in connection with the matter that has just been under discussion, I send to the desk a letter which I have received from Gov. Harding of the Federal Reserve Board, referring to the amendment which I have proposed, and I ask that the Secretary may read the letter.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand that the unfinished business is before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is before the Senate. The Secretary will read the letter, if there is no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
Washington, September 5, 1919.

Hon. CHARLES B. HENDERSON,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 3d instant inclosing a revision of House bill 7478, which I understand it is your purpose to introduce in the Senate. My opinion is that you have improved materially the wording of the House bill and have made its meaning much clearer without altering the substance.

I would call your attention to a typographical error in line 17 of page 2, where the word "is" is used when obviously "if" is the proper word. I would suggest also that in line 6 on page 3 the word "and" be stricken out, and that a period take the place of the comma immediately preceding that word, and that the word "the" in line 7 begin with a capital letter, thus beginning a new sentence.

In my opinion it would be wise to substitute your draft for the bill as passed by the House.

With kind regards, I am,
Sincerely, yours,

W. P. G. HARDING,
Governor.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask unanimous consent that the changes referred to in the letter just read be made in the amendment which I have proposed and which has been read.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand that the letter is from Gov. Harding?

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes; relative to the amendment which I proposed to the bill. He has suggested a few minor changes which I ask unanimous consent to have made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has a right to modify his amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I listened to the reading of the Senator's amendment as closely as I could, but there was so much confusion in the Chamber that I did not hear it all. If I understand the Senator's amendment correctly, I can not understand why Mr. Harding says that it does not change the substance of the bill as it passed the House.

Mr. HENDERSON. It does in one particular, and that is relative to the insurance of live stock.

Mr. SMOOT. That is a very important point.

Mr. HENDERSON. I expected to explain it to the Senate to-day, but in view of the fact that the unfinished business is now before the Senate I will defer the explanation until a later time.

CITY POLICE AND LABOR UNIONS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an editorial from the New York Times of this date entitled "The way to deal with police strikes," and I trust it will receive the consideration of all the powers that be in the city of Washington.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"THE WAY TO DEAL WITH POLICE STRIKES.

"Irrespective of the shadow of politics that hung over the Boston police strike, since a Republican legislature has vested in the governor, and not the mayor, the appointment of the Boston police commissioner, and irrespective of the initial well-intentioned but grave mistake of Mayor Peters and his committee of citizens in wishing to submit to compromise an issue that could not be compromised instead of heartily supporting 'the commissioner in the execution of the laws,' as Gov. Coolidge told the mayor, the police strike and the mobs of hoodlums and looters, 'miscellaneous ruffians,' and crooks that have rushed in from other cities to share in the feast of misrule, have been handled in essentially the right way. It could not be expected that volunteer policemen, particularly detested by the hooligans as 'scabs,' and some of them guilty of the atrocious crime of being well-to-do and educated men, could deal with ferocious gangs of rioters, operating in various parts of the city and concentrating their forces on little knots of amateurs.

"The State troops were called out promptly; more and more were sent as the severity of the outbreaks made itself felt. These troops are in command of a competent officer, Brig. Gen. Cole, who led the Twenty-sixth Division in France. Cavalry and infantry have been used and will be used to advantage. If the State troops can not put down the mobs, the governor, at the mayor's request, will ask President Wilson for Federal troops, and martial law will be proclaimed.

"Whatever sympathetic strikes are called in Boston must incur the disgrace of abetting lawlessness and crime, and must be mostly impotent for evil, since the temper of all the decent and orderly elements of the community is stern against them, since the temper of the troops must constantly grow fiercer under innumerable provocations and the strain of duty, and since 'the sullen guns that know no doubts' will be the ultimate masters; and even the most radical of the leaders know it. The law will be enforced and order restored relentlessly. So far as union labor leaders put obedience to the will of the union before obedience to the laws, they are following a dangerous and a criminal course. The violence that they have fomented will redound to their discredit and will be stamped out by the forces that are the final guaranty of the reign of law and order.

"If there is any city whose mayor and police commissioner have ever shown a disposition to coquet with organized disorder, to put into the police under their control no hearty disposition to suppress it, to tolerate its beginnings or encourage it, this Boston essay in Bolshevism should remind them of the error of their ways. The spirit that prefers the union to the law, executes private punishment upon offenders against the commands of the union, and sows recklessly the seeds of mob law, pillage, and destruction of property, will not be tolerated by America. Wherever it shows itself it will be put down. To yield to it or to dally with it is merely to provoke more disastrous consequences. In the end the law will speak the last word."

CONTROL OF FOOD PRODUCTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8624) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Harrison	McNary	Smoot
Beckham	Henderson	New	Spencer
Brandegee	Johnson, S. Dak.	Newberry	Sterling
Capper	Jones, N. Mex.	Nugent	Swanson
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Thomas
Curtis	Kellogg	Page	Townsend
Dillingham	Kenyon	Phelan	Trammell
Edge	Kirby	Phipps	Underwood
Fletcher	Knox	Pomerene	Walsa, Mass.
Frelinghuysen	Lodge	Sheppard	Walsh, Mont.
Hale	McCumber	Sherman	Wolcott
Harding	McKellar	Simmons
Harris	McLean	Smith, Ga.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] are detained from the Senate on official business.

Mr. KIRBY. I announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. DIAL] on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Fifty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The unfinished business is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask unanimous consent that the amendments of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry may be considered first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will report the first committee amendment.

The SECRETARY. The first amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry is, on page 2, line 14, after the word "war," to insert:

And to prevent in the District of Columbia unreasonable profits on dwelling houses, dwelling rooms, and apartments held for lease, sublease, or rent.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, whether the amendment suggested to this food-control bill relative to the prevention in the District of Columbia of unreasonable profits on dwelling houses, dwelling rooms, and apartments held for lease, sublease, or rent in any way would interfere with the bill which has already been reported to the Senate upon this same subject matter?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I think it would. The two cover precisely the same ground. The bill that has already been reported by the committee—on yesterday, I think—has somewhat elaborate provisions for the regulation of rents, providing for a reasonable rent charge only, and covers exactly the same ground that this amendment does.

Mr. SMOOT. As this bill provides no way of carrying these particular provisions into effect, I desire to ask the Senator from Mississippi if it would not be better to disagree to these two amendments? As I understand, the rent bill will follow this bill for consideration.

Mr. HARRISON. I will say to the Senator from Utah that the amendments were placed in the bill with the concurrence of every Member of the committee who was present; it was unanimously done. The object was to take care of the situation at least until the provisions embodied in the bill reported by the committee, of which the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] is chairman, might be enacted into law.

The Senator from Utah knows that it is not difficult perhaps to pass a bill of this character through the Senate, but that it is very difficult to pass District legislation through the other House. There they have certain days, which are far apart, for the consideration of such legislation, and they very often set aside District legislation. It is my opinion that unless the amendments to this bill relating to the subject are adopted it will be a long time, although I hope that may not be true, before we get some permanent legislation touching rents in the District. I hope it will not be very long before such legislation is passed, however; and I congratulate the Senator from Illinois and his committee on the work which they are doing along that line. The adoption of the amendments is not going to conflict in the slightest degree with any law which Congress may subsequently enact. I understand the purpose of the bill which has been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia to be about the same as that embodied in the amendments, except that the bill is broader and deals with the Saulsbury law as well as getting at profiteers who make unreasonable rent charges in the District.

I submit since we have an opportunity to incorporate these provisions in this bill that we ought to do so. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], if he has kept informed as to the consideration of the food-control bill in the other House, is aware that there was a provision offered there, which was agreed to by a pretty large vote in the Committee of the Whole, embracing rents throughout the United States. Of course, I do not think the House had any authority to do that in such a bill; and when the bill got back into the House from the Committee of the Whole House that provision was stricken out because it did apply to the whole United States. We have been very careful in these amendments to make them apply merely to the District of Columbia. The adoption of the amendment could not do any harm, and in my humble opinion it would do a great deal of good. I therefore sincerely hope that the Senate will back up what the Senate Committee on Agriculture has done in embodying this provision in the pending bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, of course the Senator from Mississippi knows that if we agree to them the House of Representatives will have to pass upon these amendments as to rent charges in the District of Columbia just the same as they would have to pass upon the rent bill which I expect will pass the Senate, perhaps, to-day or to-morrow. As the other bill is more comprehensive and covers the whole question, I really feel that it ought to be passed and that these amendments should be rejected, because then the House Members, as the Senator has said, could not say, "Well, we have legislated upon the subject and therefore there is no need of hurrying this bill through."

I believe that every Member of the House recognizes that there ought to be some legislation regulating rents in the District of Columbia and, indeed, throughout the United States, if it were possible for us to do so; but particularly that they should be regulated in the District of Columbia. I can not conceive of anyone trying to block the bill that will come before the Senate, and which, as I say, will probably pass either to-day or to-morrow. I do not know whether or not there would be any conflict between the provisions of the pending measure and the law which we hope to pass.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to ask either or both of the Senators who have just spoken—for I am not well informed on the subject—whether if this provision were adopted and the other bill also were passed there would not be a conflict in this respect. The provisions of the pending bill, as I understand, are enforceable by the Department of Justice while the provisions of the other bill when it becomes a law are to be enforced by a commission to be created in the District of Columbia for that purpose. Is not there liable to be a conflict which will result in disaster to the very object which we are all so anxious to accomplish if we now place the same subject under the control of two different agencies?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I think it would be the easiest kind of matter when the other bill comes up for consideration to write a provision into it that it shall repeal the rent provisions of the pending measure; but this can be operating under the circumstances for the time being.

Now, I desire to say to the Senator from Utah, who stated it would be possibly just as easy to pass the bill which has been reported out of the District Committee as to adopt this amendment, that I can not agree with him. The food-control legislation has been put up to us as being very urgent. If we pass it this afternoon, it will go to the other House to-morrow, and they will probably agree to it.

I have talked with a great many Members of the other House and they have expressed themselves to the effect that if the Senate would put such a provision as this amendment into the pending bill they would concur in our action. I do not think there is any doubt about their doing so. However, we do not know when the bill pertaining to rents in the District of Columbia will come up for the consideration of the Senate. I understand that on Monday we are to take up the peace treaty; the minds of Senators will be on that treaty for quite a while; and no one can tell when we shall pass any more legislation touching the rent situation.

Then, when it comes to the other House, as the Senator from Utah knows, the District of Columbia Committee there is called on the calendar twice a month, I believe. Very often, however, in the other House they set aside the District calendar day. It does seem to me, therefore, that, since we have this opportunity, we ought to pass this provision in the pending bill and give some immediate relief to the citizens of the District, for when we reduce the price of rents in the District of Columbia we shall very materially reduce the cost of living here. We can agree to this amendment to this bill; let it become a law very quickly; and operate under its provisions.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection whatever to the amendment reported by the committee. The only thought in my mind was that there would be a conflict.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. How can it possibly do any harm? When the other bill is considered, as the Senator from Mississippi suggests, could we not write a clause in that bill repealing the rent provision in the pending bill? And if they are inconsistent, in any event, the latter expression of Congress would repeal the former.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know whether it would or not, because of the fact that the provisions of the amendment reported by the Committee on Agriculture are to be administered by the Department of Justice, while the provisions of the bill reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia are to be administered by a commission.

Mr. KENYON. But in any event we could insert in the bill reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia when it is considered a clause repealing the rent provisions in the pending bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand that; but there is not such a clause in the bill as it has been reported to the Senate from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator really believe that the rent bill can be passed here to-morrow night?

Mr. SMOOT. I sincerely hope that it will be.

Mr. KENYON. I had supposed that the banking bill and the pending measure would probably consume all of the time until to-morrow night, and then, in all probability, there would be no further legislation on this subject until after the treaty is disposed of.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know how long the pending bill is going to take, but I understand there is but one other Senator who desires to make a speech upon it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. The pending bill having already passed the House and the bill reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia not having even been presented to the House, is it not perfectly manifest that if the pending bill, embodying the two amendments, is passed this afternoon it will become a law long before the Ball bill could possibly become a law? The Senator says, as I understand, that he has no objection to these two provisions and thinks they ought to be a part of the law, and I think we all agree to that. They provide merely a penalty against the exaction of unreasonable profits in connection with the rental of "dwelling houses, dwelling rooms, and apartments held for lease, sublease, or rent" here in the District. It seems to me that the sooner we get such a law the better it will be, and I think we all agree that it is a wise provision that ought to be in the law.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should like to inquire whether the Ball bill could not be inserted as an amendment to the pending measure in lieu of the provisions in the pending measure concerning rentals in the District of Columbia?

Mr. McKELLAR. I see no reason in the world why that could not be done. I have not examined the Ball bill as it has been reported.

Mr. LODGE. Neither have I; but from what I have read concerning it in the papers I think it is a worthy measure.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think so, too.

Mr. SMOOT. The only thought I had was to secure action and get a rent bill passed as quickly as possible, and have that bill cover the whole subject matter. I do not believe, from what I can learn, that there is any opposition in the House to a rent bill such as has been reported to this body by the Committee on the District of Columbia. I can not conceive of any Member of the House trying to hold up a bill of that character in view of the situation here in the District to-day.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator that, so far as I am concerned, if he will permit these two amendments to be adopted—and I think we all agree that they ought to be adopted, that being the most expeditious way of managing the matter—when the Ball bill comes in I will join him, as I believe all Senators who are interested in this question will join him, in seeking to have that bill enacted into law as soon as possible.

Mr. HARRISON. With the permission of the Senator from Utah, may I ask the Senator from Illinois a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. Did the bill reported out of the Committee on the District of Columbia have the unanimous support of the members of that committee?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRISON. Was it a unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; although some of the committee were polled, not having been present.

Mr. HARRISON. I have not had an opportunity to read the Ball bill, and know of it principally from what I have seen in the papers; but is there a penalty attached along the lines of the particular provisions of the pending bill against persons profiteering in rents?

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a penalty for an excessive charge.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask what is the penalty in the Ball bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. A penalty is imposed of a fine not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, or, in the discretion of the court, imprisonment, or both fine and imprisonment—one or the other, or both.

Mr. President, I am going to make a suggestion which the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], who is also a member of the committee and who has been working with us, has proposed to me, namely, that I offer Senate bill 2992, the Ball bill, to which reference has been made, as an amendment to or substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi as reported in the pending measure—to insert the whole bill as reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, so far as I am personally concerned, I hope the committee will accept the bill referred to by the Senator from Illinois as a substitute for the provisions in regard to rents contained in the pending bill, if it will save discussion.

Mr. SMOOT. Then let me ask the Senator from Mississippi to request that the two rent provisions in the pending bill be passed over, and in case the Ball bill is agreed to as a part of the pending measure, then we will disagree to the amendments in regard to rentals reported on the pending bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Very well. I may say to the Senator that all I want to do is to get some results, and get them quickly.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly what I had in mind.

Mr. HARRISON. I so understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the Chair suggest that the pending bill will remain in force only during the present war, while the Ball bill, as the Chair understands, is intended to be permanent legislation. That fact ought to be considered in framing the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true as to the provisions of this bill as it stands as they relate to other questions, but the Ball bill, which is, I understand, to be offered as an amendment, provides, I believe, that it shall not expire with the end of the war.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the amendment offered by me is adopted, it will leave Senate bill 2992 still pending, but its provisions will have been incorporated in the pending measure by way of amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the pending amendment will be temporarily passed over.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I just want to suggest to the Chair, in view of the suggestion made by the Chair, that the Ball bill, if proposed as an amendment and accepted, will expressly provide that it shall continue for a certain specific time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair wanted to call the Senate's attention to that fact, so that it might be covered; that is all.

The Secretary will state the next amendment of the committee.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 4, line 9, after the word "him," to strike out the words "And provided" and insert "Provided further."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 15, after the word "them," to insert a colon and the following proviso:

And provided further, That to make unjust or unreasonable a rate or charge in handling or dealing in or with any necessaries, except where there has been a conspiracy, combination, or arrangement with reference to prices, such rate or charge must be in excess of the rate or charge fixed by a fair-price committee, and the Department of Justice is authorized to provide for the appointment of fair-price committees.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I offer a substitute for this proviso. I will say that it merely makes it clearer and plainer. The proviso in this bill now presented by the committee is an absolutely unworkable proposition. This covers the idea as the committee intended to cover it, and I offer it at the request of the chairman of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa offers a substitute for the amendment reported by the committee, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the committee amendment on page 4, line 15, it is proposed to insert:

And provided further, That except where there has been a conspiracy, combination, agreement, or arrangement with reference to prices, a rate or charge made in handling or dealing in or with any necessaries in a territory in which a just or reasonable rate or charge has been fixed by a fair-price committee shall not be deemed unjust or unreasonable unless it exceeds the maximum rate or charge fixed by such fair-price committee, and the Department of Justice is authorized to provide for the appointment of fair-price committees.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I am not very enthusiastic about any kind of legislation which contemplates substituting artificial means in fixing prices for the ordinary course of business based upon supply and demand. Of course, I am in perfect sympathy with that legislation—and, if necessary, criminal procedure under it—which prevents illegal combinations or conspiracies to produce profiteering; but where legislation goes beyond reaching a combination to put up prices, I think as a permanent proposition we will do better if we let the ordinary competition in trade work out the prices, and stimulate more production to meet consumption. I think if all the people engaged in labor in the United States would work a few more hours each day, whether upon the farm or in the cities and towns, and increase production, and in the meantime economize in expenditures, we would be following a course more likely to bring about beneficial results than from legislation seeking to interfere with normal courses in trade.

Mr. President, I desire to say the claim that no existing provision is found in the food law for controlling profiteering, or for enforcing the provisions of section 4 of that law, is unfounded. The original bill was prepared with some care. Section 4 defines a number of acts as being illegal. Later on in the law, section 6 handles the problem of hoarding, defines it elaborately, and provides for its punishment. Sections 8 and 9 provide for the punishment of other things made illegal by section 4, but there was one thing made illegal by section 4 which at that time it was not deemed proper to make a crime. Section 4 provides that it shall be illegal to make an unjust and unreasonable rate or charge in the sale of a commodity. Now, this bill adds to foodstuffs wearing apparel, and it is proposed to make it a crime to sell any foodstuffs or any wearing apparel at a price indefinitely described as "unjust or unreasonable."

What does that mean? What is the offense? When this bill was before the committee during the war and before the Senate, we did not think we should make that language a crime, or at least we did not undertake to do so; but in section 5 the amplest means were given to enforce it. Under section 5 the President was permitted to organize a system of licensing all lines of business engaged in handling foodstuffs and to prescribe rules and regulations fixing the profits. Section 5 authorized the representatives of the President, whenever their rules and regulations as to profits were violated, to notify the parties so violating, and, unless they promptly complied after notice, the license to conduct business could be forfeited. To do business without a license was a crime.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I simply desire to ask the Senator from Georgia if he contends that section 5 applies to an individual?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Does the Senator contend that the license provision applies to anyone doing less than $100,000 worth of business a year?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, no.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Then how are you going to reach the ordinary retailer?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The ordinary retailer does a business of over $100,000. There are very few retailers anywhere whose gross sales do not amount to $100,000 a year.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, I differ entirely with the Senator on that point. I think the majority of the retailers from whom the people buy their goods do less than $100,000 worth of business a year. I believe that the majority of retailers in the United States can not be reached by this section, and that this law as it stands and as I read it will not operate at all against that class.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, there are very few retail grocery merchants who do a business of less than $100,000 gross; and when we fixed the limit of $100,000 a year gross we fixed that limit because we felt that we reached a large majority of them, and we did not desire to go out hunting for those merchants who were doing only a small business. We felt sure that if we carried the rule to those doing a business of $100,000, the competition between them and the smaller men would make it impossible for the smaller men to sell at prices above those regulated and controlled by section 5. Undoubtedly the majority of the grocery stores in this city do a gross business of over $100,000 a year. If you look at their stores, if you look at their clerk hire, if you look at their automobiles for delivery, you can see that their fixed charges are so large they must necessarily do a business of more than $100,000 a year or they could not do business at all. Now, then, if we have 20 retail grocery stores in Washington, regulated under section 5, compelled to sell at certain reasonable prices, certain low prices, any man who did a business of less than $100,000 could not live at all if he undertook to put his prices at higher figures than theirs.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia further yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. For a question; yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. All that I wanted to say was this: I do not understand that this law applies only to the cities. I speak of the country in general; and I contend, and still believe, that the majority of the retailers of the United States do a business of less than $100,000 a year.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That was not the complaint about this law. I do not agree with the Senator. My own observation is that in an ordinary city or small town of 2,500 inhabitants in my own State the retailers do a business of over $100,000 a year. Several in those places where the complaint of exorbitant prices has principally been made were reached by section 5; and why was its enforcement abandoned? I do not know. The only trouble is that section 5 has been abandoned.

When this bill was before the House I opposed giving the President the powers given him under this law, and the Senate amended the bill as it came from the House of Representatives and provided for a board of three, one of whom should be the president of a college of agriculture, to enforce this law. We knew the President could not do it. It was just one of those hysterical acts, unwise and foolish at the time, giving him power which he could not perform. If we had created a board, and put the responsibility upon it, and made it accountable to the people of the country, instead of conferring this with the other vast, vast powers upon the President that he never has performed and could not perform, that he delegated first to one person and then to another, there would have been no occasion for this bill. We are partly to blame for passing that kind of foolish legislation.

The Senate provided, when the bill was before the Senate, that a board of three should administer this law. In conference we were forced to recede. I say "we"—I was on the conference, and I never did change my vote; but three of the Senate committee yielded and went with the House and gave the power to the President. If section 5 had been enforced there would have been no occasion for additional legislation. We did not make it a crime to charge an unreasonable profit, because language of that kind can not create a crime.

It is too indefinite. It is too uncertain. Now, let us see what we would do if, with the bill extending to the sale of wearing apparel, we, without further language, make it apply to an unfair or an unreasonable profit or price. You hold up every merchant in the land. You hang over every merchant selling wearing apparel or selling food the doubt as to what is a fair profit. What is a reasonable profit? Here are two merchants just across the street from each other. One may have been unusually bright in his purchases and obtained his goods at a lower price than did his rival across the street. Must he undersell him? Must he run him out of business? What is a reasonable profit? Mr. President, I am opposed to putting upon the statute books language so indefinite, and hanging the threat of criminal prosecution over the business men of this country, with no language of greater certainty to indicate to them what they are authorized to do.

I call attention to the decision of Mr. Justice Brewer in Fifty-second Federal Reporter, in which, where prosecution and conviction had been had against certain men under a statute which defined as a crime an unreasonable preference, without further language, Judge Brewer held:

> In order to constitute a crime, the act must be one which the party is able to know in advance whether it is criminal or not. The criminality of an act can not depend upon whether a jury may think it reasonable or unreasonable. There must be some definiteness and certainty.

Therefore we have added an amendment which is now subject to objection. The amendment which the committee added was that to make unjust or unreasonable a rate or charge in handling or dealing in or with any necessaries, except where there has been a conspiracy, combination, or arrangement with reference to prices, such rate or charge must be in excess of the rate or charge fixed by a fair-price committee, and the Department of Justice is authorized to provide for the appointment of fair-price committees.

Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] limits the application of that doctrine, as I understand it, to a place where there is a fair-price committee, so that if there is no fair-price committee at the locality you can prosecute a merchant, charging him with having made an unreasonable profit, indict him for it, and take him up on a warrant, without giving him any standard whatever as to what is a reasonable profit. I can not vote for the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, because I really do not believe in making criminal at all so indefinite a charge as that one has made an unreasonable profit.

I agree with the view of Judge Brewer that such language is too indefinite to constitute a crime. The case in the Fifty-second Federal Reporter was before the Supreme Court on one occasion, and while they neither affirmed it nor overruled it they discriminated the case then before the Supreme Court from the case ruled on by Judge Brewer. I regard it as too indefinite, and am opposed to such language attached to a crime. I am opposed to making criminal conduct any language so uncertain that every man engaged in business is left in doubt as to what are his rights, and as to whether he is complying with the law or violating the law.

I do not desire to discuss this subject elaborately. I wish to state my views, and to call attention to the fact that the original act, as it now stands, gives ample opportunity to prevent profiteering, to prevent unreasonable charges. Unfortunately, again I repeat, we did not create a commission to administer the law. If we had, it would have been administering the law now. But Mr. Hoover found it necessary to go abroad to take care of the world and left his responsibilities here. I am not sure that it was a great loss to our country. I would be afraid to say it was not a loss if the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] were here. I really have not made up my mind whether his leaving was a loss or a gain to the country. But, at any rate, he left, and section 5 ceased to be enforced about eight or nine months ago, and the difficultly is not with the lack of legislation; it is with the abandonment of legislation, if any such line of conduct was necessary.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I may be mistaken, but I understood that Mr. Hoover's duties here were terminated by Executive order. I would like to know whether the Senator has the same understanding?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not know. They were started by Executive order and they may have been stopped by Executive order. As I said before, my own view was that Executive order ought not to have had anything to do with it. We ought to have created our own commission, responsible to the public, as public officials, to discharge the duties that Congress placed upon them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. KENYON. Let me explain the matter to the Senator. This is a substitute for the proviso on page 4, merely making plain the situation. That proviso is absolutely unworkable. This is a substitute for it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KENYON. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is it not the effect of your substitute that in any place where there is no fair-price committee the provision making an unfair or unreasonable profit a crime would be enforced without a standard?

Mr. KENYON. Yes; I will have to say that is so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is the effect of it?

Mr. KENYON. That is the effect of it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Where there is a fair-price committee, then their standard would limit prosecution?

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Where there is no fair-price committee you would leave them to be prosecuted under the indefinite description of an unreasonable or unfair profit?

Mr. KENYON. Can the Senator suggest any remedy for that?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am opposed to any of it unless you have a standard.

Mr. KENYON. I am not enthusiastic about any of it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I just am not willing to vote for a provision that will make it a crime in any community for a merchant to make what the statute would call an unreasonable or an unfair profit without furnishing him any kind of standard of measurement as to what are unreasonable profits.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, to draw our attention and thought right to the question involved as to this substitute, does the Senator object to the substitute?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I object to it.

Mr. KENYON. I thought it was simply making it better. Under the Senator's provision the fair-price committee in New York might fix a price, and a prosecution might be in Iowa or Illinois, and the defense could take the price as fixed by the fair-price committee in New York. That is why I say the matter is absolutely unworkable.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is objectionable if the Senator's construction is right. Let me turn to the language for a moment.

Mr. KENYON. I really do not believe, I will say to the Senator from Georgia, there is much use in spending much time upon it, because I think the proviso is going to be beaten.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Both of them?

Mr. KENYON. I mean the Senator's proviso is going to be beaten, apparently.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not know. I do not believe the Senate as a whole, if it really voted upon it, would vote in favor of making a crime out of the term "unreasonable or unfair." I do not believe if the attention of the Senate is called to the fact that with the provisos beaten they are passing an act hanging over the head of every merchant in this country the possibility of criminal indictment, without telling him what constituted the offense, it will vote for it. I can not believe the Senate will vote for it. I think they will beat the whole thing if their attention is called to it, especially when they see that section 5 provided a full measure of relief, without making criminal so indefinite a charge.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I do not like this proposed legislation. I do not think anybody is very enthusiastic about it. It is difficult legislation. If it was to be permanent legislation, it would not secure my vote. But the Attorney General has come to Congress, and the President has done so, asking for this legislation. It is only going to be a period of perhaps 30 days, and in the meantime the Attorney General may be able to accomplish something by it. That is the only justification that I can get into my mind for voting for it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the substitute offered by the Senator from Iowa.

On a division the substitute was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Now, should not the committee amendment as amended be submitted to the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was a substitute, and was adopted.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understood that the Senator from Iowa offered a substitute for the amendment proposed by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was a substitute for the committee amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senate adopted the substitute offered by the Senator from Iowa. Does the Chair hold that that ends the matter?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The substitute was adopted.

Mr. SIMMONS. The effect of that was simply to substitute for the committee amendment the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, and the vote now is upon the amendment as amended.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I suggest that where a substitute is offered for another amendment and it is adopted it is simply an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and then the question must be upon agreeing to the amendment as amended by the substitution.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I think that, without question, the Senator from Connecticut is correct. I am in this position: I voted for the substitute offered by the Senator from Iowa, although I am against the Senate committee amendment as it is amended. I am placed in the attitude now of having voted for something I am against. I ought to have the right to vote against the proposition as amended.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I intend to support now the substitute of the Senator from Iowa. It does not go as far as I would like to go, but I am obliged to concede that those who are opposed to the amendment are entitled to a vote on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks when a substitute is offered it takes the place of the amendment. It was not offered as an amendment, but it was really a substitute in the nature of an amendment; and to relieve any question the Chair will put the question on the amendment as amended by the substitute.

On a division the amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment on page 2, which was passed over.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 14, the amendment was passed over relative to the prevention in the District of Columbia of unreasonable profits on dwelling houses, dwelling rooms, and apartments held for lease, sublease, or rent.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I move to amend, on pages 2 and 3, by striking out the amendments relating to unreasonable and excessive prices charged for rents or the items named in the amendments, and to substitute for those amendments what will be known as section 4. I will state that the proposed section 4 contains all the sections of the District bill referred to here as the Ball bill. I have so changed the draft of the bill that it will constitute one section to be known as section 4.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator please read the provision specifying the life of the measure?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is on page 12.

It is also declared that section 4 hereof shall be considered temporary legislation and that it shall terminate upon the expiration of four years from the date of its passage, unless sooner repealed.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all right.

Mr. SHERMAN. Section 4 includes the whole of the so-called Ball bill. I ask for the adoption of my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would suggest that the committee amendments be voted on and voted down, and that this be offered to come in at the end of the bill as a separate section.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, that course is thoroughly agreeable to me. I am in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois. I have not had occasion to read it nor to study it, but it is a step in the right direction. It is effective for at least four years. I hope the Senate will adopt it and that the conferees will agree to it, so that we can get the legislation on the statute books at a very early date.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the first committee amendment, on page 2, in line 14.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the second committee amendment on page 3, in line 13.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHERMAN obtained the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to reserve for consideration in the Senate the amendment and the substitute offered by the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That reservation will be noted.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think he and I have worked out something better, or he has worked out something better than the substitute which was adopted, and an amendment to the committee amendment would be much better than either of them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The record will show that the vote is reserved as requested by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator from Illinois will pardon me a moment, we could move to reconsider it now while the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] is here. I will state to the Senate what his suggestion is, and I am ready to accept it. On page 4, in line 21, after the word "committee" insert the words "of the locality," so that it will read "by a fair-price committee of the locality."

Mr. KENYON. I think that is a good suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the vote by which the substitute was adopted will be set aside. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Really I do not understand that amendment. If I construe it the way I think it will read, I am not in favor of it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It frees a man from prosecution if he has not charged more than the price fixed by the fair-price committee, and it gives him some standard by which he can do business and know that he will not be subject to prosecution.

Mr. SMOOT. The original amendment does that without adding the words "in the locality."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa suggests that a price fixed in New York might be applicable to other places. If he adds "in the locality" to the designation of the fair-price committee, then it will require that a fair-price committee in the locality shall fix prices before a man can be prosecuted.

Mr. SMOOT. That means there will be a fair-price committee in every locality.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Or else they will not be prosecuted under that provision. I am really opposed to prosecuting under that provision at all.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it is a very unwise suggestion. No matter what fair-price committee you have, it certainly will have to take into consideration where the goods are sold in determining what is the value of the goods; but this means that there shall be a fair-price committee in the community in which the goods are sold.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And if there is no fair-price committee in that locality, then it will not be effective.

Mr. HARRISON. It might be no crime whatever.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it is a very unwise suggestion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. My object is to hinder prosecution, and to prevent prosecution where a merchant has no standard from which he can tell what is a violation of the law. I simply do not believe that we ought to turn loose upon the merchants of this country an act which will make it criminal to charge an unreasonable or an unfair profit without in any way indicating to the merchant what is a reasonable or fair profit. I regard such a description of an offense as too indefinite to be fair to the men engaged in business throughout the country.

Mr. SMOOT. I sympathize with the Senator's position, but I believe that adding the words suggested by the Senator from Iowa will be held to mean that there may be nothing to it at all.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I would rather there should be nothing to it at all than what the unrestricted language would mean; but let me just make this suggestion to the Senator from Utah. If there were a community in which profiteering or extortion was taking place, then there could be a fair-price committee named at that place, and that fair-price committee could fix the standard; and if a merchant charged no more than that standard, he would be free from any danger of prosecution. I think, under the bill as it would stand with the proposed amendment, that there would be a great many communities in which no prosecutions could be conducted, and I do not think they ought to be conducted there. I do not think they ought to be conducted anywhere without giving a merchant more definite information as to what we mean shall constitute a crime than the simple declaration that he is charging an unfair or unreasonable profit.

Mr. SMOOT. If I thought this legislation was going to be enforced in the United States very many months—I do not mean a year, I mean months—I never would support it. I never would vote for such a bill as this if I thought that; but, really, if we are going to do a thing, let us do it. If it is bad, let it be bad and do not let us try by putting in some words to make it a perfectly useless thing.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator is not quite right about making it perfectly useless. Here is a community, we will say, that has no fair-price committee. Gouging and profiteering are going on, and the Attorney General is trying to get at it. They take the matter up with the Attorney General, and he arranges for one of these committees. Then they are in a situation to stop it. If the profiteering is not bad enough in the community for them to take it up with the Attorney General, then nobody will be particularly hurt. It will accomplish it, if this kind of a law can accomplish it. I have a great deal of sympathy with what the Senator says, and if this were for years, or even many months, I would not support it; but I am supporting it now merely as an emergency measure.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I want to ask some member of the committee why exacting unreasonable profits by one person is a crime and not made a crime when exacted by some other person. I find here that any person exacting an unreasonable rate or charge in handling or dealing in necessaries is a crime, provided, however, that it shall not apply to the farmer, the dairyman, the gardener, the ranchman, the stockman, and so on. I have a great deal of sympathy with farmers, dairymen, and stockmen, but if they charge unreasonable and excessive prices, it seems to me it is just as bad in them as it is in anybody else. Yet here we are, in a legislative way, saying that when one man does an unfair thing it is a crime, while if another man does the same unfair thing it is not a crime.

Mr. KENYON. The chairman of the committee unfortunately is not here to answer that very simple, but very perplexing question. I will do it as best I can.

Mr. ROBINSON. Where is the language to which the Senator from Washington refers?

Mr. KENYON. On page 4, in the proviso, beginning in line 10. No one justifies what might be termed class legislation. The way that is answered is this: We are trying to reduce the cost of living. We have got to get back, in the judgment, I think, of the wisest men, to more production. That is fundamental. We are not going to be able to do very much by law, although the people seem to think we can remedy all these things by statute. The object of this proviso, which was put in by the House, is that we should do nothing in a measure of this character to retard or discourage production. We have to be mighty careful in this kind of legislation. Any legislation is dangerous that tends to discourage the farmer or the producer, because it may accomplish just the opposite of what we are trying to do. For my part I am very much afraid of the whole business working out that way.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa if, as a lawyer, he thinks the courts will sustain legislation that makes the identical act a crime in the case of one man and not in the case of another?

Mr. KENYON. I have not any doubt about it, because it covers a class and does not apply differently to one portion of a class than to another portion, but takes in the class as a whole. I think the courts have very generally sustained that kind of legislation; and the Senator will notice that this is limited.

Mr. ROBINSON. Do I understand——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. The purpose of the exception, then, is to encourage rather than to discourage production?

Mr. KENYON. Yes; to encourage production.

Mr. ROBINSON. The authors of the bill thought that if they made a penalty of this nature applicable to those who are engaged in the work of production it would greatly diminish production and have the effect of increasing the difficulties of the problem which we have learned to know as the high cost of living.

Mr. KENYON. Exactly. The great trouble with the whole thing is production; as somebody said here, getting back to work. We do not want to do anything to discourage production. That is the theory of it, whether anybody agrees with it or not.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think that is a very correct explanation of the provision.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I come from a farming section of the country and am a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry; but I neither countenanced nor voted for this provision. I do not believe in a law which applies to some and exempts others. I do not think that that is good logic. That is what the amendment which it is proposed to put into the law does. If you are going to give a bonus to encourage production, give it; but do not pass a law that will exempt one class of people and strike at another class. Again, this bill will not affect the farmers, for they are the only people in the world who can not profiteer. They have to sell their product at what they are offered for it, so they can not be profiteers if they want to.

Mr. KENYON. I have said all I care to say upon the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote on the amendment was by unanimous consent reconsidered, and the question now is upon the original committee amendment, which the Secretary will state, together with the modification of the amendment, as suggested by the Senator from Georgia.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 15, after the word "them," it is proposed to insert a colon and the following proviso:

And provided further, That to make unjust or unreasonable a rate or charge in handling or dealing in or with any necessaries, except where there has been a conspiracy, combination, or arrangement with reference to prices, such rate or charge must be in excess of the rate or charge fixed by a fair-price committee—

The amendment suggested by Mr. SMITH of Georgia, following the word "committee," in line 21, is to insert the words "of the locality"— and the Department of Justice is authorized to provide for the appointment of fair-price committees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment as modified.

Mr. ROBINSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia what is the meaning of the words "of the locality," and what construction would be placed upon those words by a court?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will state to the Senator what I think the insertion of those words would do. Such a committee appointed in the District of Columbia would be a fair-price committee of this locality, but it would not be of Alexandria; it would apply to Washington and not to Alexandria. The effect would be simply that unless conditions in a community were such as to require it, there would probably be no fair-price committee; and where there was not a fair-price committee, there could be no criminal offense growing out of the charge that an unreasonable profit or an unfair profit had been made.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think the Senator from Georgia has correctly interpreted his amendment, and in view of the interpretation which he has placed on his own amendment, I intend to vote against it, for I believe that its adoption would destroy the effectiveness of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment as modified.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and still open to amendment.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, there are a number of textual amendments which ought to be made to the bill to preserve the symmetry of its structure, but which do not change its meaning, and to which I think there will be no objection. On page 1, line 3, after the word "That," I move to strike out the words "the first paragraph" and to insert "section 1."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KENYON. On page 1, line 7, after the numerals "1917," I move to strike out the words "be, and the same"; and, in the same line, after the word "amended," to strike out the words "so as."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KENYON. In section 2, at the bottom of page 2, line 23, I move to strike out the word "the" and to insert the word

"such"; and in the same line, after the word "act," where it occurs the first time, to strike out the remainder of line 23 and lines 24, 25, and line 1, on page 3; and, on page 3, before the word "August" to insert the word "of."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, page 2, line 23, it is proposed to strike out the word "the"; in the same line, after the word "act," where it occurs the first time, to strike out the words "entitled 'An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.' approved"; and, on page 3, before the word "August," to insert "of," so that if amended the section will read:

SEC. 2. That section 4 of such act of August 10, 1917, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the amendment is agreed to. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and still open to amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, did not the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] on yesterday offer an amendment, or is there not an amendment lying on the table which has been offered by him?

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to say to the Senator from Mississippi that the Senator from South Carolina desires to offer an amendment to strike out the words "wearing apparel," but he did not ask me to offer it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Utah will yield a moment, the Chair will state that he is informed that the Senator from South Carolina offered an amendment which has been printed and which will now be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 4, Mr. DIAL proposes to strike out the words "wearing apparel."

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, if the words "wearing apparel" are stricken from this bill, we will, of course, be unable to reach those who are profiteering in shoes and other articles which fall under the term "wearing apparel," and it would very materially affect the bill if it should be adopted.

Mr. SMOOT. Why confine the suggestion to shoes? Why not include ordinary dresses which used to sell for about $12 and which are now selling for from $75 to $80?

Mr. HARRISON. That is quite true.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHERMAN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill it is proposed to add as a new section the following:

SEC. 4. That when used in this section, unless the context indicates otherwise—

The term "rental property" means any building or any part thereof in the District of Columbia rented or hired for dwelling purposes, and the furniture or furnishings therein; but does not include hotels or apartments.

The terms "owner," "agent," "lessor," "tenant," "lessee," and "person" mean individuals, partnerships, joint-stock companies, associations, corporations, guardians, trustees, executors, administrators, and receivers.

The term "true value" means the actual market value of the property at the time in question.

The term "controversy" means any difference or dispute between an owner, lessor, or sublessor of any rental property, hotel, or apartment and the lessee, sublessee, or occupant thereof, with respect to the rent payable therefor or the right to possession thereof.

The term "jurisdiction" means the exercise of the powers, authority, and duties conferred upon the commission by this section.

The term "commission" means the Rent Commission of the District of Columbia.

That a commission is hereby created and established, to be known as the Rent Commission of the District of Columbia, which shall be composed of three commissioners not owning or representing owners of rental property, hotels, or apartments, or who are experienced in rental and housing problems, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. No person who has not been a bona fide resident of the District of Columbia for at least two years immediately preceding his appointment shall be appointed as a commissioner. The terms of all commissioners shall be two years, except that any person chosen to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the commissioner whom he shall succeed. The commission shall at the time of its organization and annually thereafter elect a chairman from its own membership. Any commissioner may be removed by the President for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office.

All the powers and duties of the commission may be exercised by a majority of its members. A vacancy in the commission shall not impair the right of the remaining commissioners to exercise all the powers of the commission. The commission shall have an official seal, which shall be judicially noticed.

That each commissioner shall receive a salary of $6,000 a year, payable monthly. The commission shall appoint a secretary, who shall receive a salary of $3,000 a year, payable in like manner, and it shall have authority to employ and fix the compensation of such employees as it may from time to time find necessary for the proper performance of its duties, and as may be from time to time appropriated for by Congress.

With the exception of the secretary, a clerk for each commissioner, and such special experts as the commission may from time to time find necessary for the proper performance of its duties, all employees of the commission shall be a part of the classified civil service, and shall enter the service under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the commission and by the Civil Service Commission.

All of the expenses of the commission shall be allowed and paid on the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor approved by the chairman of the commission. Until otherwise provided by law, the commission may rent suitable offices for its use.

That the assessor of the District of Columbia shall serve ex officio as an advisory assistant to the commission, but he shall have none of the powers or duties of a commissioner. He shall attend the meetings and hearings of the commission. It shall be the duty of such assessor, whenever requested by the commission, to supply to the commission any data and information contained in the records of his office. He shall receive, for the performance of the duties required by this section, a salary of $2,000 per annum, payable monthly, in addition to such other salary as may be prescribed for his office by law.

That for the purposes of this section the commission or its duly authorized agent or agents shall at all reasonable times have access to, for the purpose of examination, and the right to copy any books, accounts, records, papers, or correspondence dealing with any controversy which has been submitted to the commission; and the commission shall have power to require by subpœna the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of all such books, accounts, records, papers, and correspondence relating to any such controversy. Any member of the commission may sign subpœnas, administer oaths and affirmations, examine witnesses, and receive evidence.

Such attendance of witnesses and the production of such books, accounts, records, papers, and correspondence may be required from any place in the District of Columbia at any designated place of hearing within such District. In case of disobedience to a subpœna the commission may invoke the aid of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of such books, accounts, records, papers, and correspondence. Such court, in case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpœna issued to any person, may issue an order requiring such person to appear before the commission, or to produce books, accounts, records, papers, or correspondence, if so ordered, or to give evidence touching the matter in question; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof.

That it is declared that (a) all apartments and hotels and (b) all rental property within the District of Columbia are affected with a public interest, and that all rents or charges collected or made and all terms or conditions imposed for the occupancy of such property under lease, sublease, or other contract of hiring shall be fair and reasonable. The commission, upon complaint setting forth the existence of a controversy with respect to any such apartment or hotel or rental property shall determine whether the rent or charge therefor is excessive or whether the terms and conditions of lease or hiring are fair and reasonable; and if the commission shall determine that such rent or charge is excessive or that such terms and conditions are unfair or unreasonable, it shall determine and fix a fair and reasonable rent or charge therefor, which will permit the owner or lessor to obtain a fair return upon the true value of his property, and or shall determine and fix such fair and reasonable terms and conditions. The commission shall also, on complaint setting forth a controversy respecting the right to possession of any hotel accommodation, apartment, or rental property, determine the issue involved.

That the commission shall promptly hear and determine the issues involved in all controversies submitted to it. After such hearings the commission shall make and file its findings of facts and its decision and shall issue and cause to be served on either or both parties an order requiring either or both parties to comply with the commission's decision within a specified time. Unless within 30 days after the filing of the commission's decision either party shall appeal therefrom to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, the findings and the decision of the commission shall be final and binding upon both parties to the controversy. If such an appeal is taken from the decision of the commission, the record before the commission shall be certified by it to such court and shall constitute the record before such court, and the commission's decision shall not be modified or set aside by such court, except for errors of law. If either party shall apply to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence and shall show to the satisfaction of the court that such additional evidence is material and that there were reasonable grounds for the failure to adduce such evidence in the proceeding before the commission, the court may order such additional evidence to be taken before the commission and to be adduced upon the hearing in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as the court may deem proper. The commission may modify its findings as to the facts, or make new findings, by reason of the additional evidence so taken, and it shall file such modified or new findings, which, if supported by testimony, shall be conclusive, and its recommendations, if any, for the modification or setting aside of its original decision, with the return of such additional evidence. In the proceedings before such court on appeal from a decision of the commission, the commission shall appear by its counsel or representatives and submit oral or written arguments tending to support the findings and the decisions of the commission: Provided, That no proceeding to evict or dispossess any person from (a) any hotel accommodation or apartment, or (b) any rental property shall be commenced or prosecuted in any court of the District of Columbia pending the determination by the commission of a controversy involving the rights of such person to occupy said accommodation, apartment, or property.

That every lease, sublease, or other contract of hiring of (a) any apartment or hotel, or (b) any rental property, or any part thereof, in the District of Columbia entered into after September 15, 1919, shall be voidable, at the option of the lessee or sublessee, to the extent that the rents or charges, or other terms or conditions thereof, are unfair or unreasonable.

That any lessee, sublessee, tenant, or hotel guest claiming to be damaged by any lessor or sublessor or hotel proprietor or owner, by reason of any unfair or unreasonable rents or charges, or other unfair or unreasonable terms or conditions of renting or hiring imposed upon such lessee, sublessee, tenant, or hotel guest under a lease, sublease, or other contract of hiring entered into after September 15, 1919, or imposed subsequent to such date in the absence of any lease, sublease, or contract of hiring, may file a complaint with the commission briefly setting forth therein the facts involved. Thereupon a statement of such complaint shall be forwarded by the commission to the lessor, sublessor, or hotel proprietor, or owner complained against, who shall be called upon to satisfy the complaint or to answer the same in writing within a reasonable time, to be specified by the commission. If such person within the time specified shall make reparation for the damage alleged to have been done, such person shall be relieved of further liability to the complainant. If such person shall not satisfy the complaint within the time specified, it shall be the duty of the commission to hear and investigate the issues involved, under such procedure as it shall from time to time by general order prescribe. As soon as the commission shall have reached a decision in such proceeding, it shall make a report in writing in respect thereto, which shall state the conclusions of the commission, together with its decision in the premises, and, in case damages are awarded, such report shall include the findings of fact on which the award is made and shall include an order directing the person complained against to pay the complainant the amount to which he is entitled on or before a day named.

If such person does not comply with such order for the payment of money within the time limit prescribed in such order, the complainant, or any person for whose benefit such order was made, may file in the court of appeals for the District of Columbia a petition setting forth briefly the causes for which he claims damages and the order of the commission in the premises. Such suit shall proceed in all respects like other civil suits for damages, except that on the trial of such suit the findings and order of the commission shall be prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated, and except that the complainant shall not be liable for costs in the court of appeals of the District of Columbia nor for costs at any subsequent stage of the proceedings unless they accrue upon his appeal. If the complainant shall finally prevail, he shall be allowed a reasonable attorney's fee, to be taxed and collected as a part of the suit. All such complaints shall be filed within two years from the time the cause of action accrues, and not after, and a petition for the enforcement of an order for the payment of money shall be filed in the court of appeals of the District of Columbia within one year from the date of the order, and not after.

That the commission shall, by general order, from time to time prescribe the procedure to be followed in all proceedings under its jurisdiction authorized by this section, except as otherwise provided herein. Such procedure shall be as simple and summary as may be practicable, and the commission and all parties appearing before it shall not be bound by the technical rules of evidence or of pleading.

That no tenant, subtenant, lessor, or sublessor shall sublet any rental property without the written consent of the owner or his duly authorized agent, unless the commission, upon application, expressly authorizes such subletting in a particular case.

That any person who violates any provision of this section or willfully neglects or refuses to comply with any lawful order, regulation, or decision of the commission shall, upon conviction, be punished by a fine of not less than $100 or more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

That the public resolution entitled "Joint resolution to prevent rent profiteering in the District of Columbia," approved May 31, 1918, is hereby repealed, to take effect 30 days after the passage of this section, and all laws or parts of laws in conflict herewith are hereby repealed to the extent that they are in such conflict: Provided, however, That the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated and made immediately available to carry out the provisions of this section, one-half thereof to be paid out of money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated and the other one-half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

That if any clause, sentence, paragraph, or part of this section shall be adjudged by any court of competent jurisdiction to be invalid, such judgment shall not affect, impair, or invalidate the remainder thereof, but shall be confined in its operations to the clause, sentence, paragraph, or part thereof directly involved in the controversy in which such judgment shall have been rendered.

That it is hereby declared that the provisions of this section are made necessary by emergencies growing out of the war with the Imperial German Government, resulting in a scarcity of housing facilities in the District of Columbia, and giving rise to serious abuses practiced by owners, lessors, and sublessors, who have taken undue advantage of the increased demand for housing facilities. It is also declared that section 4 hereof shall be considered temporary legislation, and that it shall terminate on the expiration of four years from the date of its passage unless sooner repealed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Ohio, I understand, wishes to offer an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, no doubt this amendment will require a renumbering of the sections.

Mr. SMOOT. The numbers of the sections as they appear in the proposed amendment can be stricken out and the entire amendment appear as section 4.

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to offer an amendment to what is known as section 13 as it now appears in the pending amendment. On page 11, at the end of line 15, I move to amend the proposed amendment by inserting the following:

Provided, however, That if the tenant or tenants shall comply with the terms of tenancy, whether under a written or oral lease or by operation of law, and pay the rent as provided thereby, or shall pay such rent as may be fixed by the rent commission of the District of Columbia, or on appeal by the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, said tenant or tenants may not be dispossessed.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Illinois what the basis of his amendment is. As I understood it when read, the occupants of apartment houses may be exempted from the operation of its provisions.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; that is an error, as the Senator will see if he will read the entire amendment. I can understand how he might fall into that error. Property is classified so as to put some of it in the innkeeper's class and some in the class of private dwelling houses in which rooms are rented.

Mr. THOMAS. Very well; I understand now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I accept the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the Senator from Illinois offers it as a part of his own amendment?

Mr. SHERMAN. I accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask would that amendment affect this kind of a case: Suppose that the owner of a home had rented his dwelling, or the lessee of an apartment had leased his apartment, as the case might be, for a certain length of time, and at the end of that time desired to obtain possession of the dwelling house or apartment; under the provisions of the Senator's amendment, as I understand, the tenant could not be ousted, even though the lease had expired. Is that what the amendment would accomplish?

Mr. POMERENE. I was not expecting this matter to come up at this particular time; it was only after I came into the Chamber that I understood it was planned to offer the amendment which is now pending and which has been presented by the Senator from Illinois. It is not my desire to prevent the man who is a bona fide purchaser of property for residential purposes getting possession for the use of himself and his family. I have no such desire as that at all; I think that would be very unfair.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the amendment include that, does the Senator think?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest that the amendment again be stated from the desk.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; let it be read. It is probably comprehensive enough to include what the Senator from Mississippi suggests.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois on page 11, line 15, after the word "conflict," by inserting the following proviso:

Provided, however, That if the tenant or tenants shall comply with the terms of tenancy, whether under a written or oral lease or by operation of law, and pay the rent as provided thereby, or shall pay such rent as may be fixed by the rent commission of the District of Columbia, or on appeal by the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, said tenant or tenants may not be dispossessed.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, it would seem to me, according to the reading of the provision, that it would prevent one who owns a home and who wants to secure possession of it from getting possession if the commission should say that the rent paid was reasonable. I am afraid it would work hardship in some cases. May I ask the Senator from Illinois if the bill known as the Ball bill takes care of such a situation as that?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it does. I think, under the entire bill, a bona fide owner, even under a recent conveyance, can obtain possession of his property. The commission, however, will have power to examine into the circumstances of the conveyance, and if it is merely a colorable conveyance and made for the purpose of evicting the tenant, the commission would have power to ignore such a conveyance.

Mr. HARRISON. Would not that take care of the very situation which the Senator has in mind?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; it would not, I am quite sure. If I understand the Senator's amendment correctly, a number of tenants have held over under what is known as the Saulsbury joint resolution. In doing so they have been compelled to incur the ill will of many of the landlords or owners of property. If no provision is made, there would be discrimination against those tenants and they would not be permitted even to rent on the same terms as other tenants. In fact, threats of that kind have been made—they have come to me very commonly—so that all who have held over under the Saulsbury joint resolution would be evicted. Even if they offered to pay the same rent under the same terms of the lease, it would not make any difference. They would go out because they are personally objectionable to the landlords for having claimed their rights under the Saulsbury resolution; and, if I understand the amendment correctly, it is to cover a case of that kind.

Mr. SMOOT. It will cover more than that.

Mr. POMERENE. It is to cover that; but may I suggest this thought to the Senator—and I am obliged to depend upon the Senator from Illinois to construe properly the amendment which he presented, as I have not had the opportunity to study the last draft of it.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] puts this state of facts to me: If an individual should make a bona fide purchase of a residence for his family, and so forth, and it should then be occupied by a tenant, could the purchaser get possession of that home which he had just purchased?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is to say, as the grantee of property, could he get possession of his own property under this provision?

Mr. POMERENE. That is it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think, under the whole bill, he could; but I am perfectly willing that it shall be made specific in the amendment that this shall not apply to the bona fide purchaser of property in the District.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio must have some change made in it, or else if the owner of a piece of property, his own home, rented it, say, four months ago for a term of six months and at the end of the six months he desires his home, if the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio is adopted without some modification he would not be able to get his home provided the tenant is willing to pay the rent that the commissioners may say is reasonable.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I think the amendment which I have just offered should be altered so as to care for the situation suggested by the Senator from Mississippi as well as that suggested by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I suggest that after the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio the following be added:

Provided further, That a bona fide owner of a house who desires to occupy it himself or herself shall have the right to possession of such house upon giving 10 days' notice of his or her desire to occupy the same.

Mr. POMERENE. Allow me to make the further suggestion that the Senator say "that the bona fide owner or purchaser."

Mr. McKELLAR. "Owner or purchaser"; yes.

Mr. POMERENE. Would not that take care of the situation suggested by the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. McKELLAR. I think it would, and I offer that as an amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. Why not make it "dwelling house"? It applies to a house and not to an apartment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; make it apply only to a dwelling house.

Mr. ROBINSON. Why do you add the word "purchaser," may I inquire? The purchaser of a house, if in good faith, is the owner of it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think so, and I think it is immaterial. I just added it at the request of the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee will send up his amendment and let it be stated.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have just sent it to the desk.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio the following:

And provided further, That a bona fide owner of a dwelling house who desires to occupy it himself or herself shall have the right to possession of such house upon giving 10 days' notice of his or her desire to occupy the same.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is upon agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois a question. I gather from the hearings taken by the subcommittee and from other information that has come to me that threats have been made by landlords, especially those who are renting apartments to tenants, that unless they signed up contracts of leases by the 1st of October, or before that time, after the Saulsbury law is repealed they would be made to suffer, and that contracts had been signed already under those conditions. Is there anything in this amendment that would meet a situation like that? I see that it covers leases made after September 15, but if there is any way in which we could cover a situation like that, I should like to see it done.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a condition of that kind existing, and I think a section ought to be added to cover it, if it is not already covered. I had understood that there was a provision of that kind in the bill. I have not seen the print. I am just running through it now. The Senator has prepared a section of that kind.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I submitted a rough draft of a proposition of that kind to the chairman of the committee on yesterday. I have been busy myself, and I understood that it had been turned over to the drafting expert to be put in proper shape, and understood that it was going to go in the bill, but the only provision I see is the provision limiting it to September 15. I have not here the draft that I prepared. I will ask the Senator this question: Does the Senator think the commission that is provided for here could, to use a common expression, overhaul a lease of that kind?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not any doubt of it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. And, if it found that the rents were unreasonable, readjust them?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If that is the case, I think that would take care of the situation pretty well.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say that I have no doubt that the powers of a rent commission here are of such a plenary character that they could investigate a transaction of that kind and readjust it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think that would take care of the situation.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say that if that is not found to be covered upon the printing of the entire bill, it will be covered in the conference committee, because it was the unanimous desire of the members of the District of Columbia Committee that such a provision be inserted.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Very well. I do not think there will be any point of order made against any conference report which covers that.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I have been unable to follow very accurately the amendments which have recently been adopted to this provision, and I want to ask some one who has charge of the measure whether, under the amendment last agreed to, the owner of a property or the purchaser of it can recover possession of his house if he desires to occupy it himself, but in order to recover possession of it he must occupy it, and will not be permitted to lease it or rent it to another? Is that the policy of the legislation that is proposed here?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio can answer that question.

Mr. POMERENE. My mind was occupied with another question, and I was not following the query of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have stated that it was quite difficult, in the confusion that existed at the time the amendment of the Senator from Ohio was adopted, to determine the effect of its provisions; and I desire to know whether the amendment as now proposed or as modified by the amendment of the Senator from Ohio will permit a bona fide owner or purchaser of property to recover possession of it if he desires to occupy it himself, but deny him the right to lease or rent his property?

Mr. McKELLAR. My interpretation of the amendment is that as long as the tenant pays his rent, and it is a reasonable rent, the owner of the property will not be permitted to take it away from him and rent it to some one else.

Mr. ROBINSON. Even though he may have purchased it recently?

Mr. POMERENE. No, no; if the purchaser or owner desires it for his own home, he can get possession.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, he can get possession right away; but, in other words, he will not be allowed to profiteer on taking it away from one tenant and giving it to another tenant because the other tenant will pay more rent.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well. Assuming that the Senator from Tennessee purchased a residence in the city of Washington yesterday, and that there is a tenant occupying the property under an existing lease, or under existing law, then the Senator from Tennessee can not eject the tenant, however objectionable that person may be, or however objectionable the terms of the lease of that person may be, even though the Senator from Tennessee purchased the property but yesterday.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, this expressly provides that he must comply with all the terms of the lease—that goes to the question of keeping it in repair and in proper order—and not be guilty of any unseemly conduct in the premises, and must pay such rent as is provided for, either by the lease itself, under the operation of the Saulsbury law, or the rent as it may be fixed under the provisions of the pending bill. The especial reason for this is that I am satisfied from what I have heard—and my information I believe to be authoritative—that there is an understanding among some of these apartment-house owners that they will eject anybody, if they can, if they know that he has taken advantage of the Saulsbury law. That is the situation; and the manager of one of the great apartment houses in this city told me that it was his belief that there was such an understanding as that.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, may I ask a question of the Senator from Ohio?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. ROBINSON. A case was recently stated to me by a citizen of Washington, who, some years ago, made a lease upon a home in this city to a tenant. That tenant has rented rooms in the home for an amount exceeding the total rent that is paid under the contract with the owner of the home, and is enjoying the occupancy of the home practically without any compensation whatever. Now, does the Senator mean to tell me that the owner of that home can not recover the possession of his home under such circumstances under the law that it is proposed to enact, and that his tenant will be permitted to profiteer as the circumstances of that case plainly imply that he is profiteering?

Mr. POMERENE. No; that is expressly cared for by the amendment which is offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. And it is expressly cared for, in addition, by the provisions of this whole act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think, taking the entire act, together with the amendment, the owner can recover possession of the property for his own use.

Mr. McKELLAR. Unquestionably so.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is not any question about it.

Mr. McKELLAR. None whatever.

Mr. SHERMAN. The commission has very full powers on a question of that kind.

Mr. ROBINSON. I understand that. I ask the Senator from Illinois whether, under the case I have stated, in order to recover, the owner of the home must occupy it himself? Or I will ask the Senator from Tennessee that question.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator answers, "Of course." It is not so patent to me that there is justice in a proposition that would permit the existing tenant to hold over under a provision of law when that tenant is manifestly profiteering out of a lease that was made under conditions which existed years ago.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree entirely with the Senator about that.

Mr. ROBINSON. What I am anxious to know is whether the provisions that the Senators are attaching to the bill will enable the owner of the home to secure substantial justice and protect the owner against the profiteering of the tenant in such cases.

Mr. McKELLAR. It will certainly protect the owner against the profiteering of the tenant. The bill provides for that very thing. I am not one of the authors of the bill; I am not on the committee; but as I read the bill it will absolutely protect the owner, and not only the owner but the public, against the profiteering of a tenant in such case as the Senator from Arkansas describes. There is no doubt in the world about the fact that the public ought to be protected against that kind of profiteering, and that is what the commission is created for, with full authority to provide against the very thing the Senator from Arkansas so well describes.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I want to state this sort of a case—I understand it is an actual one—to the Senator from Tennessee and ask if under the provisions of the bill relief will be given: An owner of rented property in the District made a lease to a person living outside the District for $30 or $35 a month. This nonresident made a sublease to a subtenant for $75 per month, thus securing a profit of more than 100 per cent on the investment monthly. The owner is cognizant of the fact and is anxious to relieve the subtenant but unable to do so. Under the provisions of the bill will the owner have a remedy whereby he can put an end to that injustice?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think so, under section 6 of the bill, lines 5, 6, and 7, on page 6, which provide that—

> If the commission shall determine that such rent or charge is excessive or that such terms and conditions are unfair or unreasonable, it shall determine and fix a fair and reasonable rent or charge therefor, which will permit the owner or lessor to obtain a fair return upon the true value of his property, and shall determine and fix such fair and reasonable terms and conditions.

Mr. THOMAS. I am very glad to know that.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that is to cover such cases.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. I send the following amendment to the desk and ask to have it read.

Mr. ROBINSON. To what does the Senator's amendment apply—to the proposed amendment to the pending bill or to the bill itself?

Mr. THOMAS. To the rent amendment itself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 16, after the word "commissioners," insert "not owning or representing owners of rental property, hotels or apartments, or who are."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the section, if the amendment is adopted, will read as follows:

> That a commission is hereby created and established, to be known as the rent commission of the District of Columbia, which shall be composed of three commissioners, not owning or representing owners of rental property, hotels or apartments, or who are experienced in rental and housing problems.

My reason for offering the amendment is to prevent the appointment of three landlords as commissioners, and I am sure that the bill will give greater satisfaction if it is so framed as to exclude the possibility of that sort of a commission. In offering it I do not want to be understood as reflecting upon the integrity of the landlords beyond the fact that we all are actuated by our personal interests, and it would be more than human to expect a commission thus organized, and composed of men who are landlords, or engaged in renting property for themselves or others, to occupy the same attitude in the community as others on such an important subject.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. What are the qualifications which the Senator prescribes for these commissioners?

Mr. THOMAS. I make no change in the qualifications fixed by the bill, but limit it to those who have those qualifications and who are not landlords themselves.

Mr. ROBINSON. It excludes landlords from membership on the commission?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. I see no objection to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I think this is a very proper amendment. I do not see how it can be objected to. I do not believe it will be, and I hope the chairman of the committee will accept the amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. I am perfectly willing to make it read "not more than one of whom shall," but that can be fixed in conference.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let it go as it is.

Mr. THOMAS. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to which the Senator offers an amendment was agreed to. By unanimous consent the vote by which the amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered, and the vote will then be taken upon the amendment as amended.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

WELCOME TO GEN. PERSHING.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, which was read:

> Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That a joint session of the Senate and House of Representatives be held in the Hall of the House of Representatives at 2 o'clock on the afternoon of Thursday, September 18, 1919, in welcome of John J. Pershing, General of the Armies of the United States and Commander in Chief of the American Expeditionary Forces of the World War; that the program and procedure at such joint session shall be in accordance with the report of the joint committee of the Senate and House appointed under House concurrent resolution 29; that the said committee is hereby authorized to make all necessary arrangements for such joint session; and that all expenses incurred by the committee in the execution of the provisions of this resolution shall be paid one-half from the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, on behalf of the Committee on Military Affairs I move that the Senate concur in the resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I do not want to make any objection to the resolution, but I wish to make a statement to the Senate before we act on it. I am quite sure it will not delay the matter; it is not for that purpose; it is to state an embarrassment that has arisen in fixing the date. I do not think the Secretary of War, or whoever was officially responsible for fixing the date, understood the conflict that has arisen.

The Grand Lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows hold their centennial celebration for the United States and Canada at Baltimore, Md., on the 17th day of September, the same day that is fixed for the celebration of the return of Pershing and his soldiers. I understood that some of the officers of the Grand Lodge had conferred with the Secretary of War, and had made arrangements by which the conflict would not occur; but I am certain that the date is the same, because I presented a resolution from the Grand Lodge of Odd Fellows of the State of Maryland covering the same question, and there is a conflict.

There are about 2,000,000 of those members. There will be some thousands of them in Baltimore on the 17th. It will prevent their attendance, and they very much wish to attend the occasion here in honor of Pershing and his soldiers. They can not do both, because the two occasions being fixed on the same day at different points, it is an irreconcilable conflict.

I only wish that some way might be suggested by which the conflict could be remedied. This centennial celebration of the Odd Fellows is a matter reaching back for many years, and is fixed by the calendar, on the date of the founding of the order. Not only will it interfere with the Baltimore bands and the music that is to be furnished here, but a great number of citizens from Baltimore and the State of Maryland and adjacent States who are members of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows can not attend. I wish to ask the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] if there is any way he knows by which these dates can be changed; or have the arrangements so proceeded that they can not be changed?

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I regret to say to the Senator from Illinois that the date seems to be fixed. It was only after consultation with Gen. Pershing and after consideration of conditions in Baltimore in regard to the Odd Fellows' parade that it seemed as if 2 o'clock on the 18th was the only available hour. We hoped that the arrangement here, occupying so short a space of time, might still leave either the morning or later in the afternoon and the evening for Baltimore, because the joint meeting here will be a brief occasion, and the ceremonies will commence at 2 o'clock, in order that they may be over early in the afternoon.

Mr. SHERMAN. On the 17th?

Mr. SPENCER. The joint meeting of the two Houses will take place on the 18th.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the resolution of the House of Representatives.

The resolution was unanimously concurred in.

CONTROL OF FOOD PRODUCTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8624) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. There is a Senate committee amendment in lines 4 and 5, page 2, that is not in italics, but is a committee amendment to the bill as passed by the House. The amendment covers the words "wearing apparel, containers primarily designed or intended for containing foods, feeds, or fertilizers." The Senate has agreed to that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate has not. The Secretary will report the amendment. The Chair will state to the Senator from Mississippi that the words are not printed in italics, and the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] was rejected. It was an amendment to strike out those words.

Mr. HARRISON. I knew that amendment had been rejected, but it is a mistake that the words are not printed in italics. It is a Senate committee amendment, and it ought to be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be regarded as an amendment, and will be agreed to. The Chair hears no objection. If there are no further amendments as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understood that the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] was adopted as a substitute for the committee amendment and remained in the bill; that the effort to reconsider was defeated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia is mistaken. The amendment was reconsidered by unanimous consent and the question was then submitted on the original committee amendment, as amended by the amendment of the Senator from Georgia, and that amendment was defeated. So as the bill now stands neither the amendment offered by the committee nor the substitute offered by the Senator from Iowa is contained in the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then I thought the substitute of the Senator from Iowa was adopted by the Senate. I thought we went back to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was not considered afterwards. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Georgia proposes in lieu of the amendment reported by the committee, on page 4, after line 15, to insert:

And provided further, That except where there has been a conspiracy, combination, agreement, or arrangement with reference to prices, a rate or charge made in handling or dealing in or with any necessaries in a territory in which a just or reasonable rate or charge has been fixed by a fair-price committee shall not be deemed unjust or unreasonable unless it exceeds the maximum rate or charge fixed by such fair-price committee; and the Department of Justice is authorized to provide for the appointment of fair-price committees.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, one or two Senators say they do not know what the amendment is about. It simply provides that where there is a fair-price committee in existence, no one shall be considered guilty of having charged an unfair or unreasonable price if the price is not in excess of the price fixed by that fair-price committee. It is simply a fair-price committee which furnishes the merchant a standard by which he can conduct his business knowing that he will not be subject to indictment.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the Senator from Georgia a question? Does he mean by fair-price committee a committee that is appointed in pursuance of law?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In pursuance of the act itself. It allows the Attorney General to name the fair-price committee.

Mr. POMERENE. I was not clear in my mind whether the Senator meant a fair-price committee that might be named by authority of some law, or a general fair-price committee that might be appointed by virtue of some action which has been taken by a community. I do not think the latter should be done.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There were fair-price committees under the food-control law. The Attorney General has requested those fair-price committees to resume their work, and this amendment provides that a fair-price committee may be named by the Attorney General.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to ask the Senator from Georgia if the result of his amendment would not be practically turning over the enforcement of this act to the various fair-price committees?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

Mr. McKELLAR. Would it not have that tendency, at least? It would weaken the act very much, it seems to me.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In the first place, I think it will make the act valid. I do not think there is any possibility of the conviction of anybody under a statute so general as one containing provisions making unreasonable or unfair profits a crime. I think it is absolutely necessary, in order to make it effective, that some definite language should be used and something should be furnished to give a standard for what is unfair or unreasonable. The Attorney General has requested in various cities the old fair-price committees who cooperated in the matter of food control to go back to work, and in most of the large cities they have done so. The committee went further than this amendment.

Mr. KIRBY. What is the difference between the amendment the Senator proposes and the amendment proposed by the committee?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There is just this difference. Under the committee amendment, wherever there was no fair-price committee there could not be a prosecution at all. Under the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, wherever there is a fair-price committee the standard fixed by that committee would exempt from prosecution if the charge was not in excess of the price fixed by that fair-price committee. Where there is no fair-price committees, then the question as to whether the profit was unreasonable or unfair would be left without a standard. In the one case there could be no prosecution unless there was a fair-price committee. In the other case, the standard only exists where there is a fair-price committee and there can be prosecutions elsewhere.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH].

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel,' approved August 10, 1917, and for other purposes."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the pleasure of the Senate with reference to the bill 2992 as reported from the District Committee? Shall it remain on the calendar or shall it be indefinitely postponed?

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest that it remain on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will remain on the calendar.

THE RAILROAD PROBLEM.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I have a short article on the railroad problem, which I would like to have inserted in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Reprinted from Manufacturers' Record, May 29, 1919.]

A PLAN SUGGESTED AS "THE KEY TO THE SOLUTION OF THE RAILROAD PROBLEM."

[W. A. Jarrel, D. D., LL. D., Station A, Dallas, Tex.]

"Having been a close, watchful student of the railroad problem the last 30 years, the following seems clearly to me the key to its solution. Maybe not in every particular, but substantially its solution. Its solution must be not by Government ownership but by Government regulation. Of course, as there can be no regulation without the control that is necessary to effect regulation, in the sense of the necessary control for regulation, regulation and control practically are identical. The key to the solution of the railroad problem is a wisely and fairly constituted railroad commission. Such commission must—

"1. Numerically fairly represent the people and the railroads. At least the railroads ought to, within one, have an equal number of members on every commission. The only argument for the roads not having an equal number to the people of representatives on the commission is to prevent a tie-up of the commission; one or the other side should have one majority; and while the roads are as fairly entitled to that one majority as are the people, the people are as fairly entitled to it as are the roads, and public sentiment would not consent to the roads having it. One of the greatest of railroad attorneys tells me that the roads will be satisfied for the one majority to represent the people. If it be said that this is an invidious classification, the answer is politicians' war on the roads long ago—not all politicians have waged this war—arrayed the people and the roads against each other. Such a commission is so self-evidently fair to both sides that to conceive of any fair-minded person objecting to it is seemingly impossible, and consequently its regulations would commend themselves to both parties so as to affect the desirably amicable relation between them.

"2. Let each side select its part of the commission. If not by election, at least allow the railroads to nominate the proportion of commissioners for which the law provides.

"3. The railroad representation in the commission to be composed of such a number of practical railroad men as the railroads deem necessary. Although the roads would look after this, yet better to provide for it by law specifically. That railroad business without practical management can no more prosper or survive than can any other great line of business is self-evident, and that practical management, as a rule, must be by men who are practical railroad managers is equally self-evident. Even receivers of railroads who are not practical railroad men, and of such railroad directors as are not practical railroad men, are essentially dependent on the judgment of practical railroad men.

"4. Subject to removal, for good cause, such as provided for by law, the members of the commission to serve for life, just as the United States Supreme Court judges. This insures only the most practical railroad commissioners. Even railroad men are made as commissioners more efficient by experience—prevents their being influenced by frequent election contests, and keeps them and the commission out of politics.

"5. Provide by law that the commission make all tariff rates so that they allow neither unreasonable profits on railroad investment, nor such low rates as to prevent keeping the roads in first-class condition for public use; and that, in any case, tariff rates do not permit sufficient money to put and to keep them in the necessary condition, the Government make up the lack. That these great arteries of commerce and travel are so vital that money to the people is saved even when necessary for them to pay high tariff rates, or even taxes, to put and to keep them in the most healthy and efficient condition admits of no denial. The 'skin game' of reducing railroads to starvation efficiency that other lines of business may be fat and sleek partakes more of the nature of the outcry of Bolshevism against corporations than it does of civilization. To every interest of our people it is suicidal. The crippled condition that the war found our railroads and their necessary rescue by the Government from the commissions that caused these conditions, that it lick the Kaiser, of this leaves no room for doubt.

"6. For intrastate matters, State commissions; for interstate, United States commissions.

"7. Inasmuch as the United States commission is farther from local influence, provide that in matters of controversy between State and United States commissions the latter is to give the final decision. Among other advantages, this provision will prevent the vexations and railroad crippling that are the inevitable result of conflicting decisions of the commissions of the several States.

"8. Whether all decisions of these commissions—without any appeal to the courts—should not be final is suggested for consideration. With the fairness and ability of such commissions, why should not both sides trust them as well or even better than the courts, since they know far more of all matters involved than the courts can know?

"9. Such commissions will be such masters of all that pertains to railroad wages and all other railroad matters, constitute them arbiters of not only all controversies and disputes between the people and the roads, but arbiters of all matters between the roads and their employees. Backed by all Government authority and power, make all the decisions of the commissions final.

"In conclusion, so efficient and so satisfactory will be such commissions that the railroads will be taken out of politics and meet our necessities."

BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, with respect to the bill (H. R. 7478) to amend sections 5200 and 5202 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by acts of June 22, 1906, and September 24, 1918, which the Senate considered for some hours to-day on motion of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], some of us very much desire to proceed now to the consideration and final disposition of that bill, but the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], we are informed, has an amendment which he desires to offer to the bill, and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has indicated, as has also the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], that, in their opinion, it would not be practicable to reach a final conclusion concerning the bill to-day. On consultation with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] I have learned that it is his expectation that the Senate will be asked to proceed to the consideration of this bill during the morning hour on Monday next, and with that understanding, realizing that it will be difficult, if not impossible, to secure final action on the bill to-day, for my part I am willing that the measure shall go over until Monday.

Mr. POMERENE. I shall not interpose any objection to that course, but I think the measure should be disposed of one way or another.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, there have been several attempts to get up the bill in the past two weeks. It is a very urgent and a very necessary measure. If the Senate adjourns from to-day until Monday and the treaty is taken up on Monday, we will stand little chance of getting up the bill for consideration. I can see no reason why we should not meet to-morrow and try to pass the bill and finish it so that we can proceed Monday to the consideration of the treaty.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the rent bill, so called, was put upon the bill just passed, and it was tentatively agreed if that were done we would adjourn over until Monday. Quite a number of Senators are out of the city, even at this time, and it would be very difficult to get a quorum to-morrow. A number of Senators have left now to meet Gen. Pershing, who arrives in the city at 4 o'clock to-day. I think we will make headway and no one will be interfered with at all if we devote to-morrow to our own personal affairs, letters, other business, and to attending committee meetings that I know are to be held. I think we will make just as much time as if we were to hold a session to-morrow.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator think we can get this bill up on Monday?

Mr. SMOOT. I have not any doubt of it in my mind.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Utah assures me that we will get it up Monday during the morning hour, and if we do not finish it then that it can be considered in the morning hour on Tuesday; and with the assurance of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] that he will help us to get up the bill, I think the difficulties are out of the way.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Georgia is always so amiable that I could not resist his appeal.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate adjourn until Monday next at 12 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, September 15, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, September 12, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. William Couden, late chaplain of the Second Division, American forces in Germany, offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Lord of Hosts, we thank thee for the readiness with which men have been willing to face hardship and danger, yea even death, in a soldier's or a Navy man's life whenever our Nation has been threatened. We are grateful for all our war leaders of the past, men like our Washington, our Perry, our Grant, our Farragut, our Sheridan, and our Dewey; and especially to-day for our gallant Gen. Pershing and all who planned for and led our forces in the dread months of the war just ended.

And now we ask Thy blessing upon every man, black or white, who served under the Stars and Stripes in that war. May every American appreciate what they have done and were willing to do not only by loud huzzahs and striking pageants, but chiefly by courtesy, justice, and kindness. We ask also, O Lord, that those who return to civil pursuits may continue to show their love of the country by being good men, useful laborers, and worthy citizens.

Let the rest of us see to it that they are returning to a country worth loving. May those who spent the years of war at home devote themselves to the public good with a service as faithful and unselfish as that of the humblest private watching in darkness, loneliness, and peril his remote post in the rains of France or the snows of Siberia. Thus may we have a country of men and women united in mutual helpfulness and consecrated to the things that are good and beautiful and true. For Jesus' sake, amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CHANGE IN DATE OF ADDRESS.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, by the favor of the House I was granted unanimous consent to address the House on the 17th, the anniversary of the adoption of the Constitution, on constitutional government. Since then the House has decided to have a recess over that day, and as the next day also will be occupied with the proceedings for the reception of Gen. Pershing I ask unanimous consent that the date may be changed from the 17th to the 19th.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the leave granted him by the House be transferred from the 17th to the 19th. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

HOUR OF MEETING ON TUESDAY NEXT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns on Monday next it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. on Tuesday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns on Monday next it adjourn to meet at 11 a. m. on Tuesday. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman why and wherefore?

Mr. MONDELL. We expect to have a considerable amount of debate on Tuesday in connection with the business before the House.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What about?

Mr. MONDELL. We will probably have up a revenue bill at that time, and there is likely to be a considerable amount of debate, and I thought it would be better to meet at 11 o'clock.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the gentleman refer to a deficiency bill?

Mr. MONDELL. No; probably the dyestuff bill will be brought up on that day.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. When are we going to have the deficiency bill considered?

Mr. MONDELL. Either to-morrow or Monday. It depends on when the committee is ready.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is this extra hour the gentleman is asking for going to be devoted to jimcrack speeches or not? [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. I should not want to characterize the speeches in advance. [Laughter.]

Mr. DYER. Reserving the right to object, when are we to have the railroad bill, if the gentleman knows.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman will have to ask the committee which is working so industriously and continuously on that subject. I am sure we all hope that the committee will bring the bill in as soon as it is consistent with a thorough consideration of that important matter.

Mr. EMERSON. I would like to ask the gentleman if the cold-storage bill is coming up next week.

Mr. MONDELL. I hope very soon; but it is impossible to say when.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Reserving the right to object, what is the probability about bringing up the so-called Mondell settlement bill?

Mr. MONDELL. There are other matters some of which have been on the calendar longer than that bill and we can not say just now when the bill will be taken up.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I am informed that each Member of the House and perhaps of the Senate, received a copy of a newspaper published in New York called the New York Call, of the date of August 29. This paper charges that the leaders of the Republican Party are in conspiracy with Mexican bandits for some purpose or other. [Laughter.]

The paper offers as proof of the conspiracy a letter purporting to have been written by some Mexican with an unpronounceable name, now in Cuba, and a facsimile of the letter is published in order to show the real gravity of the offense.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Does the paper offer a reward for the capture and apprehension of the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No; no offer of reward has as yet been made. The letter purports to have been written in Habana on the 28th day of July, 1919. The letter is not addressed to me, although the paper says that it is addressed to me, introducing one William Gates, who appeared before the committee.

The letter was written in Habana on the 28th of July. If it ever reached Washington I do not know it; I never saw the letter nor a copy of it. I did not know that such a man existed as the purported writer. The letter was never presented by Mr. Gates or anyone else to me, or to any member of the committee to my knowledge. Mr. Gates appeared and gave his testimony before the Committee on Rules on the 28th day of July in Washington—on the same day this letter purports to have been written in Habana.

The article in the New York Call assumes that this Mexican bandit introduced his friend, Mr. Gates, to me as the chairman of the Committee on Rules, and that the conspiracy was thus completed through introduction by the letter. As a matter of fact, Mr. Gates appeared before the committee voluntarily, as a number of others did. He did not appear with a letter from this Mexican bandit. He appeared probably four days before the letter could have reached Washington, so there is nothing in the conspiracy. It may be that the committee was somewhat taken in by this fellow Gates. As soon as it was discovered through the publication of some letters that Gates had connections with some factions in Mexico, the committee dropped Mr. Gates.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. In other words, this entire statement is false from beginning to end?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. False from beginning to end; yes.

Mr. GARNER. But there is one statement in it that is correct, I think, and I insist that it is correct, and that is that the gentleman from Kansas is one of the Republican leaders.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That part of it may or may not be true. Mr. Gates's testimony was published in the same pamphlet with Ambassador Fletcher's testimony—only 500 copies were published. The records of my office show that less than 20 copies were sent out—several persons called at the office and got copies—the remainder of them are still in my office. I do not say that the New York Call viciously published the letter referred to and sought to show a fault on the part of anyone. I think the paper has been imposed upon, and I am satisfied that it will make the corrections that this statement calls upon it to make. I believe the Call will be fair to me and to the Committee on Rules and to the leaders of the Republican Party by publishing the fact that Mr. Gates appeared before the committee without knowledge by any member of the committee that the letter of which it publishes a facsimile had ever been written or had any knowledge of the alleged bandit who wrote it.

THE RECORD.

Mr. RUCKER rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a request for the correction of the RECORD, but want to do so only if the gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. MCLAUGHLIN, is present.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. MCLAUGHLIN, present this morning?

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, he does not seem to be present now. I have been attempting to bring this matter to the attention of the House for several days. I give notice now that tomorrow, upon the convening of the House, I shall ask to correct the RECORD with reference to the remarks made by the gentleman a few days ago and I hope that he will be present at the time.

WAR-RISK INSURANCE ACT.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8778, amending and modifying the war-risk insurance act.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8778, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose last evening section 10 had been read and was still open for amendment.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota: Page 6, line 9, as a new paragraph insert the following:

That section 301 of the war-risk insurance act, as amended, shall be deemed to be in effect as of April 6, 1917: Provided, however, That before compensation thereon shall be paid there shall first be deducted from said sum so to be paid the amount of any payments such person may have received by way of gratuities or payments under pension laws in force and existence between April 6, 1917, and October 6, 1917.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, five years ago to-day the Germans were in full retreat on the Marne, and the redoubtable Joffre sent forth a message describing it as an "undoubted victory." Paris was saved. Civilization and republican institutions still hung in the balance, however, as the German army again assumed the offensive, retaining it until reinforced by American troops the Allies regained it at the second battle of the Marne in the summer of 1918.

Then followed a series of offensives in which we were to assume adequate part. The first was a drive on the St. Mihiel salient. A celebrated British officer had said that our new Army would be massacred if it attempted to take its impregnable position. For four years its defenses had remained unbroken. At midnight, one year ago to-day, this attack was launched with the most effective artillery bombardment in history—for in four hours 1,000,000 rounds had been fired. Then at break of day the American doughboy "jumped off," speedily driving the Hun out of the salient.

Then followed the Argonne, with like success, the capture of Sedan and the envelopment of Metz, the peace of victory, and, lastly, home.

Some did not reach the last objective. Thousands remained where they fell, under the lilies of France. Others, more fortunate, are back home, but disabled and incapacitated.

I know it is the sense of this House that as a matter of justice and humanity the disabled fighting man and the dependent loved ones of those called to a higher service should be adequately provided for.

The war-risk insurance act passed on October 6, 1917, was so designed and enacted; but as to disability compensation it was wholly insufficient.

Briefly, this act sought to provide the following:

First. A family allowance while in the service, to be paid jointly by soldier and Government.

Second. (a) Compensation to disabled soldier, to be paid by Government. (b) Compensation to dependent relatives of deceased soldiers, to be borne by the Government.

Third. Insurance against death or total permanent disability, to be paid for by the soldier at reduced rates.

I desire to call attention to the classes referred to in the second subdivision.

The total disability compensation provided for in section 302 of the act, as follows, should be raised, as proposed in the committee bill:

	Per month.
(a) If no wife nor child	$30
(b) Wife, but no child	45
(c) Wife and one child	55
(d) Wife and two children	65
(e) Loss of both hands, both feet, or both eyes	100

The above amounts are for total disability. I have in mind several cases in my district, the city of Minneapolis, where boys have lost a leg and have been otherwise injured. They have been rated as 80 per cent disabled and entitled to 80 per cent of $30, or $24. They are also insured and are being urged and desire to retain their insurance. They can not do it and live. Under the pension law in existence when the war-risk act was passed repealing it they would have been entitled to at least $55 or $60. If the law is not changed, they are worse off than if the war-risk act had never been passed. I hope, therefore, the committee amendments raising the schedule as follows will prevail:

	Per month.
(a) If no wife nor child	$80
(b) If a wife, but no child	90
(c) If a wife and one child	95
(d) If a wife and two children	100
(e) Loss of both hands, both feet, or both eyes	200

In this manner a grateful people can in some measure express its gratitude for those who suffered that the Nation might live.

The monthly compensation to dependents in section 301 of the war-risk act provides the following:

	Per month.
(a) Dependent widow	$20.00
(b) Dependent widow and child	35.00
(c) Dependent widow and two children, with $5 additional for each additional child up to two	47.50
(d) No widow, but one child	20.00
(e) No widow, but two children	30.00
(f) Dependent widowed mother	20.00

The act was passed on October 6, 1917. The pension laws then in force provided monthly pensions as follows:

(a) Dependent widows	$12
(b) Dependent children, each	2
(c) Dependent mother	12

Note the substantial difference in amounts in favor of the war-risk insurance act.

We went into the war just six months before this law was enacted, April 6, 1917. Our Army already numbered over 1,000,000 men. Some of the men composing this Army had already been disabled by injury or disease and from two to three thousand had died. In May of 1917 the American Navy had destroyer and battleship fleets in the North and Irish Seas. Many of our merchant vessels were furnished rifled cannon manned by American bluejackets. In the Navy alone upward of five or six hundred deaths had occurred in the first six months. These boys got into the game early. A majority were volunteers. They were in all respects the comrades of their more fortunate brothers in the cause who later fell at the second Marne, St. Mihiel, or the Argonne. They, too, left dependent loved ones.

Mr. Chairman, are they or their loved ones, because death or disability came during the first six months of the war, to be given less consideration? Is the dependent mother of one to receive $12 and the other $20? No. To ask it is to answer it. But as the law now stands such is and will be the case unless the committee bill is amended. I am advised by the Pension Department that there have been filed up to date 846 claims under the pension act involving death or disability claims arising after April 6 and before October 6, 1917. If this act is not amended as suggested their loved ones will be given about one-half the benefits to which they in justice are entitled. One hundred and nineteen of these have already been allowed. My amendment, if adopted, makes section 301 retroactive to April 6, 1917, and provides for the surrender of any moneys received under the then existing pension law before the provisions under the proposed amendment are available to such person. I shall also support a similar amendment as to disability compensation, making that retroactive. I therefore move the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I will.

Mr. SNELL. I am unable to tell just exactly what this does. I have read over the amendment and it does not seem to me it is clear, and I do not think it is to the other members of the committee.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I will try and explain it.

Mr. SNELL. Just what does it do for the soldier?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. If the gentleman will turn to page 20 of the original act, article 3, section 301:

That if death result from injury, if the deceased leaves a widow or child, or if he leaves a widowed mother dependent upon him for support, the monthly compensation shall be the following amounts.

Then appears widow alone, $25; widow and one child, $35, and so on. Now, this law was passed on the 6th day of October, 1917. It would apply to all disability and dependency cases occurring after October 6, 1917. My amendment would bring the act back, in so far as section 301 is concerned, to the 6th of April, 1917, and provides for the dependents of those who died in the service preceding the 6th of October, 1917, the date of the passage of this war-risk insurance act.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman's amendment provide for giving the soldiers anything?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. My amendment provides for the payment of this allowance of $25 per month to the widow, which is the same allowance that is now given to the widow of a soldier who died after October 6, 1917.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. REAVIS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. REAVIS. In answer to the gentleman from New York, the gentleman said he wanted to amend this act so that those who died previous to April 6—the gentleman did not mean that.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. No; previous to October 6.

Mr. REAVIS. The gentleman stated previous to April 6.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I misspoke then.

Mr. REAVIS. The gentleman means that he wants to provide the same compensation for those who died between April and October as for those who died after October?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Exactly. I think we should treat all men in the service uniformly, and that we should not give the widow of the man who died during the first six months of the war $12 and the widow of the man who died thereafter $25. There is no reason for the discrimination.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman speaks about giving compensation to the widow. Now, if there is no widow, and there are dependent parents, they would occupy the same position?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. It would apply in the same way. I might also say that I have taken this up with the members of the committee on both sides of the House, and they have been considering it. I hope they will not object; I think it is a very just amendment to the act. I might say that I have safeguarded it to the extent that if dependents have already received the $12 per month pension that any such payments shall be deducted before they can come under the terms of the proposed amendment.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman read that amendment again?

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan. [Reading:]

That section 301 of the war-risk insurance act as amended shall be deemed to be in effect as of April 6, 1917: Provided, however, That before compensation thereunder shall be paid there shall first be deducted from said sum so to be paid the amount of any payment such person may have received by way of gratuities or payments under pension laws in force and existence between April 6, 1917, and October 6, 1917.

Mr. PURNELL. I merely wanted to ask what became of the amendment which was offered yesterday embodying this same proposition?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I was on my feet at the time of the adjournment yesterday with this amendment—I think the gentleman has in mind the same amendment——

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment was not received; the committee rose without having received the amendment.

Mr. PURNELL. I did not know who offered the amendment. I thought we had adopted it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I ask that the gentleman may have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I observe the gentleman uses the term "said sum." I suggest that ought to be "any sum" in the amendment as a matter of phraseology.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Just one moment. I do not agree with the gentleman, because it pertains to the amount that is to be paid under this amendment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I wanted to inquire with reference to the use of the word "pension." The gentleman referred in the amendment to pension laws. Does he mean under this war-risk insurance——

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. No. I used the term "gratuity" and "pension" advisedly, because that is the term that is used in section 312 of the war-risk insurance act when it referred to the then existing pension law. That is the reason for using the term.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I did not just understand how these men could come to be under that pension law which did not apply to them.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The pension law was in force and effect up to the passage of this act, on the 6th of October, 1917, and under it the dependents of the deceased soldier would get $12 a month. A dependent widow would get $12 per month.

Now, when this law went into effect it repealed that pension law, in so far as future cases were concerned, and referred to that pension law with the words "gratuity" and "pension." That is the reason for the use of that term.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] There is a point of order pending.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I will not make the point of order. I will withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, the committee makes no objection to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON]. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have it read again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce deserves great credit for bringing in an excellent bill, amending in many important respects the so-called war-risk insurance act. It is a sensible and practical bill formed on broad and liberal lines. It provides far more comfortably than we have ever tried to do before for soldiers, sailors, and marines who have been disabled in the service. The man who went away sound and well only to return maimed, crippled, and thus heavily handicapped for life, should ever receive the highest consideration; likewise the dependents of those who went but did not return. These should be our first concern, just as they are first in the thoughts of every one the man who served in his country's uniform.

Toward those who have returned in the vigor of full health also we feel a deep and sincere gratitude that should never fail. They went forth to fight our battles and theirs. They have returned to join us in the unceasing battles of peace by which we hope to maintain this as the best country in all the world to live in. Let us not forget that these men have returned to their own country. It was theirs before they went away. It is theirs in a more sacred sense now. What they did can not be paid for in terms of dollars. There can be no cash equivalent for a patriotic duty faithfully performed. There is not enough in the Treasury if we took it all to pay such a debt. They now ask that their disabled comrades be placed back as nearly as possible where they were, so far as earning a living is concerned, or if that be impossible then a reasonable compensation. The bill under consideration aims to do this. They ask that the dependents of those who fell be cared for and this bill seeks to do it.

As we consider these matters touching very closely the interests of those who served in the Great War, it is appropriate to recount very briefly something of what they did and the circumstances under which they did it. It is peculiarly appropriate and fitting to speak of these things on this the first anniversary of the very brilliant affair at St. Mihiel, which began on September 12, 1918, and was the first strictly American battle of the war planned and executed by our own officers and men.

It was just five years ago that the great German flood of invasion was stemmed at the southern bank of the Marne and turned back to the Aisne and the Somme. For three years, with varying degrees of success, the German was held in northern France and Belgium, but was permitted to crush Russia and most of the Balkan States.

In 1917 it was apparent that with the resistance on the eastern front entirely removed the time had come for the Germans to win the war, and that this event probably could not be postponed beyond 1918.

Meanwhile we had come into the war in April, 1917, but our tragic state of military unpreparedness was such that it was a whole year before we were able to strike a single blow. This year of impotence after we had declared war is one of the darkest periods of our national history. May we never forget it and may we never permit our country to come into that sad condition again.

With the United States in the war it was clear to all who studied the military situation that 1918 was Germany's only remaining chance to win the war, and it was an excellent chance, unfortunately. In the early spring of 1918 only a few American divisions were in France, and they were in a large measure armed and supplied by the French and English. In this situation the great drive into Picardy was begun in March, and the other great offensive operations of the Germans followed. It was not thought by our enemies to be possible for the United States to mobilize, train, arm, equip, and transport across the ocean a sufficient force to seriously affect the military situation. Never did an enemy so deceive himself or so misjudge the capacity of a foe. [Applause.]

As I had so often proclaimed from my place on this floor, arms, ammunition, and equipment can not be improvised overnight, nor in a year for that matter. Then there were the usual number of mistakes and blunders, and many additional ones, in an effort to supply the necessary materials of war. Even the United States could not do the impossible, and so our country failed in many ways to place upon the fighting front such airplanes, machine guns, artillery, and other matériel as are necessary for the proper use and protection of men in battle.

What we lacked in guns and airplanes, however, our men made up in courage and devotion to duty. The record of the American soldier in France is one of which we are justly proud. As I have said, he was not adequately equipped with the modern engines of war. His training had necessarily been brief. He was opposed by a veteran army of the best-trained soldiers in the world, and yet on every field he distinguished himself, not only for aggressiveness and courage in battle, but for resourcefulness as a fighter and the capacity for maintaining a point once gained in the face of cruel punishment from the enemy. [Applause.]

These are the qualities of the men who represented us in the great struggle, and they are the qualities which forced complete victory in 1918 instead of prolonging the awful struggle until this year, as was expected would be the case.

Three months ago I had the privilege of walking over the ground where our men fought in France. I observed with deep interest the places where our own American boys had borne the brunt of the battle.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for three minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for three minutes longer. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TILSON. Quite naturally I made special inquiry concerning the positions, advances, and attacks of units containing Connecticut boys, and the result of my inquiries were all of the most gratifying character. Everywhere they had acquitted themselves like men. I went along the line from Chateau Thierry to Belleau Wood, through Vaux, Bouresches, and Torcy, where the Twenty-sixth, or Yankee, Division began its advance in the second great Battle of the Marne. I traveled the same road that this division advanced over when the St. Mihiel salient was wiped out. This advance was a brilliant feat and occurred just a year ago to-day. I went through the Argonne Forest and across the Aire Valley to the Meuse, following the bloody footsteps of our American boys. It made my heart swell with grateful pride to think of them as "our boys."

Happily their work is now finished. They have come back to us bearing their honors modestly, each conscious of a sacred duty faithfully done. If I correctly judge them, they have come home—those who went overseas and those who were still in training here—to live for their country as they were willing to die for it. They know better than ever before how precious it is.

The war has left us many difficult and perplexing problems. After such a world-wide cataclysm it requires time to even approximate again the normal. The unbelievable expense of the war has left a heritage of debt that will require years of burdensome taxation. This burden has been piled upon the already heavy load of living expenses. Everyone feels the burden and no one is exempt from its effects. As a result the country is restless and uneasy. There is no panacea that will cure our troubles immediately, so they must be borne with patriotic patience, while every possible effort is being made to supply the remedy.

Fortunately our returning soldiers have already shown their patriotism. We know that we can rely upon them to support and defend the institutions of their country, insist upon a square deal, and a fair chance for all; that they will resist every attempt to destroy free government and real liberty in this country and that they will join in preserving America as the land of freedom and opportunity.

I have referred to some of the great problems facing the Nation upon the return of our conquering heroes, but I refer to them in the full hope that with the same indomitable spirit with which they faced the foe in battle they will also face these problems and that they more than any other equal number of men will help to solve them. [Applause.]

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate close on section 10.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves that all debate on section 10 be now closed.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FESS. Would that close debate on a new section that would be offered?

Mr. SWEET. It would if it was an amendment to that section.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the inquiry of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. FESS. The gentleman from New York desires to offer an amendment inserting a new section following section 10. Would the gentleman's motion forbid debate on that?

The CHAIRMAN. If a new section were offered, following section 10, it would be in the nature of an amendment to the bill rather than to the section, and it would be in order, but not debatable.

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. I am sure the Chair will remember when this very question was discussed while the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] was in the chair, and he held that any amendment in the way of an additional section was part of the preceding section, and the debate would be closed under such a request as that made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET]. I am sure the Chair will remember that. The matter was thrashed out at some length. I think that constitutes a precedent.

The CHAIRMAN. If the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Ohio as a new section followed section 10 it would not be precluded.

Mr. BLANTON. I merely call to the attention of the Chair the fact that that is in direct conflict with the previous ruling of a previous Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question was whether or not the amendment would be in order?

Mr. BLANTON. No; whether or not debate would be closed.

The CHAIRMAN. Whether or not debate would be in order on the amendment?

Mr. FESS. Whether or not debate would be in order on the amendment if the motion of the gentleman from Iowa to close debate now should be passed.

Mr. BLANTON. It was held by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] that it would preclude debate, even if it were put in as a new section.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Unless the Chair should hold that the debate would be closed as to a particular section, it would certainly open up the way for all debate that can be desired by any gentleman by merely proposing to make a new section of his amendment by way of something in the nature of a proviso. It would be very difficult to close debate unless the Chair should hold that debate should be closed on the new proposed section at that point.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the motion of the gentleman from Iowa to be to close debate on section 10.

Mr. BLANTON. The ruling made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] was that where a motion to close debate on a section has carried, any subsequent amendment following that section, even though offered as a new section, is deemed merely an amendment to the section involved by the motion, and that no debate is allowable thereon.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state his understanding of the motion of the gentleman from Iowa to close debate on section 10. The motion did not include "and all amendments thereto," as the Chair understood.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, there are no amendments pending.

Mr. FESS. There will be one if it is not precluded.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, if I may be heard a moment——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. SWEET. If there is any question on it, I will amend the motion by moving that the debate close on the section and all amendments thereto.

Mr. TREADWAY. Is there any distinction, Mr. Chairman, between whether or not the debate shall be closed and the opportunity to offer amendments? The motion of the gentleman from Iowa would not preclude the offering of a still further amendment, but it would preclude the possibility of debate thereon.

The CHAIRMAN. When the Chair was interrupted by the parliamentary inquiry of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], he was just about to say that amendments could be offered.

Mr. TREADWAY. But no debate thereon.

The CHAIRMAN. But no debate thereon, if the motion of the gentleman from Iowa should prevail.

Mr. TREADWAY. I think the ruling referred to by the gentleman from Texas is binding in the situation in which we find ourselves, because the Chair will readily see that otherwise it would be possible to offer amendments, even though they be designated as new sections, and there would be no limit as to the point at which amendments could be offered to any section simply by renumbering or relettering them. Therefore it seems to me the point is well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. In answer to the parliamentary inquiry of the gentleman from Ohio, if it would preclude the offering of a new section, the Chair holds that it would not, but the amendment would not be subject to debate if the motion of the gentleman from Iowa should prevail.

Mr. FESS. I move, Mr. Chairman, to amend the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] that debate close in five minutes, giving the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] a chance to present his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. SWEET. I move as a substitute that debate close in 10 minutes.

Mr. FESS. I accept that.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Pending that, Mr. Chairman, I wish to inquire, Was it the ruling of the Chair that even though the debate be closed by a motion it would be in order to amend by a new section at any time?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; but such amendment as might be offered would not be subject to debate.

Mr. RAYBURN. If the ruling is to stand, it seems to me we would be in a position where we might never reach another section of the bill for the simple reason that a man having an amendment could number it as a new section and have it debated.

The CHAIRMAN. But the new section offered by way of amendment would not be subject to debate if the motion of the gentleman from Iowa should prevail.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. We are in that situation all the time, where, after debate is closed on any section, amendments can be offered indefinitely, and, following out the gentleman's theory, we would never advance to another section if there were enough amendments and Members kept offering them to the end of time. We are in no worse situation if we agreed that a new section could be introduced than we are now, when new amendments can be offered, even though debate is closed on that section. So under the Chair's ruling on that I do not think we are in worse condition than we were before.

Mr. RAYBURN. I wanted to get the Chair's ruling clear in my mind.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET], that debate close in 10 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. REED of New York: Page 6, after line 11, insert a new section as "Sec. 10a. That section 300 of the war-risk insurance act is hereby amended to read as follows: 'That for death or disability resulting from personal injury suffered or disease contracted in the line of duty by any commissioned officer or enlisted man or by any member of the Army Nurse Corps (female) or of the Navy Nurse Corps (female) when employed in the active service under the War Department or Navy Department, the United States shall pay compensation as hereinafter provided, but no compensation shall be paid if the injury or disease has been caused by his own willful misconduct involving moral turpitude.'"

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the proposed amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa reserves a point of order on the amendment. The Chair would call the attention of the gentleman from New York to the fact that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] was numbered section 10a, as the Chair recalls, while the gentleman from New York offers his as section 10a also.

Mr. REED of New York. I offer it as section 10b.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be so modified.

There was no objection.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I believe the amendment is to be inserted at line 11. An examination will show that line 11 is a part of section 11.

Mr. REED of New York. I ask unanimous consent to change it to come in after line 9.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be so modified.

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. As long as corrections are being made to conform to previous amendments, why not say that this amendment shall follow the two amendments already adopted? The gentleman from Washington [Mr. WEBSTER] inserted an amendment and I had an amendment inserted at the same point yesterday. The gentleman desires to have his follow.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, the amendments were adopted which took care of the young man who was injured while going from the draft board to the point of mobilization. That is, if he violated some rule that involved moral turpitude, he is not protected under those amendments.

You may recall that I referred to the case yesterday of a young man who was flying in France and who flew beyond the zone prescribed by the military authorities. He fell and had his spine injured by a violent twist, resulting in total disability. Under the law as it stands this boy could receive no compensation. It was the average boy's initiative, it was the same spirit that led him over the top, it was the same spirit that led him to fight the 47 days in the Argonne Forest, it was the same spirit that you saw in the young man of Kansas, whom you may recall, by the name of Orth, and who had been in the Johns Hopkins Hospital for weeks. He was out on post duty and while there his pal was buried by the explosion of a shell. This boy Orth was ordered back but refused to go back and began to dig out his chum under fire with his own helmet. After a time he was taken back, and I suppose there was a "willful misconduct" under the law as it now stands.

What I am trying to do is to see that every American boy gets justice. Another example is a boy who enlisted in the Navy. He served for months, and while on shore leave was invited to take a glass of wine. That glass of wine undoubtedly contained menthol alcohol, and he was made totally blind; totally blind as the result of willful misconduct under the law. He served long, faithfully, and well.

By an examination of section 300, simply adding the words "involving moral turpitude" will take care of these cases. The law as amended yesterday does not take care of these men. If this amendment is made, it is going to clear up a number of cases where they are suffering injustice. I trust that the gentleman will not insist on his point of order. We want to give every American boy a square deal and not deprive him or his dependents of these benefits. I submit that it is only fair that this amendment should be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, there is very much that appeals to our sympathies in cases of this kind, but I remember that orders were issued by the Navy Department that in case of a submarine attack other vessels in the convoy should not stop to give aid to the vessel that was torpedoed. That was the rule of the English Navy and possibly in other navies. It was founded on justice and upon a due consideration for the safety of life. It may have been a sympathetic thing, possibly a heroic thing, you may say, for a vessel that was in the same convoy to stop and give assistance, but the Army regulations, rules, and laws are of no avail unless they are rigidly enforced.

The young man to whom the gentleman from New York has referred did a heroic thing, although it was disobedience of orders. Personally—I do not speak for the committee—I feel that the point of order should be insisted upon.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin make the point of order?

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York concede the point of order?

Mr. REED of New York. No; I think I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to hear from the gentlemen from Iowa and Wisconsin.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, section 300 is not mentioned in this bill at all, and it seems to me, taking the whole matter into consideration, that it is not germane to the bill we are considering.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. In what way is it not germane? This bill deals with conditions under which we are granting insurance to the soldiers, sailors, and marines of the late war.

Mr. SWEET. Only on the proposition that section 300 is not mentioned in the bill.

Mr. SNELL. This states the conditions under which you are considering the bill.

Mr. SWEET. The title says "to amend and modify the war-risk insurance act," and then it specifies the various conditions under which the soldiers, sailors, and marines shall receive insurance.

Mr. REED of New York rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not care to hear more on the gentleman's side until he hears some reason why the amendment should go out.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. It is well established by precedents that where it is proposed in a bill to amend an act in a number of its sections, an amendment to amend another section of the act is in order. A number of cases have occurred in the consideration of this bill where amendments have been offered which were not germane to any section included in the present bill but were clearly germane to sections in the original law. It seems clear to the Chair that this amendment is germane to a section of the original law, which under the precedents may be repealed or amended in this bill. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment of Mr. REED of New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. ESCH rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the amendment, it amends only a part of section 300. Is it proposed to amend the proviso?

Mr. REED of New York. No.

Mr. ESCH. The gentleman evidently has taken the original section 300. That was amended more recently by the act of June 25, 1918, and includes the following provisos:

Provided, That for the purposes of this section said officer, enlisted man, or other member shall be held and taken to have been in sound condition when examined, accepted, and enrolled for service: Provided further, That this section as amended shall be deemed to become effective as of October 6, 1917.

As far as I am concerned personally—and I do not speak for the committee—I would have no objection to the amendment, provided the gentleman incorporated the two provisos which I have just read. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment of the gentleman from New York may be modified by adding the two provisos which I have just read, and which are incorporated in section 300 of the act of June 25, 1918.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the modification of the amendment of the gentleman from New York as indicated by the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, might I suggest the action of the House making section 301 retroactive to the date of the declaration of war, and that the same date be used in the proviso, rather than October 6—in other words, April 6, 1917?

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I would rather reserve that for a little consideration, and the gentleman could bring it up later.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, let us have the amendment read as modified.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that it seems well-nigh impossible for the Clerk to state the amendment as it would stand without considerable work in bringing it together.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I think if the Clerk will read the addition which appears at the end of section 300, the House would understand it after the explanation of the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED], without reading the whole thing.

Mr. JUUL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. JUUL. For the purpose of making a motion, if in order, that the Clerk be authorized to alter the amendment in conformity to the statement made by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The CHAIRMAN. That could only be done by unanimous consent. It seems to the Chair it might be better to pass it over for a short time and recur to it rather than to take chances at doing anything so loosely.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be reduced to writing.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks that the amendment be reduced to writing.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Where a gentleman offers an amendment not in writing and it is required to be placed in writing, has the Member the right to be given time to place that in writing?

The CHAIRMAN. Undoubtedly the committee would give the Member reasonable time within which to do so.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] section 300 of the act approved June 25, 1918, with the addition of the words "involving moral turpitude" at the end of the word "misconduct" appearing just before the first proviso, and I send the act to the Clerk's desk so modified to be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment by way of substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by way of substitute by Mr. ESCH:

"SEC. 300. That for death or disability resulting from personal injury suffered or disease contracted in the line of duty by any commissioned officer or enlisted man or by any member of the Army Nurse Corps (female) or of the Navy Nurse Corps (female) when employed in the active service under the War Department or Navy Department the United States shall pay compensation as hereinafter provided, but no compensation shall be paid if the injury or disease has been caused by his own willful misconduct involving moral turpitude: Provided, That for the purposes of this section said officer, enlisted man, or other member shall be held and taken to have been in sound condition when examined, accepted, and enrolled for service: Provided further, That this section as amended shall be deemed to become effective as of October 6, 1917."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, this is to follow the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WEBSTER], the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], as amended by the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the record is quite accurate. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin as read by the Clerk commenced as follows:

SEC. 300. That for death or disability—

And so forth.

As a matter of fact, it is a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED], which includes the preliminary language which I do not just recall.

Therefore with the consent of the gentleman from Wisconsin I would like to ask unanimous consent that the proposed substitute be amended by inserting prior to the language read by the Clerk the following:

Section 300 of the war-risk insurance act is hereby amended to read as follows:

And that that be numbered section 10b.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin be modified as stated by him. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. JUUL. For the purpose of requesting unanimous consent that the section as amended may be again reported.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I object. It has been read three or four times, and all that it adds to the section now is the language "involving moral turpitude." That is all the amendment is, and we have been half an hour on this.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made. The question is on the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. TEMPLE. I call attention to the fact that the substitute as offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin has not been reported at any time by the Clerk.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the fact that the gentleman is mistaken. The gentleman from Wisconsin carried it over and handed it to the Clerk, and he has just read it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The committee was dividing when this interruption took place, and the affirmative vote has been taken. I call for the regular order.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Wait a minute——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama makes the point of order.

Mr. TEMPLE. And I wish to reply to the point of order. The facts are that the gentleman from Indiana asked unanimous consent to modify the resolution offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin and that modification has never been reported from the desk.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It does not make any difference what the situation is, I think the point of order is well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must overrule the point of order made by the gentleman from Alabama upon the state of facts known to the Chair to exist, that the affirmative vote had just been ordered and not completed. The negative vote had not been taken at all. Under these conditions the gentleman rose and was recognized, and the Chair believes was properly recognized. The point of order made by the gentleman from Alabama is therefore overruled.

Mr. JUUL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL] rise?

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of stating I fail to understand why Members——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been exhausted.

Mr. JUUL. I am not going to debate——

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. JUUL. I ask unanimous consent for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not proceed. Debate is out of order——

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, but the gentleman asks unanimous consent——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. REAVIS. I rise for the purpose of making a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. REAVIS. The gentleman from Illinois just asked unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not hear it.

Mr. REAVIS. That was the request that he just made.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed, the Chair will submit that request.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I have asked unanimous consent, and I hope that the time will be granted, to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has asked unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, here is an important amendment in which we are all interested. Four times this amendment has been changed, and I maintain that it is only just and proper that the membership of this House should be permitted to learn what it is upon which we are asked to vote. I ask that the amendment as finally amended and agreed on by the various gentlemen who have spoken upon this floor be reported, so that we will know what we are finally voting on. The gentleman on the other side objects to our finding out what it is. Probably he knows all about it, but there are a number of men who probably do not know.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I shall object again if the gentleman makes that very generous statement.

Mr. JUUL. I do not know why the gentleman objects to the membership finding out what is going on on this floor.

Mr. RAYBURN. I will object to anything when I am lectured by any Member of this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ascertained from the Clerk that the amendment has not been read by him in its entirety. The substitute amendment was read, but the introduction clause was not read, and therefore the amendment has not been read in its entirety and the Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. JUUL. That is satisfactory.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ESCH as a substitute to the amendment offered by Mr. REED of New York, to appear on page 6, line 9. After the amendment of Mr. TREADWAY, Mr. WEBSTER, and Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota add a new section, known as section 10b.

"SEC. 300. That for death or disability resulting from personal injury suffered or disease contracted in the line of duty, by any commissioned officer or enlisted man, or by any member of the Army Nurse Corps (female) or of the Navy Nurse Corps (female) when employed in the active service under the War Department or Navy Department, the United States shall pay compensation as hereinafter provided, but no compensation shall be paid if the injury or disease has been caused by his own willful misconduct involving moral turpitude: Provided, That for the purposes of this section said officer, enlisted man, or other member shall be held and taken to have been in sound condition when examined, accepted, and enrolled for service: Provided further, That this section, as amended, shall be deemed to become effective as of October 6, 1917."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the substitute amendment.

The question was taken, and the substitute amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The question was taken, and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HAWLEY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following concurrent resolution:

House concurrent resolution 31.

Resolved, etc., That a joint session of the Senate and House of Representatives be held in the Hall of the House of Representatives at 2 o'clock on the afternoon of Thursday, September 18, 1919, in welcome of John J. Pershing, General of the Armies of the United States and Commander in Chief of the American Expeditionary Forces of the World War. That the program and procedure at such joint session shall be in accordance with the report of the joint committee of the Senate and House appointed under House concurrent resolution 29. That the said committee is hereby authorized to make all necessary arrangements for such joint session, and that all expenses incurred by the committee in the execution of the provisions of this resolution shall be paid, one-half from the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 95. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the city of Atlanta, Ga., tents, cots, horses, and saddle equipments for use of United Confederate Veterans in their convention from October 7 to 10, 1919.

WAR-RISK INSURANCE.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That section 302 of the war-risk insurance act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 302. That if disability results from the injury—

"(1) If and while the disability is rated as total and temporary, the monthly compensation shall be the following amounts:

"(a) If the disabled person has neither wife nor child living, $80.

"(b) If he has a wife but no child living, $90.

"(c) If he has a wife and one child living, $95.

"(d) If he has a wife and two or more children living, $100.
"(e) If he has no wife but one child living, $90, with $5 for each additional child up to two.
"(f) If he has a mother or father, either or both dependent on him for support, then, in addition to the above amounts, $10 for each parent so dependent."

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. When can we offer amendments to this section?

The CHAIRMAN. After the completion of the reading of the section.

Mr. EMERSON. How far does it go?

The CHAIRMAN. It ends with line 18, on page 10.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DOWELL. Would it not be possible, by unanimous consent, to consider this section by paragraphs, as it is a very long section?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the only way it would be possible.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that amendments should be made to the paragraphs as they are read, I ask unanimous consent that we consider this section by paragraphs, and that amendments be submitted as each paragraph is read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that this section be considered by paragraphs. Is there objection?

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I feel that I must object to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa objects. The Clerk will proceed with the reading.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the section, as follows:

"(2) If and while the disability is rated as partial and temporary, the monthly compensation shall be a percentage of the compensation that would be payable for his total and temporary disability, equal to the degree of the reduction in earning capacity resulting from the disability, but no compensation shall be payable for a reduction in earning capacity rated at less than 10 per cent.
"(3) If and while the disability is rated as total and permanent, the rate of compensation shall be $100 per month: Provided, however, That the loss of both feet, or both hands, or the sight of both eyes, or the loss of one foot and one hand, or one foot and the sight of one eye, or one hand and the sight of one eye, or becoming helpless and permanently bedridden, shall be deemed to be total, permanent disability: Provided further, That for double total permanent disability the rate of compensation shall be $200 per month.
"(4) If and while the disability is rated as partial and permanent, the monthly compensation shall be a percentage of the compensation that would be payable for his total and permanent disability equal to the degree of the reduction in earning capacity resulting from the disability, but no compensation shall be payable for a reduction in earning capacity rated at less than 10 per cent.
"A schedule of ratings of reductions in earning capacity from specific injuries or combinations of injuries of a permanent nature shall be adopted and applied by the bureau. Ratings may be as high as 100 per cent. The ratings shall be based, as far as practicable, upon the average impairments of earning capacity resulting from such injuries in civil occupations and not upon the impairment in earning capacity in each individual case, so that there shall be no reduction in the rate of compensation for individual success in overcoming the handicap of a permanent injury. The bureau shall from time to time readjust this schedule of ratings in accordance with actual experience.
"(5) If the disabled person is so helpless as to be in constant need of a nurse or attendant, such additional sum shall be paid, but not exceeding $20 per month, as the director may deem reasonable.
"(6) In addition to the compensation above provided, the injured person shall be furnished by the United States such reasonable governmental medical, surgical, and hospital services and with such supplies, including wheeled chairs, artificial limbs, trusses, and similar appliances as the director may determine to be useful and reasonably necessary, which wheeled chairs, artificial limbs, trusses, and similar appliances may be procured by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance in such manner, either by purchase or manufacture, as the director may determine to be advantageous and reasonably necessary: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to affect the necessary military control over any member of the Military or Naval Establishments before he shall have been discharged from the military or naval service.
"(7) Where the disabled person and his wife are not living together, or where the children are not in the custody of the disabled person, the amount of the compensation shall be apportioned as may be prescribed by regulations.
"(8) The term 'wife' as used in this section shall include 'husband' if the husband is dependent upon the wife for support.
"(9) That the Bureau of War Risk Insurance is hereby authorized to furnish the medical, surgical, and hospital services and the supplies and appliances provided by subdivision (6) hereof to discharged members of the military or naval forces of those Governments which have been associated in war with the United States since April 6, 1917, and come within the provisions of laws of such Governments similar to the war-risk insurance act, at such rates and under such regulations as the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance may prescribe; and the Bureau of War Risk Insurance is hereby authorized to utilize the similar services, supplies, and appliances provided for the discharged members of the military and naval forces of those Governments which have been associated in war with the United States since April 6, 1917, by the laws of such Governments similar to the war-risk insurance act, in furnishing the discharged members of the military and naval forces of the United States who live within the territorial limits of such Governments and come within the provisions of subdivision (6) hereof, with the services, supplies, and appliances provided for in such subdivision; and any appropriations that have been or may hereafter be made for the purpose of furnishing the services, supplies, and appliances provided for by subdivision (6) hereof are hereby made available for the payment to such Governments or their agencies for the services, supplies, and appliances so furnished at such rates and under such regulations as the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance may prescribe.
"(10) That section 302 of this act as amended shall be deemed to be in effect as of October 6, 1917."

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROGERS: Page 10, line 16, after the word "prescribe," insert the following as a new paragraph:
"Any member of the military forces of a nation associated with the United States in the war with Germany who, at the request of the United States Government, was detailed by his Government to instruct any unit or units of the United States Army in training within the United States, and who between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, while in the line of such duty and, without fault on his part, was injured, shall be deemed entitled to the benefits of the compensation provisions of the war-risk act and amendments thereto: Provided, however, That the acceptance of the provisions of this paragraph shall operate to extinguish all claims for damages as a result of such injuries."

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order is reserved by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. ROGERS. I am content to have the question of the soundness of the point of order determined at this time. I think the amendment is not subject to a point of order. If the Chair has any doubt about it, I should like to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas desire to debate his point of order?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; I do. We are passing an act here which compensates members of the naval and military forces of the United States, and not members of the naval and military forces of any other country. Therefore I do not see how soldiers enlisted under another flag would be eligible under a law to compensate or pension the soldiers of our own country, or how an amendment to do so would be germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I should like to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that this very section does specifically provide for men who were in the military service of our cobelligerents during the war. Subsection 9, which begins on line 13, page 9, provides—

(9) That the Bureau of War Risk Insurance is hereby authorized to furnish the medical, surgical, and hospital services, and the supplies and appliances provided by subdivision (6) hereof, to discharged members of the military or naval forces of those Governments which have been associated in the war with the United States since April 6, 1917,—

And so forth.

That subsection (9), already in the bill, proposes one way by which the United States Government shall minister to members of the associated armies who have some particular claim upon the United States Government. The amendment which I have just offered simply provides another way by which a certain group of men who have been in special relation to the United States Government shall be cared for. Therefore I submit that the amendment is clearly in order.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. I will admit that if a point of order is made against subsection (9), it is clearly subject to a point of order.

Mr. ROGERS. The point of order was not made.

Mr. RAYBURN. But it does not go to the compensation. It only goes to the question of rehabilitation.

Mr. ROGERS. I think the gentleman will agree that it does not make very much difference what the nature of the relief is in determining the validity of the point of order. The question is whether or not there is relief provided; and as the committee itself has inserted this provision in the bill, and as no point of order has been made against it, I submit that the amendment which I have proposed is clearly in order.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. BEE. As I understand the gentleman's amendment, it provides compensation for members of the associated armies who were on duty with the United States forces during the war, and were injured without fault on their part.

Mr. ROGERS. And in the United States.

Mr. BEE. And in the United States. Now, does the gentleman know whether those men would be cared for under the compensation laws of their own countries? If so, would not that give them double compensation?

Mr. ROGERS. I think that does not have any bearing upon the point of order. If the point of order is overruled, I shall be very glad to discuss that particular point.

Mr. BEE. That is true, but I ask the question for information.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. How much additional relief would the gentleman's proposed amendment give to the foreign soldier?

Mr. ROGERS. That question again bears upon the merits of the amendment rather than upon the point of order.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I want to know for the benefit of this point of order, because the gentleman's amendment is rather long, and I have not a copy of it.

Mr. ROGERS. I shall be glad to furnish the gentleman with a copy of the amendment. I want to be entirely frank with the House, and to say that as far as I know there is just one man who would be affected by this amendment.

The United States Government in 1917 requested the British and French Governments to send men to the United States to instruct our troops. One of them, Lieut. Frank Barber, lieutenant in the British Army, who had fought for three years in the trenches, was sent over because of his fine record in the war. He was training our troops and was stationed at Macon, Ga. A machine gun exploded. As the court of inquiry found, without fault on his part, the man was totally blinded. Relief has been recommended by the Secretary of War, by the Surgeon General, and by the Judge Advocate General. A relief bill has already been passed by the Senate five times; it has been recommended unanimously by the House Committee on Military Affairs three times; but it has come up in the House as a special bill under a status which required unanimous consent, which I have not been able to obtain. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I am submitting it in the form of an amendment to this bill.

Now, members of the committee will naturally ask whether the pending amendment does not apply to other British officers or French officers who assisted our troops in training in the United States during 1917. I can not inform them with positiveness on that point, but the British Embassy tells me that this case is the only one of which it has any record. The French Embassy tells me that it has no knowledge of any similar case which has occurred to a French officer or soldier during the war. So I think—and, as I say, I want to be frank with the House—that the case of Frank Barber, the blind officer, is the only case which will be covered by this amendment. And I hope that the Chairman will overrule the point of order and that the committee will adopt the amendment.

I want to call the attention of the Chairman in connection with the point of order, however, to a circumstance to which he has already alluded, and which I do not need to emphasize, and that is that this bill is extremely general in its terms. It provides a great many amendments to a great many sections of the war-risk insurance act. It proposes a great many altogether new provisions of law which have not previously been dealt with in any way under our war-risk insurance legislation. The bill deals with insurance, with compensation, with allotments, and allowances, and with the personnel of the War Risk Bureau. It is as broad an omnibus and amendatory act as can easily be conceived. I submit that under the precedents of the House there can be no doubt as to the propriety and germaneness of the amendment which is at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, an examination of paragraph 9 of this section will disclose that the soldiers of foreign Governments are only mentioned in connection with a reciprocal arrangement which the bureau is authorized to enter into with the other Governments. Also, the training of medical, surgical, and hospital officers, and supplies to such soldiers. It reaches the case where the soldier is stationed here and needs temporary relief. Subsection (9) provides:

That the Bureau of War Risk Insurance is hereby authorized to furnish the medical, surgical, and hospital services and the supplies and appliances provided by subdivision (6) hereof, to discharged members of the military or naval forces of those Governments which have been associated in war with the United States since April 6, 1917, and come within the provisions of laws of such Governments similar to the war-risk insurance act, at such rates and under such regulations as the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance may prescribe; and the Bureau of War Risk Insurance is hereby authorized to utilize the similar services, supplies, and appliances provided for the discharged members of the military and naval forces of those Governments which have been associated in war with the United States since April 6, 1917, by the laws of such Governments similar to the war-risk insurance act, in furnishing the discharged members of the military and naval forces of the United States who live within the territorial limits of such Governments and come within the provisions of subdivision (6) hereof, with the services, supplies, and appliances provided for in such subdivision; and any appropriations that have been or may hereafter be made for the purpose of furnishing the services, supplies, and appliances provided for by subdivision (6) hereof are hereby made available for the payment to such Governments or their agencies for the services, supplies, and appliances so furnished at such rates and under such regulations as the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance may prescribe.

Now, that deals altogether with a reciprocal arrangement, and no doubt the reason which induced such legislation was the benefit that might accrue to the American soldiers similarly situated. It has nothing to do, if the chairman please, with the question of compensation. The compensation, so far as the war-risk insurance act is concerned, takes the place of the pension system. There is not a single line in the entire act, and not only this act, which is amendatory of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance act, but there is not a single line in the entire act that deals with the question of affording compensation to soldiers of foreign governments; and, of course, it was a very wise provision, because the foreign governments are able to take care of their own soldiers, and will want to do so. Now, it is proposed by this amendment to give to the soldier of a foreign government the right to our compensation laws. Of course, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] says he has just one case, but if you are going to open up the door and pension all soldiers of foreign governments, if we get the league of nations, we will be pensioning all the soldiers of all the governments.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on this point of order. I believe the amendment is purely subject to a point of order under clause 7 of Rule XVI, which reads:

And no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.

Now, what we have under consideration in this bill is the question of allotments, insurance, and so forth, to soldiers, sailors, and marines, American citizens, of our Army in the late war. And it has always been ruled by Chairmen that an amendment that changed the scope, intent, and purpose of the original act was not in order. I maintain that when you are considering pensions that are applicable purely and simply to the American soldier, it is not in order to bring in an amendment that applies to a foreign soldier. Therefore, the amendment is purely out of order at this time, on the ground that it changes scope and intent of the original act.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, may I make one final suggestion?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. ROGERS. I desire to refer to the argument of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] that subsection 9, upon which I have relied as indicating beyond peradventure that my amendment was in order, was reciprocal in its terms and that therefore my amendment, which was not a reciprocal amendment, was not made in order by the provisions of subsection 9. Of course, in fact, subsection 9 is not a reciprocal provision at all. It authorizes, on the one hand, the Bureau of War Risk Insurance to extend this relief to discharged members of the military and naval forces of our cobelligerents and, on the other hand, as an entirely independent and unrelated proposition, it authorizes the Bureau of War Risk Insurance to utilize similar services provided by other Governments.

In other words, there is no correlation between the two sides of the transaction. It is not a bargain. It is simply an authorization to the bureau to do certain things for the other soldiers and a similar authorization, if the occasion arises, for the bureau to accept from other Governments along similar lines. But there is no trade about it. So that, it seems to me, in determining the point of order, the Chair should look only to the authorization extended under subsection 9 to assist the soldiers of other powers and should regard that as an analogy for the amendment which I have offered and which the Chair is considering.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes, indeed.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman think it would naturally follow in the discussion of a bill granting pensions to American soldiers and sailors that we should grant pensions to foreign soldiers?

Mr. ROGERS. It would depend upon the construction of the bill.

Mr. SNELL. Exactly. Here we are talking about granting pensions and allowances to American soldiers. Can you see anything in that where there would be a natural sequence to grant pensions to soldiers of a foreign country?

Mr. ROGERS. I very much question if a simple pension act for our own soldiers and sailors would authorize an amendment for the pensioning of soldiers and sailors of other armies.

One other suggestion: While I do not know that this has any bearing on the point of order, I do know it has a bearing on the merits of the question.

Mr. SNELL. This is not a question of the merits but of the rules of the House.

Mr. ROGERS. Just a moment. I have the floor. The Secretary of War has said, in recommending this very action to Congress, that this man was practically a part of the military force of the United States at the time he was rendering this service. He was within the United States, and he was with our Army, and he was subject to the discipline of our Army. In other words, while he technically was not under the allegiance of the United States yet for all practical purposes he was under the allegiance of the United States. So far, indeed, Barber has been unable to get any relief from his own Government, and it seems likely that if any relief whatever for his blindness is afforded it must come from our Government.

As I say, that suggestion may not have any relation to the point of order. On the other hand, the gentleman's inquiry has no bearing upon it, because the committee has chosen, in its wisdom, to go outside of the purely American forces and has made specific provision for the cobelligerent forces.

Mr. SNELL. Has it gone outside of the lines and main purposes of this bill?

Mr. ROGERS. You can not say what are the main objects and purposes of the bill. There are all kinds of objects here. It does not make any difference, in determining the point of order, what the amount of the obligation is.

Mr. SNELL. I may say that the intent and purpose of the bill confines it to American soldiers and sailors.

Mr. ROGERS. There are about 30 different objects on the bill.

Mr. SNELL. They are all confined to American soldiers and sailors.

Mr. ROGERS. Oh, no.

Mr. SNELL. So far as insurance and allotments are concerned.

Mr. ROGERS. That makes no difference.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The case presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] is a case calling possibly for legislation in this body. It is surely a case that appeals to the emotions of every person. It is a very pathetic case, and a case in which the United States may not be entirely free from blame or obligation.

The state of our emotions, however, does not of itself make the matter germane to this bill. The bill under consideration is one to amend the war-risk insurance act, which provides for soldiers, sailors, and marines of the United States, insurance, compensation for the disabled, allowances for dependents, and so forth. There is no paragraph in the original act or any amendment thereto that is concerned with insurance, compensation, or anything else for the soldiers, sailors, or marines of any other nation than our own.

If this amendment is in order, it must rest entirely upon subsection 9 of section 11. Subsection 9 of section 11 is as follows:

(9) That the Bureau of War Risk Insurance is hereby authorized to furnish the medical, surgical, and hospital services and the supplies and appliances provided by subdivision (6) hereof, to discharged members of the military or naval forces of those Governments which have been associated in war with the United States since April 6, 1917, and come within the provisions of laws of such Governments similar to the war-risk insurance act, at such rates and under such regulations as the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance may prescribe; and the Bureau of War Risk Insurance is hereby authorized to utilize the similar services, supplies, and appliances provided for the discharged members of the military and naval forces of those Governments which have been associated in war with the United States since April 6, 1917, by the laws of such Governments similar to the war-risk insurance act, in furnishing the discharged members of the military and naval forces of the United States who live within the territorial limits of such Governments and come within the provisions of subdivision (6) hereof, with the services, supplies, and appliances provided for in such subdivision; and any appropriations that have been or may hereafter be made for the purpose of furnishing the services, supplies, and appliances provided for by subdivision (6) hereof are hereby made available for the payment to such Governments or their agencies for the services, supplies, and appliances so furnished at such rates and under such regulations as the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance may prescribe.

The gentleman from Massachusetts is correct in his contention that the first substantive proposition in this subdivision is not necessarily correlated with anything that follows. The Chair is unable to see in the first part of the subsection just read anything that is related to the matter of compensation, insurance, allowance, or compensation provided for in the original act or in this bill.

The rule as to germaneness is a simple one, but not an easy one to apply. It is always subject to the individual judgment of different Chairman, so that in its application similar facts may form the basis for different conclusions. In so far, however, as the present occupant of the Chair has been able, from a hurried examination of the precedents, to ascertain, there is no precedent that warrants the Chair in holding this amendment in order, and the Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. CANNON, Mr. EMERSON, Mr. OSBORNE, and Mr. HAYDEN rose.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 30 seconds.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I think the ruling of the Chair is correct. If the facts are as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] has stated, I have no doubt that the House would promptly pass a special bill, and I think that is the proper way to get at it.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. OSBORNE: Page 7, line 22, after the word "disability," strike out the remainder of line 22 and all of lines 23 and 24, embracing the following words "but no compensation shall be payable for a reduction in earning capacity rated at less than 10 per cent."

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Chairman, this paragraph 4 of section 11 provides—it is the paragraph devoted to describing disability and how it shall be allowed for—

If and while the disability is rated as partial and permanent, the monthly compensation shall be a percentage of the compensation that would be payable for his total and permanent disability equal to the degree of the reduction in earning capacity resulting from the disability.

Then follows the language that I desire to have stricken out.

My reason for offering this amendment is that I can see no good reason why a permanent disability, even below 10 per cent, should not be taken into consideration. As to a disability of that kind, as all who have looked into the matter of soldiers' disabilities will concede, what is less than 10 per cent now will in all probability become progressive, and very shortly it may be more than that.

Under the scale that we have adopted in the preceding section, of $100 per month for total permanent disability, a man with a disability of 9 per cent ought to be entitled to receive $9 a month. If he has a 9 per cent disability or a 5 per cent disability, why should he not receive corresponding compensation?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OSBORNE. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is it not true that soldiers who were injured in the Civil War received as low a pension as $4 a month, sometimes, to start with?

Mr. OSBORNE. Indeed, that is true.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Or even less?

Mr. OSBORNE. That is true; and there is no reason why the soldiers of this war should not be treated equally well.

There is another point which bears indirectly on this, to which I wish to call attention, and that is that a soldier wounded in this war, a young boy who desires to finish his education, can not receive the benefit of the education provided by the law on that subject unless his disability is as great as 10 per cent. If his disability is rated at 11 or 12 per cent, he may receive the benefit of that education. If rated at 10 per cent or less, he can receive no consideration. That seems to me to be a very unjust discrimination.

I have in mind a case that came to my attention within the last two or three days. A young man who lives in my district went into the service at 19 and acquitted himself with honor. He was wounded at the Argonne Forest. He was carrying dispatches. A shell burst near him and wounded him severely in the leg. He was taken to a hospital, but would not permit himself to be cared for until the dispatch had been sent forward. For this act he received the croix de guerre. He was in the hospital about two months and then returned to duty. Now he is home, is 21 years old, and he is anxious to finish his education. He has not the means to do what he would like to do. He would like to take advantage of the Government provision for soldiers under the disability act.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OSBORNE. I ask unanimous consent for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OSBORNE. He has been examined, and the examining board have decided that his disability is less than 10 per cent. I hope that if this amendment is adopted, as I think it ought to be, an amendment will follow to the other act, which will give such boys as this one an opportunity to receive the education which they ought to receive, in view of the fact that they have lost two years' time out of their young lives.

Mr. RAYBURN. I did not hear all that the gentleman said, and I do not understand just what is the concrete case to which he calls attention.

Mr. OSBORNE. The boy was carrying dispatches in the Battle of the Argonne, and a shell burst near him and lacerated his leg but did not break it. He refused medical attention until his dispatches were forwarded. For this devotion to duty he was awarded the croix de guerre. He was in the hospital for about two months and then returned to duty. He was discharged in May. He took the examination to decide the degree of disability, and it was decided that the disability was less than 10 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, we discussed this question quite a good deal in the committee. After we found that the bureau had decided to give very generous ratings for the slightest disabilities we came unanimously to the conclusion that a man who was not rated at least as high as 10 per cent by the bureau could certainly not claim to be disabled in any degree that would even inconvenience or embarrass him in the slightest. I know from the testimony of those who are to administer this law, and who have made up these tables, that if a man loses any part of any member of his body he is going to be rated most generously on the basis of $100 a month for total disability and given a corresponding percentage of that.

The gentleman says that disabilities which are rated at less than 10 per cent may within a few years increase in the degree of disability until the man would probably not be in a position to perform all his functions. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the act itself provides that a man may be reexamined, and if a disability rated below 10 per cent develops upon a later examination to be more than 10 per cent, then that man is taken under the act, as he would originally have been taken in.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. In a moment. My opinion is that if we do not stop at some definite percentage, then we will be flooded with special claims; and not only that, but the bureau will all the time have applications for reexamination for the slightest apparent impairment.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Would the 10 per cent be a 10 per cent decrease in earning capacity?

Mr. RAYBURN. That is about as good language as we could use, although I know it is not exactly fair language. A man may come out of the Army with a leg off. That would not reduce the earning capacity of a great many men. It would reduce the earning capacity of a man who worked on a farm, but in all probability it would not reduce the earning capacity of a lawyer, a banker, a bookkeeper, or a man occupying such a position. Yet it is a permanent partial disability, for which a man should be paid a percentage of $100 a month, and it will continue all through his life, regardless of the degree to which the individual may overcome his specific handicap.

Mr. MACGREGOR. But that is the theory, that it will decrease his earning capacity 10 per cent?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. MACGREGOR. On that basis it would decrease the man's capacity $120 a year.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBRUN] be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS. I should like to ask the gentleman a question which seems to me to be very fundamental throughout the discussion of this whole section. Subsection 2 provides that the compensation shall be paid in an amount equal to the degree of the reduction in earning capacity. Subsection 4 makes the same provision. Then at the top of page 8 there is a definition of what shall constitute earning capacity. I have repeatedly said, as I have spoken about these war-risk cases, that there are two kinds of impairment of money-getting capacity when a soldier has been disabled: First, the job-getting impairment; and secondly, the wage-earing impairment after the man gets the job. It has struck me that the original law with these amendments deals only with the second kind of impairment—namely, the wage-earning capacity after the man gets a job. It seems to me, therefore, that we ought to insert some provision to indicate the legislative intent that the War Risk Bureau, in fixing the schedules of disability, should include the job-getting impairment as well as the wage-earning impairment.

Mr. RAYBURN. The theory of that, I think, is that the bureau has taken the case of a man who would be put in the worst position. As I stated a moment ago, some man who lost one arm would not have his earning capacity impaired as a bookkeeper, or if he had lost one leg. But a man in some employment could not work at his former employment perhaps until he was educated for another business. I know the bureau's idea, and I know it is at least my idea, that it takes the case of a man who would be put in the worst situation by the loss of a member of his body—place him in a position the worst he could be placed in to rate his disability.

Mr. ROGERS. Take a man whose face had been largely shot away. Perhaps his wage-earning ability is little, if at all, affected; but, lamentable as it may be, his job-getting capacity is greatly affected. I wondered if the gentleman would approve an amendment somewhere in the first paragraph, on page 8, reading something like this:

> The bureau in adopting this schedule of ratings of reduction in earning capacity shall consider the impairment in ability to secure employment which results from such injuries.

It may be that the bureau officials are doing that now, but it seems to me that if they are doing it, however beneficially they are doing it, they are doing it outside the color of the law.

Mr. RAYBURN. My objection to that amendment would be its total impossibility of administration. I do not see how instructions like that to a bureau of the Government could possibly be carried out.

Mr. ROGERS. I understood the gentleman to say that they were applying that definition now.

Mr. RAYBURN. No; I said that they were applying the personal disability to a man who would be placed in the worst position in the business that he had been in the habit of performing. I doubt if the gentleman's amendment could be administered.

Mr. BEGG. If the gentleman will pardon me, if a man is so badly disfigured facially—and there are some—I think it is the worst kind of a wound a man can have in preventing him from getting a position. In the application of the law as it is now would not they consider him disabled so many per cent according to his former ability?

Mr. RAYBURN. I have no doubt but that the bureau would be generous along those lines.

Mr. BEGG. I can not see how there could be any other interpretation. If a man can not get a job because of disfigurement in the face that was not there when he went to war, is not that a physical handicap in the earning capacity?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; but in all probability without any suggestions in the law the bureau officials would be generous along that line.

Now, further, in reference to the 10 per cent, I asked Mr. Macfarlane——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. I ask unanimous consent for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. I asked Mr. Macfarlane about the 10 per cent rating and how they were drawn, and also asked Mr. Arthur Hunter, who is the main actuary of the New York Life, and Mr. Macfarlane is his assistant, who has been loaned to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance—I asked him about the 10 per cent, and he said he thought there ought to be some percentage in order to prevent confusion arising from it, but he said "you may rest assured that the man who is turned away from this board as rejected for having less disability than 10 per cent there will be nobody that will be able to complain."

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. In reference to the question propounded by the gentleman from Ohio I wish to call attention to the fact that the English act gives as high as 100 per cent for a bad facial disfigurement, and then for a bad facial disfigurement they give 80 per cent of the total disability. So there seems to be a precedent for adopting such a suggestion as was made by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. RAYBURN. If the gentleman will turn to page 34 of the hearings in the schedule of ratings he will find in the percentages that are given there are two ratings for facial wounds.

Mr. ROGERS. And those ratings are also in the report.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. OSBORNE. If the gentleman will yield, I want to ask this question. I put this case. I was talking within the hour to an old soldier of the Civil War from my State, and I asked him if he did not think this change ought to be made. He said he did think so, that he had a friend who lived in Santa Barbara, Calif., who was shot during the Civil War through the wrist, breaking no bones, but injuring and severing the cords, and so on. It did not come within the provisions of the pension law and he never has been able to get a pension for this disability.

He finally got a service pension. Undoubtedly a wound of that kind would reduce a man's capacity for physical work. He says that as a matter of fact this man suffered in some degree, though not extreme, but did suffer in some degree from the wound all of his life and does yet. Does the gentleman think that because that might be rated at less than 10 per cent of total disability, it ought to be disregarded in the pension laws?

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, if a man had a wound in the arm, even though it did not break a bone, and he suffered pain from it all of his life, it ought not to be rated under 10 per cent, and I do not think he would be rated unless it was rated above 10 per cent. I think in all probability the case the gentleman cites is one in which there was a flesh wound, and it closed up and the man who examined him could not determine in any way that he was discomforted by the wound.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I was over to Walter Reed Hospital last Sunday and I there saw a soldier from Mississippi who had lost both of his legs and one arm. All of the amputations were close to the body. I notice in the report of the committee here that you have stated what the loss would be for two eyes and two legs and two arms and two hands, but you do not state what such a loss as that soldier suffered would entitle him to. Can the gentleman tell what the loss of two legs and one arm would be?

Mr. RAYBURN. We have not made any specific rate above $100, except in what we call a case of double total disability, and that would be for both hands and both feet, for both hands and both eyes, or for both feet and both eyes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then he would not draw a larger rate of pension than if he had lost only both legs.

Mr. RAYBURN. Double total disability is rated at $200 and single total disability would be allowed $100.

Mr. ESCH. And then he would be allowed for a nurse.

Mr. RAYBURN. Of course he would be allowed so much for an assistant, a nurse, because he could not take care of himself.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, and as the committee has prepared the bill, the rate depends upon the reduction of earning capacity resulting from the disability. If the disfigurement would reduce the earning capacity, it would seem to me this clause covers it, and they would be entitled to take that into consideration.

Mr. RAYBURN. I say without that being specifically called to the attention of the department in the bill, I think these things are going to be most generously handled by the bureau, and that they are going to set a standard of percentages pretty soon that will control and be at least a precedent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. REAVIS. Who determines the percentage of disability? Is it done by the bill or is it within the discretion of the department?

Mr. RAYBURN. It is done within the discretion of the department in a way. They are set by a board which they select and I do not know who that board is going to be.

Mr. REAVIS. It is not done under the terms of the bill.

Mr. RAYBURN. No.

Mr. REAVIS. It rests within the discretion of the department directly or through an agency appointed by the department.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. The case called to the attention of the gentleman by the gentleman from California [Mr. OSBORNE] is unfortunate, but it is reasonable to suppose that the War Department will be actuated by generosity, and that it will be a very slight injury that does not amount to a 10 per cent disability.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes, it would.

Mr. REAVIS. And if the injury is of that degree that disables a man in any particular from earning a living, in all human probability the department will rate it at more than 10 per cent.

Mr. RAYBURN. Absolutely, and I will state to the gentleman further that I tried to make it plain in the hearings that we intended that that should be done by the bureau.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OSBORNE. The gentleman says undoubtedly the war-risk insurance authorities will be generous in their interpretation of the law, but does not the gentleman know that the Pension Bureau ever since its establishment has been extremely strict in the interpretation of the law, as they ought to be, and that the war-risk insurance authorities are very likely to be extremely strict.

Mr. RAYBURN. My candid opinion is, in the case that the gentleman presents, that in all probability that man did not deserve a pension. He may have later in life, but as I say, I do not think the examiner for the Pension Bureau would have denied him a pension if he had suffered inconvenience from this wound all of his life.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. OSBORNE) there were—ayes 18, noes 28.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HAYDEN: Page 10, line 18, strike out "October 6, 1917," and insert in lieu thereof "April 6, 1917: Provided, That any person who is now receiving a gratuity or pension under existing law shall not receive compensation under this act unless he shall first surrender all claim to such gratuity or pension."

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON] made retroactive to April 6, 1917, section 301 of the war-risk insurance act, which applies to compensation for death. My amendment makes retroactive to the date of the declaration of war section 302, which applies to compensation for injury. The argument in each case is the same. Soldiers who enlisted in the service after the declaration of war, served up to the 6th of October, and suffered injury in the meantime, unless this amendment is to be adopted, are to be compensated under the general pension laws instead of the bill now before the House. If it is proper to take care of those who are the widows and children of such soldiers, the soldier himself should certainly receive equal consideration.

The rates provided for in this bill are higher than the existing rates of pension. For instance, for the loss of a hand and a foot the present pension law would allow $60 a month. The pending bill allows $100. The same is true of the loss of both hands or both feet, wherein the existing pension law provides but $31.25 a month, while this act would allow $100 a month. One who is helpless and permanently bedridden will receive a monthly compensation of $100, while the maximum pension is $72.

There will be comparatively few cases affected by this amendment. I am informed that there have been filed in the Pension Office but 846 claims up to this time for death and injuries incurred in line of duty between April 6 and October 6, 1917, the date the war-risk insurance act went into effect, 565 from the Army and 281 from the Navy. Of that number 64 claims for disability have been allowed to date by the Pension Office. The comparatively small number of these pension claims is due to the fact that the Army was not recruited to full strength until after October 6, 1917. You will remember that the first draft was not called until September of that year. The Navy suffered heavier losses in proportion, owing to the activities of the German submarines.

You will note that the amendment provides that if any person is receiving a pension at the present time for a disability incurred between April and October, 1917, he must surrender his pension before he can receive compensation. In view of the action that the committee has taken in making section 301 retroactive we must in good faith do the same with section 302. All those who served in the war against Germany and her allies should receive the same treatment, whether their service was at the beginning or at the end of that conflict. No discrimination of any kind or character should be permitted which would affect the men who joined the American Army, Navy, and Marine Corps to fight for the same cause. The compensation for disabilities incurred in line of duty should be equal and be paid in the same way.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the amendment read again. I have tried to get a copy of it. I do not know that I have any objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

There was no objection.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. SWEET. The committee has no objection to that amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROGERS: Page 8, line 10, after the period Insert: "The bureau in adopting the schedule of ratings of reduction in earning capacity shall consider the impairment in ability to secure employment which results from such injuries."

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, my amendment is designed to make perfectly clear that the War Risk Bureau shall consider—and, still more important, shall have the right to consider—the impairment not merely in the earning capacity after the disabled soldier once gets a position, but the impairment in his ability to get a position. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], in the course of debate a few moments ago, referred to the fact that the Bureau of War Risk Insurance was inclined to be very liberal. That may or may not be. I have looked over the schedule of ratings which is contained in the report. There are some ratings which seem to me to be indefensible providing the bureau shall consider the ability of the man to get a job as well as his ability to earn a living after he gets the job. Take, for example, on page 5 of the report, the ratings for epilepsy. We find that if fits occur daily impairment and disability are rated at 100 per cent, but that if fits occur periodically at intervals of from two to four days the rating is 80 per cent. I submit that while a man has epileptic fits every other day may be theoretically able to earn 20 per cent of normal wages, no employer will take him on. It may be that the employer ought to take him on, but as a practical matter it is not likely that he will. So that a man who has epileptic fits occurring every other day is in fact totally disabled.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. I do.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. It would be very dangerous for a man of that kind to accept employment if he had fits every other day.

Mr. ROGERS. Exactly. The important feature is, while that rate is entirely defensible from the earning point of view, it is indefensible from the ability to get a job point of view.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The man who is subject to epileptic fits at irregular intervals really is totally incapacitated.

Mr. ROGERS. He certainly is if they occur at very frequent intervals. Again, on the next page we find ratings on what are called "objective conditions." Injury to the face, involving marked paralysis of the facial nerves, is given a disability rating, a flat rating, of 20 per cent. Additional injuries to the face are given disability ratings from 10 per cent to 40 per cent. Forty per cent seems to be the highest rate for injuries to the face. I think Members of this House will agree that a man whose face is largely shot away is one of the most pitiful sacrifices and sufferers of this war. It may be that if he could get the right kind of employment he could earn within 10 to 40 per cent of normal; but what he can earn depends upon whether he can get lucrative employment. As a rule and on the average that man will not be able to get lucrative employment. So I submit that there, too, the bureau ought to consider not merely his earning capacity once he is in a job, but should also consider the detriment which he has sustained in trying to get occupation. I find on the same page of the report that total deafness is given a rate of 50 per cent.

The same argument applies there. It may be that a totally deaf man, once in a position, can earn as much as 50 per cent of the normal wage, but what employer is going to take on a totally deaf man. The same rate of 50 per cent is given for a man who is totally dumb. Fifty per cent for a man who has completely lost the power of speech. That man can not get a job. A patriotic employer may now and then take one on, but on averages a totally deaf or dumb man can not get a job. In articulate speech, due to trauma is given a rating of only 10 per cent and so on. I could go through these ratings. I think these ratings are perhaps sound, as I say, and will repeat to weariness, if we take the plight of the man only from the aspect of his loss of earning capacity——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ROGERS. Only from the aspect of his earning capacity once he has secured a desirable position. But we can not in fairness to the soldier look at that aspect alone. We must, in all propriety and fairness to the soldier, consider also his ability to get employment. If he is totally deaf or totally dumb or has epileptic fits or inarticulate speech, whatever it may be, that man can not get employment and his rate of disability should be higher than the war-risk insurance construing the present law has seen fit to award.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas has said that in practice—I do not wish to misquote him; I think that is what he said—that in practice the War Risk Bureau reaches the same result and does include the job-getting element in determining the degree of disability. It may be that they are doing that today under the present law. I submit they have not the right to do it, and one of these days a new director, or a new Comptroller of the Treasury, may come along and point out the fact that they have been operating without the law. We ought to consider this element. If it is being considered now, why should we not write it into the law; why should we not adopt an amendment that specifically says the impairment in job-getting ability shall be an element of disability?

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection and shall not oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts. My only fear is that the administration of it is going to be practically impossible. So far as I am concerned, I do not offer any objection.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have listened to what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] has had to say with a great deal of sympathy. I have had a case of this kind, one of my constituents while serving as a soldier suffered an accident which caused epilepsy. He has fits at irregular intervals—of 10 days, or 2 weeks, or something like that. His mentality has degenerated until now perhaps it is that of a 12-year old child, and he is going down steadily. The medical authorities say that he will continue to degenerate mentally until he will become imbecile, and will probably die after an interval of 10 or 12 years.

That boy is now receiving $30 a month compensation. It is all I have been able to get the Bureau of War Risk Insurance to give him, notwithstanding a very diligent and earnest effort on my part. Furthermore, that boy took insurance while he was in the service, and although I have presented his claim for benefits under it on account of his disability—epilepsy—incurred in the line of duty, his claim has been denied. The bureau holds that to entitle him to benefits under his insurance—it being payable only in case of a total and permanent disability—he must be "bedridden and helpless"—using those words.

Now, something ought to be done in that kind of cases. That boy is incapable of doing any work. He is incapable of earning money to take care of himself, and, furthermore, nobody knows when he is going to fall in one of his fits. It is unsafe to leave him alone, to let him go out on the streets without company. He really requires that some one be with him all the time, some one to keep him under constant observation. In that kind of a case the disabled soldier ought to have the maximum compensation paid him. That is the kind of a case in which benefits should be paid to the disabled soldier from his insurance. Of course, the question of insurance does not come up here under this amendment, but I am calling the attention of the members of the committee to it in order to urge that they present proper legislation to assure that justice shall be done in extreme cases of that kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. EMERSON: Page 6, line 18, after the word "living," strike out "$90" and insert "$100."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I find on page 6, section 11, subdivision (a), that if a disabled person has neither wife nor child, he gets $80; if he has a wife and no child, $90. That gives him $10 a month in case he has a wife. It seems to me that is a small allowance. I have also sent to the desk two other amendments, one increasing the $95 to $110 and increasing the $100 to $120. I do not care to discuss the matter, but it does seem to me that if a man who has no dependent is entitled to $80 a month, if he has a wife he is entitled to more than $10 a month additional, and if he has one child he is entitled to more than $5 a month for that child. We all know that $5 a month will not keep a child for a week nowadays. Therefore I suggest these three amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EMERSON].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment reported again?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be reported again.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk read the other two amendments and that we have them all considered at once.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the other amendments will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 19, after the word "living," strike out "$95" and insert "$110."

Page 6, line 21, after the word "living," strike out "$100" and insert "$120."

The CHAIRMAN. A division is asked for. The question is on the amendments offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EMERSON].

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 6, noes 27.

So the amendments were rejected.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. OSBORNE: Page 7, line 7, strike out the figures "10" and insert "5." Also, on page 7, line 24, strike out the figures "10" and insert "5."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the two amendments be considered together in order to save time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to repeat the remarks that I made a few moments ago on this same subject. The committee has decided against the motion that I made amending this section, so that the limit of 10 per cent should not cut off all compensation. Now, if the committee does not desire entirely to eliminate the limit, I entertain the hope that it will see the propriety of making it 5 per cent. I can see no good reason why a soldier whose earning capacity has deteriorated to the extent of 9 per cent should not be entitled to the same consideration, proportionately, as one who has lost his earning ability to the extent of 11 per cent. I can see some reason in the argument that there should be a limit, but I think the limit of 10 per cent is too high. It ought not to be placed higher than 5 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. OSBORNE].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 17, noes 24.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to page 6, line 23, to strike out the last two words, "up to two."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SMITH of Michigan: Page 6, line 23, strike out the words "up to two."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it occurs to me that where a person has more children than one, and $5 is allowed for that one child, it is wrong to stop the compensation simply by allowing it for that one child; there may be a family of 3 or 4 children, and it would not make any difference if there was a family of 10 children, if $5 is allowed for one it ought to be allowed for each child.

I think the language of this section should be so amended that a man who was totally disabled and who has no wife should receive $5 for each one of his children, whether he has one or two or more, and for that reason I ask the words I have indicated be stricken out. Under this bill if he has no wife, he is entitled to payment for each additional child up to two. That would be one. His wife is dead, he is disabled, and has a family. It seems to me he ought not to be limited to $5 for one child. If he receives $5 for one child, he ought to receive a like $5 per month for each child.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, what is the gentleman's specific amendment?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. To strike out the words "up to two" and give $5 for each child, whether it be one or more, and the more the better.

The time has long since passed, if there ever was a time, when any potent argument can be made against insurance of either life or property. One of the best forms of life insurance is that provided for the American soldiers of the great World's War. Issued and guaranteed by the Government, there can be no question over the solvency of the policies. It provides easy payments, is liberal in its terms, and at reduced rates. It gives to those who enlisted and offered their lives for their country a special opportunity to provide for dependents and relatives. Policies can be converted and taken out by the soldier in any amount between $1,000 and $10,000, provided he had taken out a policy while in the service. The war-risk insurance law grants to the soldier an opportunity to obtain life insurance on easier terms than those provided by any other company. It has more liberal terms and lower rates than other old-line companies, its one universal requirement being that the insured was a soldier who enlisted or served in the cause of his country after war was declared against Germany and had applied for a policy 120 days after enlistment. During the war nearly all the soldiers took out policies and carried insurance, but since the armistice was signed it is reported that nearly three-fourths have allowed their policies to lapse and given up their insurance.

I think in so doing they made a mistake, and there must be some reason why they did not keep up their insurance. One reason may be the inconvenience of payment. Monthly payments come regularly, and drafts, checks, money orders, or cash must be sent to Washington with the regularity of a clock. If payment could be made at a bank or at the post office, it would add to the convenience. Then, $6.50 every month amounts to $78 per year, and is considerable where a soldier is out of work or working at a low wage. I am in favor of every soldier carrying a policy of insurance. Insurance to the amount of $10,000 is a considerable sum, and larger in amount than the ordinary business man carries, in my judgment. I think every soldier can and ought to carry a policy of at least $1,000 at the low rates and favorable terms offered by the Government. This will aid in settling up his estate after his decease and pay the expenses of his last sickness. After his policy is converted into a straight life or endowment policy, the payment for a small amount of insurance will not be burdensome or expensive.

Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the difference in the compensation now paid to disabled soldiers and the members of their families, and what will be paid under this bill when it becomes a law. The provisions of the present law are hereby inserted:

PRESENT LAW.

(1) If and while the disability is total, the monthly compensation shall be the following amounts:
(a) If the disabled person has neither wife nor child living, $30;
(b) If he has a wife but no child living, $45;
(c) If he has a wife and one child living, $55;
(d) If he has a wife and two children living, $65;
(e) If he has a wife and three or more children living, $75;
(f) If he has no wife but one child living, $40, with $10 for each additional child up to two;
(g) If he has a mother or father, either or both dependent on him for support, then, in addition to the above amounts, $10 for each.

Under this bill, these compensations will be considerably increased and I herewith include in my remarks a copy of the compensation in proposed bill:

PROPOSED BILL.

(1) If and while the disability is rated as total and temporary, the monthly compensation shall be the following amounts:
(a) If the disabled person has neither wife nor child living, $80;
(b) If he has a wife but no child living, $90;
(c) If he has a wife and one child living, $95;
(d) If he has a wife and two or more children living, $100;

(e) If he has no wife but one child living, $90, with $5 for each additional child up to two;

(f) If he has a mother or father, either or both dependent on him for support, then, in addition to the above amounts, $10 for each parent so dependent.

No other pension or benefits are allowed for disability or injuries received in the Army, Navy or Marine Corps. It is conceded on all hands that the terms are liberal and just, and it is believed will meet with the universal favor of the soldiers themselves as well as the country.

For partial disability a percentage of the above compensation is determined and allowed, and I herewith incorporate the compensation provided for in this bill for some of the major losses and injuries:

Total deafness, 50 per cent of total disability.
Loss of both eyes, 100 per cent.
Loss of both hands, 100 per cent.
Loss of both feet, 100 per cent.
Loss of hand, 60 per cent.
Loss of foot at ankle, 35 per cent.

From these major injuries given in the report a compensation is made for any injury received in line of duty, which impairs the earning capacity of the soldier.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, that argument has been made every time we have discussed the bill. That argument has been before us every time we have considered amendments to this bill. It was the opinion of the committee when this law was first written that we should stop somewhere, and it has been our intention always to try to stop at $100 for a family.

This language that the gentleman moves to strike out gives $80 a month the man and $5 for each child up to four children. If he has no wife and one child, he will get $90. If he has no wife and three children, he will get $100.

It was our intention to try to hold this within $100. The truth of the business is we have got to stop somewhere. Before this amendment was offered a man himself was given $30 a month. Now we raise him up to $80. When he was getting $30 we made it $100, so as to include his parents. If a man had a wife and children enough to get $100, his parents would get nothing. In this law we have given $80 to the man and he and his wife and children will raise it to $100 and the allowance to his parents is not made dependent on the allowance made to his wife and children, so that a man with wife and children and dependent parents would get $120.

It is a question of stopping somewhere. Of course, I presume, if we had started in to pay $100 a month to a man who was permanently disabled, my friend from Ohio [Mr. EMERSON] would probably have offered to amend and raise it to $105. If we had made it $150 a month, no doubt some gentleman would have proposed to amend it and make it $155. If we had made it $200, no doubt some gentleman would have sought to raise it to $205. But the committee has considered this thing carefully and thought we ought to stop somewhere, and so we held it within the limit of $100.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I favor the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], and I move to strike out the last two words in order to speak upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. HICKS. I have been very much interested in the remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], and, realizing the vast amount of study he has given to the subject and his deep knowledge of the matter, I hesitate to oppose the views stated by him. But at the same time, from the argument he has made, I take it that the committee have arbitrarily fixed the total amount to be paid not because of any particular justice in the case but simply because that has been a point set beyond which they do not think it wise to go.

It seems to me that this amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is clearly in the interest of a man who has a large family, and unless we give him this $5 per child the man with a large family is discriminated against in comparison with the man with a small family. It seems to me in all justice, and considering the efforts we are making in this country for an increase of population, we should sustain the amendment offered. Representing in this Congress the district of Theodore Roosevelt, I should be the last man to oppose that amendment, and therefore I favor it. [Applause.] Let me add in general, Mr. Chairman, that I feel a liberal policy should be adopted toward all who served their country in its need.

In the darkest hour of the world's history the sterling manhood of America, steadfast in purpose and independent in character, crossed the seas in a crusade for the liberation of humanity. By their actions they have left for future generations a splendid heritage of heroic achievement and noble devotion to duty. Unstinted praise is due also to their comrades in arms who did not receive the opportunity of going abroad, but whose courage and determination was manifested in the cantonments and training camps on this side of the water. We must not forget either the men and women at home who contributed the moral force behind the men on the line, furnishing the material supplies, making sacrifices, and rendering service for the winning of the war, and giving undivided support in unselfish cooperation for the complete vindication of our institutions.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment on page 8, line 17, to strike out the figures "20" and substitute therefor the figures "40."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TREADWAY: Page 8, line 17, strike out the figures "20" and substitute therefor the figures "40."

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, this is a commendable paragraph. It seeks to care for the totally disabled person. It says the person "so helpless as to be in constant need of a nurse or attendant," and then it provides that the pay for such a nurse or attendant shall be at the rate of $20 per month.

It is, of course, ridiculous to suppose that any sort of a nurse or attendant can be secured for $20 per month. If we are going to recognize the right of the man to have a nurse, we certainly ought to offer some sort of commensurable salary. The $20 a month means that if the nurse is procured for a man a large part of the wages of that nurse must come out of the man's own allowance, given to him not because he is absolutely helpless but in accordance with the other provisions of the act. If he is not totally disabled, he can get $80 per month, whereas you are simply adding $20 if he is absolutely bedridden.

I do not think the figures of the committee are at all commensurate with any assistance that we want to give toward securing a nurse for an absolutely helpless soldier. I therefore offer the amendment in the hope that the nurse may be recognized as being worth at least $40 per month.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I was one of those who contended for the consideration before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of an amendment to the present law raising the present rates and allowances. In fact, I had a bill pending before that committee for that purpose. I thought they ought to be very much raised, because they were not as large as those of the soldiers of the Civil War. They are raised now to a point far beyond those of the soldiers of the Civil War, far beyond anything they ever thought of getting, and clear out of sight of what the soldiers of the Civil War received at the time when the Civil War closed. To this I have no objection. On the contrary, I entirely approve the action of the committee; but if we are to proceed as we did on this last amendment we will not have very much of a bill left here. The last amendment has thrown this bill out of joint. It does not fit with the rest of the bill, and, in my judgment, is not at all logical. There is no reason that I can see, except a mere matter of charity or generosity, why we should give more compensation to a man because he has four children than to another man who has not. He has not suffered a greater disability by reason of having more children, and that is what this bill is paying him for.

Mr. LAYTON. But has he not more to maintain?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; but let the gentleman follow that up a little further. If we were to grade it in that kind of a way we could grade it by what it costs the man to live, which would require different rates for different parts of the country. There are some parts of the country where it would cost a man twice as much to live as in other parts of the country. There are some places where it would cost a man with only one child more than it would cost a man to live with two children in another part of the country. But we can not base the compensation on that. That would be neither logical nor right.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Under the pension system applying to the Civil War veterans, the dependents were never given anything until the soldier had died.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Not until the soldier had died.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. And then the dependents were paid.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes, a small sum at first. Only a fraction of what will be paid under this bill.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. There have been some exceptions in reference to helpless children, but before this law there never was any provision for the dependents of soldiers, and that fact was never taken into consideration in granting pensions.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There are Members here—and I am one of them—whose fathers went to serve their country in the Civil War for $13 a month. My father went leaving six children, and not one penny was given to them or his wife or an allowance of any kind. The cost of living, too, was even greater than it is now.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. What justification can we have for pursuing this course with reference to this bill without at the same time going over all the pension laws and treating the children of crippled Civil War veterans and Spanish-American War veterans in the same way?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. None, and we will have to revise all of the pension laws.

Now gentlemen can point out inequalities in this bill. It would be impossible for the Interstate Commerce Committee to get up a bill in which there were not inequalities in certain cases, because they can not apportion all these matters with perfect fairness to everybody. In certain instances they have got to fix what looks like an arbitrary sum, but there is no other way to do it. That is why they took 10 per cent as the lowest amount of disability where any compensation would be allowed. They had to fix a standard somewhere. So all along here they have had to take some certain sum as a standard. They have taken $100 a month as the standard for permanent total disability. For temporary total disability they have taken a smaller sum, as they should do. If we revise these sums for temporary disability we ought to revise the amount allowed for permanent disability. I think the committee have done excellent work. I am in favor of liberal allowances to the soldiers and I have done my best before the committee to get these allowances liberalized; but I think we ought to be very careful how we interfere with the work of the committee lest we destroy the general harmony of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. OSBORNE: Page 7, line 7, strike out the figure "10" and insert "7"; also on page 7, line 24, strike out the figure "10" and insert "7."

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Chairman, I first endeavored to have this minimum of 10 per cent disability stricken out altogether, and then I tried to have it reduced to 5 per cent. I gained on the second proposition, and I hope this time to be able to have the amendment adopted. Without further remark, I will submit it to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. OSBORNE].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. OSBORNE) there were—ayes 18, noes 24.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were refused, nine members supporting the demand.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That section 401 of the war risk insurance act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 401. That such insurance must be applied for within 120 days after enlistment or after entrance into or employment in the active service and before discharge or resignation, except that those persons who are in the active war service at the time of the publication of the terms and conditions of such contract of insurance may apply at any time within 120 days thereafter and while in such service. Any person in the active service on or after the 6th day of April, 1917, and before the 11th day of November, 1918, who, while in such service, and before the expiration of 120 days after October 15, 1917, or 120 days after entrance into or employment in the active service, becomes or has become totally and permanently disabled, or dies or has died, without having applied for insurance, shall be deemed to have applied for and to have been granted insurance, payable to such person during his life in monthly installments of $25 each, unless he refuses or has refused to apply for insurance; and any person inducted into the service by a local draft board after the 6th day of April, 1917, and before the 11th day of November, 1918, who, while in such service, and before being accepted and enrolled for active military or naval service, becomes or has become totally and permanently disabled, or dies or has died, without having applied for insurance, shall be deemed to have applied for and to have been granted insurance, payable to such person during his life in monthly installments of $25 each. If he shall die either before he shall have received any of such monthly installments or before he shall have received 240 of such monthly installments, then $25 per month shall be paid to his widow from the time of his death and during her widowhood; or if there is no widow surviving him, then to his child or children; or if there is no child surviving him, then to his mother; or if there be no mother surviving him, then to his father, if and while they survive him: Provided, however, That no more than 240 of such monthly installments, including those received by such person during his total and permanent disability, shall be so paid. The amount of the monthly installments shall be apportioned between children as may be provided by regulations."

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAMSEYER: Page 11, strike out all after the word "who" in line 5, and all of lines 6, 7, and 8.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I explained this amendment last Tuesday while we were under general debate. The committee having this bill in charge have been fair and generous in trying to cover all cases that were not covered by the original act or the amendments that have heretofore been considered and become a part of the law; but I think they have overlooked one class of men to whom I shall call attention for just a moment. They are the men who died on the battle field, who at the time of their death did not have any insurance. Last Tuesday when I spoke I referred to several cases. Since that time other Members who heard me have told me of about a dozen more cases. All those who would be beneficiaries under my amendment are men who died in France between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918.

Now, let us see how my amendment affects the reading of this particular section.

You know when the war-risk insurance act was first passed we extended the time for applying for term insurance from October 15, 1917, for 120 days. After that the time was extended for something like a month, or perhaps 60 days. But after that time—that is, from February or March, 1918—there were no days of grace.

Persons taken into the military service were supposed to apply for insurance at once. But if a man did not take term insurance, he had no automatic insurance; he had no insurance whatever. For some reason the committee has seen fit to make the act retroactive, so as to give every person inducted into the service prior to November 11, 1918, 120 days' grace. So, the soldier who enlisted in April, 1918, and was killed within 115 days, or died, by this retroactive provision is given automatic insurance, while the person who was killed or died 125 days after he was inducted will not get the automatic insurance.

The effect of my amendment will be to give every person in the military and naval service of the United States between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, who died without insurance the benefits of automatic insurance.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. How large a policy would you give them?

Mr. RAMSEYER. The payments are provided for in the automatic insurance, $25 a month for 240 months. The rest of the section provides for all that. The words I move to strike out in lines 5, 6, 7, and 8 read as follows:

While in such service, and before the expiration of 120 days after October 15, 1917, or 120 days after entrance into or employment in the active service.

So that it will read:

Any person in the active service on or after the 6th day of April, 1917, and before the 11th day of November, 1918, who becomes or has become totally and permanently disabled, or dies or has died, without having applied for insurance, shall be deemed to have applied for and to have been granted insurance, payable to such person during his life in monthly installments of $25 each, unless he refuses or has refused to apply for insurance.

Tuesday, after I got through presenting my views on this amendment, several members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce came to me and said that the act already provided for that; that the proposed section in the bill provided that. They evidently had that impression, because the committee in its report implies that. If you would read only the report of the committee, not the bill, you would get the impression that every person who died in the military service between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, was automatically insured by this section.

Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. IGOE. Would not the effect of the gentleman's amendment be to give insurance permanently to all these men, because the way the committee has it if he dies within a certain time it applies, but if you follow the language on it says "dies or has died."

Mr. RAMSEYER. This is limited.

Mr. IGOE. The man gets his insurance, and if he dies in the future——

Mr. RAMSEYER. This automatic insurance is only payable under certain conditions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWEET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. SWEET. Does the gentleman know about how many men will be affected by his amendment?

Mr. RAMSEYER. I do not know; I have been unable to get the figures either from the War Department or from the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. In fact, the figures of deaths during the war, as the War Department has it, is less than the number of death claims as reported by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, which, of course, is ridiculous. I know of cases of boys who died in the service that did not have this insurance. I heard a Member stating the other day that it was 300 or 400, but I did not ask the gentleman where he got his figures. I do not know whether that is correct or not. I personally know of 2 cases and 10 other cases I have heard spoken of by Members of the House.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I know of a worthy case, but of those who died in the Army, of course, a great many had taken out insurance.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes; it would be a very limited number affected by this amendment. It would only benefit the mothers of these boys who died on the battle field in France. A case I have particularly in mind is a case where a young man volunteered for the Army right after the declaration of war by Congress, in April, 1917, and he was taken to France in June, 1917. Because of the fact that he developed into a crack marksman he with other men in the squad were sent to different places in France to train other men in rifle practice. Whether this boy ever had an opportunity to take out insurance I do not know. The only thing we do know is that after he was reported killed we could not find any record of an insurance policy in the department. This young man had a most excellent record. He was in the first fight with the Americans, he was through the leading engagements during the war, and he was killed in October, 1918, on the field of battle.

Now, if you do not cover a case like this you will not be doing full justice. His mother can not get a cent under this section. On the latter part of page 11 you give the benefit of automatic insurance to a man who died, as a number did last fall, who were inducted into the service and died of the "flu" after they got to camp and before they took out insurance. The mothers of those young men who died of the flu, and who had no insurance, are going to get $25 per month. They died a noble death. They died for their country. I do not underestimate the manner of their death; I exalt it; but certainly young men that I have in mind who died on the battle fields of France had just as worthy deaths and just as exalted, and if anything more so, than the young men who receive the benefits here which they did not have under the old law, and who died in this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Do I understand my colleague that this is intended to cover cases where it is believed that boys actually took out insurance—that is, at least in some instances—but in some way the records do not show it?

Mr. RAMSEYER. It will cover that kind of a case, and also cases where a man has no insurance, and we can not know whether it is due to his own fault or not. In fact, I care not whether it was due to his own fault or not. If a young man died during the war, especially as in the case that I have in mind, on the battle field in France, then his beneficiaries who are his close relatives should be entitled to this automatic insurance just as much as those of the young man who died in camp here in this country and who are specially provided for in the latter part on page 11, and who were not provided for in the original act. I do not complain of that. I commend the committee for that. What I ask the committee to do is to extend the benefits of the automatic insurance so as to take in those young men who without insurance sacrificed their lives upon the battle fields of France so that this Government might live.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. I would like to inquire whether the gentleman's amendment covers cases like this, where young men went to universities and were trained under Government military officers and made application for insurance to the officers, who will testify they did, but were unable to acquire it because they could not be furnished with blanks, and who in the meantime died of pneumonia?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Their case is amply covered in the latter part of this section.

Mr. FOCHT. Does the gentleman think that it is specific enough?

Mr. RAMSEYER. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. The gentleman understands that the rulings of this and the Pension Department are invariably against the soldier. That is the difficulty with this bill. There is too much authority and discretion given to this War Risk Insurance Bureau.

Mr. RAMSEYER. What I want to do is to take care of the boys who died in France without insurance, the same as we are doing for the boys who died in the camps.

Mr. FOCHT. That is what we want to do, but let us be sure that we do it and not depend upon any rulings by the department, which are so often against the soldier.

Mr. RAMSEYER. If the gentleman will vote for my amendment, he will help to do that very thing.

Mr. FOCHT. Very well, I will be glad to do it.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I think the Members of the House will agree that the committee has been very liberal in connection with automatic insurance. Under the original act no one was entitled to automatic insurance except those who were in the service between the 15th of October, 1917, and the 12th day of February, 1918. I believe the automatic insurance was extended for something like 60 days beyond that period. According to the provisions of this bill, we have extended the automatic insurance to every man who enlisted in the Army or Navy for 120 days. During those 120 days he was supposed to apply for insurance. If he did not apply for insurance during the 120 days and did not refuse to take insurance, and during those 120 days he died or was disabled, in either event he or his dependents would be entitled to automatic insurance. The reason that we fixed 120 days is because every man who enlisted in the Army or Navy had 120 days in which to take out insurance, and so we said we would extend it for 120 days to every man in the service, provided he did not refuse to take insurance and there was no record against him in that connection. It is estimated it will take about $5,000,000 to take care of this provision of extending the automatic insurance in this bill. It was also shown in the hearings that automatic insurance had cost the Government about $22,500,000. It will be observed also that this insurance is not necessarily made payable to the mother of the soldier, but it is payable to the widow, or if there be no widow surviving, then to the child or children, and if there is no children surviving, then to the mother, and if there be no mother surviving, then to the father, if and while they survive him. So when the gentleman speaks about the mothers, it really goes to the family of the soldier, as provided in this bill. While I am naturally in sympathy with the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. RAMSEYER], it seems to me that the committee has been so liberal in this bill in regard to automatic insurance that the amendment ought not to be adopted. This amendment proposes to extend the automatic insurance during the whole period of the war. It extends it not only for 120 days, but to everyone who did not apply for insurance during the whole period of the war.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. As a matter of right and morals and sentiment, is not the mother or the widow or the child or the father of a boy who died 200 days after he enlisted as much entitled to the provisions of automatic insurance as the boy who died 110 days after?

Mr. SWEET. But here is the proposition: Everyone who entered the service had 120 days in which to take out insurance, and if they did not take out the insurance they could not do it thereafter. During that same period, without action on the part of the boy, without his paying one dollar in premiums or anything of that kind, we propose to give him automatic insurance at the rate of $25 a month for 240 payments.

Mr. RAMSEYER. In other words, you have made part of this retroactive. That is, you have added 120 days onto that. Evidently you discovered before your committee that quite a number of boys did not take out insurance, who died within 120 days after their enlistment, and, therefore, you covered their case. If you want to make this retroactive in cases that were not covered before, why should not any boy who died in the service after 120 days be as much entitled to it as those who died within the 120 days and after they had rendered more service than those who died within the 120 days?

Mr. SWEET. Yes; the answer to the gentleman's question is this: We gave to the boys when they enlisted during the first 120 days an opportunity to take out insurance——

Mr. RAMSEYER. But you did not give them after March, 1918.

Mr. SWEET. And when they had that opportunity and did not take it out it seems to me that when we grant those who did not take out the insurance, who never paid any premiums, who never in any way gave anything toward that insurance, if we grant them the same period of time for automatic insurance that we did to the boys who had an opportunity to take out the original insurance, that we are doing the fair thing.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Oh, well, this can not be placed on a business basis. Now, just a question. You are extending the benefit to the boys who were taken to the camps and died of the "flu" before they got into active service. Now, what objection can there be to extending that to the boys who died on the battle fields in active service? I am glad you extended to the boys who died of the "flu" in the colleges. I simply want to ask you to give to the boys who died on the battle field the same right, the same right to their dependents, and the same privileges, as you do the boys who died in the colleges and in the camps before they were ever taken into active service.

Mr. SWEET. The gentleman is not correct in his statement. The law applies equally to all in the service, whether they were in the colleges or in the Army.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The latter part of this paragraph I am referring to only applies to those who between the time they were called and were inducted into the service either died or received permanent injury. I am glad you extend it to that class. I congratulate you that you did extend it to that class; but why not extend it to the fellows who shed their blood that their country might live and that their flag might be honored? [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, of course, it is very regrettable that speeches such as the gentleman has just made should be made here. The compensation of the war-risk insurance act is the most generous ever passed by the Congress, and when it comes to gentlemen talking about doing something for the soldier, already more has been done for him if the insurance had never been added to the law than has ever been in any law that this country has ever passed. For the disabled soldier in this bill we raise the benefits nearly 200 per cent. Now, there is a great misconception here about this automatic insurance and a good many men who talk about it do not understand what it means. There was only one reason upon earth for allowing the 120 days that automatic insurance would apply in the beginning, and that was that this insurance could not be advertised among the boys within a shorter period than that.

Mr. ESCH. If the gentleman will yield. One other reason, along the line suggested by the gentleman, was the fact that we could not get notice to the soldiers in the Philippines and get report back in a shorter period of time.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is what I say, that it was on the theory that the information could not be transmitted to the soldiers; that they would not have the opportunity to take the insurance; that the 120 days were to be allowed in which a man would be covered by $5,000 worth of insurance.

Mr. SWEET. If the gentleman will yield——

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. SWEET. I call attention to the fact, too, that those who died in the service on the battle fields of France are entitled to compensation—that is, the dependents of those who died are entitled to it.

Mr. RAYBURN. The most generous compensation that has ever been allowed. But some men came before us, as our friend over here did come before us, and said that some of these fellows—and even after we made it 120 days after the law was enacted we then extended it 60 more days, thinking some fellows in the far-away sections might not receive the information, which made it 6 months. Every man who went into the Army after that time——

Mr. DOMINICK. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. RAYBURN. In a moment.

Mr. DOMINICK. In connection with this point. Did that extend automatic insurance 60 days?

Mr. RAYBURN. It gave them the right to take out the insurance and did not cut them off for that time. Now, it was extended in order that they might take out this insurance more than four months after they went into the service or after the enactment of the law so that it might give six months. Now, cases came before us of fellows who did not have an opportunity to take out insurance, and the reason why we extended this for the 120 days, running over the whole war, was that a good many officers in the Army did not understand the law themselves and told the boys that they were covered for 120 days by $5,000 worth of insurance; and we thought there were not so many of the boys killed according to the number in the Army, and that it would probably be the right thing to cover them in the automatic insurance for 120 days, all during the war. Now, officers in many instances had told those boys that they were covered for 120 days, and where it was for a good cause they had not taken out insurance we thought it was nothing but right that this——

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. In a moment—that this should be extended. Now, they talk about doing these things. Gentlemen talk as if the compensation under this law was not in effect and that the automatic insurance was the only benefit that went to the soldier at all, to him or his dependents. I want to call attention to this fact, that in this bill we now report to you and we ask this House to pass, and which, after much and long consideration, we have reported here, if a man is totally disabled he shall have $100 a month. If he is totally and temporarily disabled, while that temporary disability lasts he shall have $80 a month. If he is wounded in a permanent or partial way, that he shall receive far more than was ever received under any other law of the country. Yet gentlemen come upon the floor of this House with tears in their voices and try to appeal to the passions of the Members and hold this committee up to ridicule by claiming that it is not doing anything for the soldier, when this committee has considered these things, every amendment that is reported here and every foolish amendment that has been introduced in the form of a special bill. Yet they expect, after all this generosity on the part of this committee, after all of this consideration on its part, to come in here and upon a false sentiment, a sentiment not based upon facts but upon ignorance of this law, have this House stampeded into adopting these amendments. [Applause.] I do not believe it can be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have two minutes in which to answer a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. OLIVER. As I understand, the dependents to whom the automatic insurance could be paid under the original act included only the mother, father, widow, and children of the deceased. You have now amended the law so as to include anyone in loco parentis to the deceased. Unquestionably during the war there were insistent demands that the law be so amended as to include those in loco parentis, and requests were filed by soldiers that they be allowed to take out insurance payable to such parties. Now, how would you, if that soldier died more than 120 days after he entered the service, do justice to those whom you now seek to bring within the operation of the law, unless you adopt some amendment like that now pending?

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. OLIVER. You have limited the time when the insurance applies to 120 days after the party enters the service—that is, the automatic insurance—and you have now included in the beneficiary class those standing in loco parentis. Some of the soldiers now dead requested that they be allowed to take out a policy payable to foster parents, but they were refused, because such parties were not included in the class of beneficiaries named in the original act.

Mr. RAYBURN. I did not say they were not allowed to take it out, but they did not take it out.

Mr. OLIVER. They did not take it out because then it could not be made payable to a stepmother, say, or a person who stood in loco parentis, but under an amendment now adopted it can be. Suppose he died 121 days after he enlisted, would they get the benefit proposed by the amendment?

Mr. RAYBURN. No; they would get the compensation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I favor the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa, and in taking this position I do not in any way question the good faith of the committee that has brought in this bill or reflect upon the work of that great committee. This bill as presented is a most generous piece of legislation. It carries out, in my judgment, the wishes of the American people that we deal justly and generously with those who fought the battles of the country in the great crisis through which we have recently passed.

Now, in the amendments that are carried in this bill we grant automatic insurance to those who were never regularly inducted into the service and pay the policies if they die before they were regularly taken into the service, which is right. We grant the automatic insurance for 120 days to every soldier and pay the policy if he fails to avail himself of his privilege to take out the insurance within his 120 days. And I think that is proper and right. That takes care of a great many worthy cases.

Now, the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa is a logical sequence of what we have done, and without this amendment this bill is not a logical bill and does not do justice to all classes of those who gave their lives during this war. Let us see. It simply gives the benefit of automatic insurance to that class—and it is a very small class—of boys who did not take out the insurance and yet were killed in battle or were totally disabled as the result of wounds.

I have in my own district a concrete example, a case where this amendment, I think, will do justice to a poor father whose son gave his life on the field of battle in France. A young man, the son of a Methodist minister, on the 11th of January, 1917, before we had entered the war, believing that war was imminent and desiring to get into action as soon as the country got into war, went over to Jefferson Barracks in St. Louis and enlisted in the Regular Artillery. He went over to France with Gen. Pershing in the first consignment of American troops, and he was in active engagements there during the fall months of 1917 and through the winter of 1918, when the great Army was being sent over. He did not avail himself of his privilege of taking out the insurance within the 120 days allowed by the law. Finally, in April, 1918, he was admitted to an officers' training camp and on the 10th of July received a commission as second lieutenant in the Artillery. He received his discharge as a private. He thought then he had a right to take out the insurance and was so advised by those in France who had charge of the administration of the war-risk insurance. He made an application for $10,000 of insurance, payable to his father. The policy was accepted, the premiums were deducted, and finally, before the armistice, this gallant young man, who had gone into the Army of the United States before our entrance into the war, and who had fought all through the war, was killed in action. His father was notified of his death. Papers were sent in order to make proof as to the insurance, and on adjudication the bureau claimed that they could not give him the insurance because he had not made his application for the policy within the 120 days.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will.

Mr. BLACK. I would like to ask the gentleman what he thinks of this kind of a situation? Article 4 provides that a soldier may take this insurance in multiples of $1,000. Now, we provided he should have automatic insurance for $5,000 for 120 days. This same soldier has taken out insurance now in multiples of $1,000 to $2,000. Under an amendment of this kind the beneficiaries of that soldier would only be paid on the $2,000 policy, and those who did not take out any at all would be paid on a $5,000 policy.

Mr. WILLAMS. Yes; there is a great deal of force to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for two minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILLIAMS. As I understand it, the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa simply gives automatic insurance to a very small class. I am informed it embraces only a few hundred men who gave their lives on the field of battle without taking out insurance.

Now, we should remember that we had thousands of men overseas when this law was enacted. They were scattered all over France in different camps. Many of them, perhaps, did not have the law explained to them as we understand it in this country, and did not understand their rights under the law, and for various reasons, and good reasons perhaps, failed to avail themselves of the privilege of taking out this insurance. The overwhelming majority of them took out the insurance. Those who did not were the exceptions. But here and there all over this broad land are the mothers and fathers of boys who went to France and gave their lives without being insured, and I think this great country of ours is willing, and should be willing, to pay in cases of that kind insurance to the father who gave a son for his country on the field of battle.

It is not altogether sentiment, as my good friend from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] charged, but it is right and fair and simply a matter of justice to that class of boys—a very small class comparatively—who for some cause or another died without the benefit of insurance. [Applause.]

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I think every Member of this House has the equally patriotic desire to do the right thing by the American soldier and by the dependents of the American soldier. It is difficult to frame a bill so that its provisions shall be free from the charge that something better could not have been done for the soldier, and that that something better is the thing that the soldier deserves all because of the fact that all that we can do for the soldier and his dependents will never recompense him for the great sacrifice which he has made.

With that in view in connection with legislation of this sort, we ought to use our cool judgment to do what is right, and to do it in a logical way. We have provisions in this war-risk insurance law with reference to compensation to dependents of deceased soldiers, and an appeal has been made to support this amendment because after a period of 120 days has elapsed some soldier abroad has lost his life without taking out insurance. But it must be remembered that if the soldier has dependents they are paid under another feature of this law—the compensation feature. In this discussion we are debating the insurance feature, which is the voluntary act of the soldier in order to give some protection to his beneficiaries; and there are included now among the beneficiaries uncles, aunts, nephews, nieces, brothers-in-law, and sisters-in-law. If you are going to give automatic insurance for the protection of the soldier who has lost his life at the end of a period of 120 days, you may be giving valuable compensation to some one who was really not dependent upon the soldier, so far as actual dependency is concerned.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Not right now. The theory of the law was that you would give the soldier 120 days within which to take out this insurance. Everybody does not take out insurance in civil life or in military life, and the presumption is that at the end of 120 days, if the soldier does not take out insurance, there was no one that he thought was especially needful to be made the beneficiary under such policy.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The gentleman has made the statement that insurance is dependent upon the voluntary action of the soldier. That is true of term insurance, but not automatic insurance. The gentleman went on to state that this automatic insurance might go to beneficiaries only remotely related to him, like uncles and aunts. I want to correct the gentleman, because this section 401 is automatic, and the only beneficiaries are the widow, the mother, and the father. The other persons that the gentleman names come under what is known as term or converted insurance. But we are now discussing only automatic insurance.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The point is the same.

Mr. RAMSEYER. That is true of the boy who died in college from the "flu." That you cover in this section.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The automatic feature of it is made to cover a period of time during which the soldier could not exercise his own volition, because he could not know about the facts.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. If we give the automatic insurance to all these men during the war, suppose a soldier at the beginning of the war took out a $5,000 policy. If we give these men $5,000 under this automatic provision, the Government ought to refund the amount of the premiums to that other man, and, likewise, if he has taken out $10,000, we should refund 50 per cent of the premiums, in order that they would be on a parity.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Certainly. It is the rankest discrimination. But the worst feature of it is that we substitute our judgment for the judgment of all these soldiers who did not act on their own volition within 120 days, and put them all under the automatic feature and give them all insurance.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa close in 12 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that all debate on the pending amendment close in 12 minutes.

Mr. FOCHT. Let me have five minutes on that.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, make it 12 minutes in all and divide it up.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman indicate the persons?

Mr. ESCH. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT], the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT], and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG].

The CHAIRMAN. How is the time to be divided?

Mr. CANNON. I think we had better have five minutes apiece.

Mr. ESCH. Let it be 20 minutes, Mr. Chairman. We want to make progress on this measure.

Mr. CANNON. I think we had better make it 25 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that all debate on the pending amendment close in 20 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Make it 25.

Mr. ESCH. Twenty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. How is the time to be divided?

Mr. ESCH. Have it divided equally.

Mr. FOCHT. I ask for five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I suggest that the gentleman ask for 25 minutes. I have just come in, and I want to "catch on."

Mr. ESCH. Some of us want to get on. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Some of us want to find out about this.

Mr. ESCH. I modify my amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair asks to whom he shall yield. The gentleman from Wisconsin will prefer his request.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa close in 25 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that all debate on the pending amendment close in 25 minutes. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] is recognized.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, in discussing this amendment let us proceed to review briefly the history of the war-risk insurance act.

The first article in the act is the one which contains the definition of terms and then follows the allotment and allowance feature. That is article 2. It provides for allotments and allowances to the soldier's dependents while he is in the Army.

The third article is to take the place of the pension system. For that purpose we made the compensation act, and under that article all soldiers share alike, privates and officers, regardless of rank. If the soldier dies from injuries received or disease contracted while he is in the service, a monthly compensation is paid to his dependents. If he does not die but is injured, the compensation is paid to him during his disability.

It was suggested by the students of this question that we ought to add an article 4, to give each soldier the right to take out additional insurance in multiples of $1,000 each up to $10,000. No soldier, either officer or private, could take out more than that. The theory upon which this voluntary insurance was based was this, that we were taking men out of civil life and drafting them into the Army to fight for the national welfare and safety, and on account of the hazards of the risk they would be unable to procure insurance in private companies, and that the Government ought to insure them at the ordinary American mortality rates and carry the extra war risk at public expense. That was the theory of it. That was the argument made. That was the reason that we adopted article 4. But we said this: We know that a great many of the young men will not find out about this insurance until some time after the law is passed, and we will give them 120 days in which to make application; and if unfortunately within that 120 days the soldier dies, is killed, or becomes permanently disabled in the line of duty we will pay to his widow, if he leaves a widow, $25 a month for 240 months or we will pay to his widow and children $25 a month, or if he leaves no widow and children we will pay to his widowed mother, and if he leaves no widowed mother we will pay this sum to his father. In other words, this $25 per month for 240 months was equivalent to $5,000 insurance and is entirely independent and separate from the compensation provided for in article 3.

Later on we extended that time, and here in this bill we provide that each and every soldier shall have the 120 days regardless of the time of his enlistment or induction into the service. It seems to me that that is equitable and just. But the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa now is to brush aside the 120-day period and give each and every soldier who had not taken out insurance and who died in the line of duty $5,000 automatic insurance. I believe the figures show that something more than 60,000 men died or were killed in the service. I do not know how many had insurance policies or how many did not; but if we want to be logical, if we adopt an amendment of the kind the gentleman has offered, then if we want to do justice to all we ought to give them all $5,000 additional insurance. That is the only way in which you can be just and treat them all equally. We were just when we said to each and every one of these men, "You shall have 120 days after you went into the service in which to take out the insurance and during that time you shall have $5,000 automatic insurance without any charge." But we are not just if we say to one man, "We will give you $5,000 automatic insurance," and say to another man, "We will give to you only what you bought and paid for, even if it is only $1,000." That would penalize the man who took out insurance and reward the man who did not. At least that is the view I take of the matter and will vote against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the committee have, with much liberality, I think, and also with justice, accepted the suggestions that have been made with regard to this bill, and have put it into more perfect form than it was previous to this session of Congress. Now we have incorporated here an amendment providing for a class coming under the head of foster children. I know some Members disputed the incorporation of such an amendment, but I can conceive of nothing more just than that. I had in my own district, in Perry County, a most pathetic case, where a foster mother had received no consideration whatever. It was a simple case of a drunken father, mother dead, and the poorhouse for seven children. Some benevolent ladies came down to the broken and desolate home and said, "It will not do to have these infant children go to the poorhouse." One lady gathered into her arms a boy only a year and a half old and carried him to her home, reared him until he was 18 years old, and then the war broke out. He made a will giving all of his personal effects to her, which will was recorded in the county courthouse in the county in which they resided. On entering the Army he had his life insured in two separate policies of $5,000 each. In each policy was written the foster mother's name, and after her name in brackets was "foster mother," in both instances. He settled with the Government and was entitled to have that money paid to the foster mother. He died at Camp Meade and was taken home and buried on the hillside in the little village where he had been reared. When I undertook to get that insurance for his foster mother we found that the act itself provided for all sorts of stepfathers and stepmothers and relatives, and for everybody except the good soul that was nearer to him than anybody else, but yet his foster mother. Now you have passed an amendment which covers that most beneficently. I am glad you have taken up this other question, because I have had a case coming right under it. Two young men left the farm in Buffalo Valley, Union County, and went down to Bucknell University to receive military training under an officer sent from Washington. They applied time and again to the officer for blanks to make application for their insurance. The officer wrote to Washington and received a reply that they were unable to furnish the blanks. That officer is ready to make affidavit to that effect. While this was going on these two young men contracted pneumonia and died.

Now, as I understand, this provision extends to taking care of them, and if it does that is all just and right, and surely, as has been said, why should it not also extend to those who died on the battle field?

It is not so much a matter as to the measure or degree of what the soldier did as it is now the care and attention of those who are left behind. Those who are dead and gone, for them that is the end of it, so far as we are able to help, but their services have been rendered and on this is predicated the helpfulness we should extend for the suffering and inconvenience and privation of those who are left behind.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is still another class I understand has not been mentioned here. We all know that the world loves a lover, and we hear a great deal about the courtship and of marriage and other ceremonies upon which the whole world is erected into society and civilization and into which it is all interwoven. What about the sweethearts; what about the young man who gallantly leaves his sweetheart with a farewell embrace and warm, loving kiss and goes off to war to perish for the flag? He takes out his insurance but finds he can not bequeath it to his sweetheart and betrothed because she is not a relative. If she was his stepsister, he might give it to her, or if she was a stepbrother or a stepfather or a stepmother who, perhaps, had abused him he might give it to her. But he can not give the money to his sweetheart, although he did leave the intention in the fact that he sent the policy to her and accompanied it with a letter containing the most endearing terms and

Now, in the amendments that are carried in this bill we grant automatic insurance to those who were never regularly inducted into the service and pay the policies if they die before they were regularly taken into the service, which is right. We grant the automatic insurance for 120 days to every soldier and pay the policy if he fails to avail himself of his privilege to take out the insurance within his 120 days. And I think that is proper and right. That takes care of a great many worthy cases.

Now, the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa is a logical sequence of what we have done, and without this amendment this bill is not a logical bill and does not do justice to all classes of those who gave their lives during this war. Let us see. It simply gives the benefit of automatic insurance to that class—and it is a very small class—of boys who did not take out the insurance and yet were killed in battle or were totally disabled as the result of wounds.

I have in my own district a concrete example, a case where this amendment, I think, will do justice to a poor father whose son gave his life on the field of battle in France. A young man, the son of a Methodist minister, on the 11th of January, 1917, before we had entered the war, believing that war was imminent and desiring to get into action as soon as the country got into war, went over to Jefferson Barracks in St. Louis and enlisted in the Regular Artillery. Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will.

Mr. BLACK. I would like to ask the gentleman what he thinks of this kind of a situntion? Article 4 provides that a soldier may take this insurance in multiples of $1,000. Now, we provided he should have automatic insurance for $5,000 for 120 days. This same soldier has taken out insurance now in multiples of $1,000 to $2,000. Under an amendment of this kind the beneficiaries of that soldier would only be paid on the $2,000 policy, and those who did not take out any at all would be paid on a $5,000 policy.

Mr. WILLAMS. Yes; there is a great deal of force to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. If we give the automatic insurance to all these men during the war, suppose a soldier at the beginning of the war took out a $5,000 policy. If we give these men $5,000 under this automatic provision, the Government ought to refund the amount of the premiums to that other man, and, likewise, if he has taken out $10,000, we should refund 50 per cent of the premiums, in order that they would be on a parity.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Certainly. It is the rankest discrimination. But the worst feature of it is that we substitute our judgment for the judgment of all these soldiers who did not act on their own volition within 120 days, and put them all under the automatic feature and give them all insurance.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa close in 12 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that all debate on the pending amendment close in 12 minutes.

Mr. FOCHT. Let me have five minutes on that.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, make it 12 minutes in all and divide it up.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman indicate the persons?

Mr. ESCH. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT], the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT], and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG].

The CHAIRMAN. How is the time to be divided?

Mr. CANNON. I think we had better have five minutes apiece.

Mr. ESCH. Let it be 20 minutes, Mr. Chairman. We want to make progress on this measure.

Mr. CANNON. I think we had better make it 25 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that all debate on the pending amendment close in 20 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Make it 25.

Mr. ESCH. Twenty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. How is the time to be divided?

Mr. ESCH. Have it divided equally.

Mr. FOCHT. I ask for five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I suggest that the gentleman ask for 25 minutes. I have just come in, and I want to "catch on."

Mr. ESCH. Some of us want to get on. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Some of us want to find out about this.

Mr. ESCH. I modify my amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair asks to whom he shall yield. The gentleman from Wisconsin will prefer his request.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa close in 25 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that all debate on the pending amendment close in 25 minutes. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] is recognized.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, in discussing this amendment let us proceed to review briefly the history of the war-risk insurance act.

The first article in the act is the one which contains the definition of terms and then follows the allotment and allowance feature. That is article 2. It provides for allotments and allowances to the soldier's dependents while he is in the Army.

The third article is to take the place of the pension system. For that purpose we made the compensation act, and under that article all soldiers share alike, privates and officers, regardless of rank. If the soldier dies from injuries received or disease contracted while he is in the service, a monthly compensation is paid to his dependents. If he does not die but is injured, the compensation is paid to him during his disability.

It was suggested by the students of this question that we ought to add an article 4, to give each soldier the right to take out additional insurance in multiples of $1,000 each up to $10,000. No soldier, either officer or private, could take out more than that. The theory upon which this voluntary insurance was based was this, that we were taking men out of civil life and drafting them into the Army to fight for the national welfare and safety, and on account of the hazards of the risk they would be unable to procure insurance in private companies, and that the Government ought to insure them at the ordinary American mortality rates and carry the extra war risk at public expense. That was the theory of it. That was the argument made. That was the reason that we adopted article 4. But we said this: We know that a great many of the young men will not find out about this insurance until some time after the law is passed, and we will give them 120 days in which to make application; and if unfortunately within that 120 days the soldier dies, is killed, or becomes permanently disabled in the line of duty we will pay to his widow, if he leaves a widow, $25 a month for 240 months or we will pay to his widow and children $25 a month, or if he leaves no widow and children we will pay to his widowed mother, and if he leaves no widowed mother we will pay this sum to his father. In other words, this $25 per month for 240 months was equivalent to $5,000 insurance and is entirely independent and separate from the compensation provided for in article 3.

Later on we extended that time, and here in this bill we provide that each and every soldier shall have the 120 days regardless of the time of his enlistment or induction into the service. It seems to me that that is equitable and just. But the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa now is to brush aside the 120-day period and give each and every soldier who had not taken out insurance and who died in the line of duty $5,000 automatic insurance. I believe the figures show that something more than 60,000 men died or were killed in the service. I do not know how many had insurance policies or how many did not; but if we want to be logical, if we adopt an amendment of the kind the gentleman has offered, then if we want to do justice to all we ought to give them all $5,000 additional insurance. That is the only way in which you can be just and treat them all equally. We were just when we said to each and every one of these men, "You shall have 120 days after you went into the service in which to take out the insurance and during that time you shall have $5,000 automatic insurance without any charge." But we are not just if we say to one man, "We will give you $5,000 automatic insurance," and say to another man, "We will give to you only what you bought and paid for, even if it is only $1,000." That would penalize the man who took out insurance and reward the man who did not. At least that is the view I take of the matter and will vote against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the committee have, with much liberality, I think, and also with justice, accepted the suggestions that have been made with regard to this bill, and have put it into more perfect form than it was previous to this session of Congress. Now we have incorporated here an amendment providing for a class coming under the head of foster children. I know some Members disputed the incorporation of such an amendment, but I can conceive of nothing more just than that. I had in my own district, in Perry County, a most pathetic case, where a foster mother had received no consideration whatever. It was a simple case of a drunken father, mother dead, and the poorhouse for seven children. Some benevolent ladies came down to the broken and desolate home and said, "It will not do to have these infant children go to the poorhouse." One lady gathered into her arms a boy only a year and a half old and carried him to her home, reared him until he was 18 years old, and then the war broke out. He made a will giving all of his personal effects to her, which will was recorded in the county courthouse in the county in which they resided. On entering the Army he had his life insured in two separate policies of $5,000 each. In each policy was written the foster mother's name, and after her name in brackets was "foster mother," in both instances. He settled with the Government and was entitled to have that money paid to the foster mother. He died at Camp Meade and was taken home and buried on the hillside in the little village where he had been reared. When I undertook to get that insurance for his foster mother we found that the act itself provided for all sorts of stepfathers and stepmothers and relatives, and for everybody except the good soul that was nearer to him than anybody else, but yet his foster mother. Now you have passed an amendment which covers that most beneficently. I am glad you have taken up this other question, because I have had a case coming right under it. Two young men left the farm in Buffalo Valley, Union County, and went down to Bucknell University to receive military training under an officer sent from Washington. They applied time and again to the officer for blanks to make application for their insurance. The officer wrote to Washington and received a reply that they were unable to furnish the blanks. That officer is ready to make affidavit to that effect. While this was going on these two young men contracted pneumonia and died.

Now, as I understand, this provision extends to taking care of them, and if it does that is all just and right, and surely, as has been said, why should it not also extend to those who died on the battle field?

It is not so much a matter as to the measure or degree of what the soldier did as it is now the care and attention of those who are left behind. Those who are dead and gone, for them that is the end of it, so far as we are able to help, but their services have been rendered and on this is predicated the helpfulness we should extend for the suffering and inconvenience and privation of those who are left behind.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is still another class I understand has not been mentioned here. We all know that the world loves a lover, and we hear a great deal about the courtship and of marriage and other ceremonies upon which the whole world is erected into society and civilization and into which it is all interwoven. What about the sweethearts; what about the young man who gallantly leaves his sweetheart with a farewell embrace and warm, loving kiss and goes off to war to perish for the flag? He takes out his insurance but finds he can not bequeath it to his sweetheart and betrothed because she is not a relative. If she was his stepsister, he might give it to her, or if she was a stepbrother or a stepfather or a stepmother who, perhaps, had abused him he might give it to her. But he can not give the money to his sweetheart, although he did leave the intention in the fact that he sent the policy to her and accompanied it with a letter containing the most endearing terms and wanted her to have the money. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope that the committee will respond to the call of the gallant soldier who wanted his sweetheart back home to have this legacy from him and later permit the incorporation of an amendment to that effect. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I only wanted to ask a couple of questions, but as I was required to take time I will take it now. A large part of this trouble comes from the way in which the act was drawn outside of the House and shoved through the House without anybody being allowed to put in any changes or amendments that ought to have been put into it. It is camouflaged by the use of new terms all the way through. What is known in the act as compensation is in reality pension. There is no sense in calling it compensation for you can not compensate a man who is killed in battle. We ought to have known that this would be the result. We ought to have told those sitting in the gallery, we ought to have told Judge Mack to get out of there and we would pass the bill ourselves. I foretold this exact trouble, exactly what would happen, and what is going to happen further on. Pensions are one thing and insurance is another. Here is a widow who is getting $87.50 a month—$30 compensation plus $57.50 insurance—and another only getting $30 or $35, according to the number of children she has, and by and by the people are going to ask why it is, why the distinction, why one of the widows, probably the more needy, should suffer because her husband did not have the foresight or the wisdom, or the decent regard for her welfare, to take out insurance.

Are you going to make this distinction always? Why not give insurance to everybody and make it practically a pension, as it would be if the amendment proposed is passed. It was perfectly evident that this sort of an argument was going to be made—that you ought to give everybody automatic insurance; that is to say, a pension without regard to whether they ever took out insurance or paid any premium. The insurance part of the act was questionable, but now that it is the law we ought to stand by it and we ought not to cover in those who did not take out insurance, if they had opportunity.

Here is a question I want to ask the gentleman from Texas, if I may: I have known several cases, one case in particular, where the young man makes an affidavit that he applied for insurance within the 120 days. He was told that his papers were not with the company, but they would have them in a few days. He applied again and again within the 120 days, and every time was put off for some apparently trivial reason, until finally he was injured, and the officer told him he would date the policy back, but he did not, and when it went in for final adjudication it was thrown out for not being applied for within the 120 days. Now, that man applied for insurance, and whether the application was taken or not, it seems to me he ought to have it.

Mr. RAYBURN. I have no controversy with the gentleman about that.

Mr. PLATT. Is there anything in the bill that would cover cases like that?

Mr. RAYBURN. Wherever there is a record that a man applied for insurance the bureau will take such case.

Mr. PLATT. If the record means that he made out the final application——

Mr. RAYBURN. No; it is not that a man has to make out the final papers, but if his initial papers were within the 120 days the bureau will take all such cases in.

Mr. PLATT. If that is the case, that is all I want to know.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, during the time that we were enlisting these boys into the service, and when we were going to the courthouses, bidding them good-bye and telling them that we would take care of the folks left behind, and when we made our speeches for Liberty bonds, one of the propositions that we laid down was that money was the cheapest thing in the world and that service was the greatest thing in the world. Now, in the American Congress, when we are considering what we shall do for these boys and their loved ones, it seems that we should remember that pledge. That we should keep faith with the boys now buried in France, and should still say that our money is the cheapest thing in the world compared to their service. I want my vote to-day to take care of the loved ones that are at home now; I want to keep faith with the pledge that I made to the boy who did not come back. I hope that this amendment will be agreed to. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I just came into the House, being called out necessarily on official duty, and if I understand this matter, where the soldier dies, he gets compensation, or rather his dependent relatives get compensation. Am I right about that?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes; irrespective of insurance.

Mr. CANNON. Irrespective of insurance—and liberal compensation. If I recollect right, the widow gets $25. Under this bill it is said that she may get $80 a month. The dependent children are cared for and the dependent father is cared for. That, of course, is all from compensation. As to insurance, if I understand it right, there was a wonderful campaign conducted in all the camps for insurance. Many, it is said, were practically forced to take it out. Those who did insure and allowed their policies to lapse, do not get their money back. Their dependent relatives do not get the insurance, but this bill gives to the dependents of a dead soldier ample, unheard of appropriation, for their support, and the amendment proposes in addition to that, as I understand it, to give additional benefits to the beneficiaries of a certain class of soldiers that did not insure under the law.

Mr. SNYDER. Whether they are dependent or not.

Mr. CANNON. My friend says whether they are dependent or not.

Mr. RAMSEYER. They do not get compensation.

Mr. CANNON. Not compensation unless they are dependent, but they get insurance if the soldier was insured. This is insurance added to compensation for the dependents of the dead soldier. As I understand it, already there has been adjusted about $12,000,000,000 of insurance to the beneficiary, under the terms of the policies.

Now, then, we will take the case of a man who died. Let us say that he was a son of a preacher, with a father and mother living. If they are dependent, they are cared for, and cared for a great deal better than the average preacher can care for them with his salary. Who pays all of this? The survivors of the war and the citizenship generally. It is to be paid for in the coming 20 years. I think I have quite as much sympathy for the soldier as the average man, but we can not make a law general in its application that will not do something short of justice in some particular case. The people of the United States have pretty heavy loads to carry. The survivors of millions of people—soldiers and civilians—have got to help carry the load. Let us not lose our heads because somebody cites a case where there is a hardship, and when we come down to brass tacks there is no hardship in denying this insurance that was never taken, for the dead soldier's dependents are cared for as never any country cared for dependents of dead soldiers before. [Applause.]

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I should like to have the attention of the committee, and especially the attention of my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. Now, by my amendment I have tried to carry out nothing more or less than the committee in its report says that they are going to do. On the top of page 9 they say:

> Section 12 amends the automatic insurance provisions in section 401 of the act by extending the automatic insurance provisions so as to cover all men (except those who absolutely refuse to apply for insurance) who were finally accepted for service and were in service between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918.

Now, then, by striking out the 120 days, which I did out of the section, the section is, that any person in the service between those two dates who died shall be entitled to the benefit of automatic insurance unless he refuses or has refused to apply for insurance. Now, here are these boys going to camp, but the proposition is put up to them, "You can have insurance." And they refuse. That would not come under the provisions of this amendment.

Mr. BEE. Would not a failure be a refusal?

Mr. RAMSEYER. It is proposed to cover men who did not have the opportunity. The case I cited and cases which have come to me were cases of men who went to France early in the war and were shifted from one post to the other post for duty over there, and so far as the records of the War Department show those men never had an opportunity to take out insurance, and neither the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] nor any member of the committee nor any Member of the House here would say that a fellow who had gone to France in the early part of 1917 and stayed there during all the fighting and was killed upon the battle field who did not have the opportunity to take out insurance should be barred from having automatic insurance. If they refused, the records of the War Department will show it. But if there is no record there, or any evidence that it was ever presented to him, I think that that matter ought to be straightened out here in the bill. The only thing I am contending for is for that class of men. So far as I know, or anybody who has been able to tell me knows, this amendment will only benefit those men who had no opportunity to apply for insurance. But the section protects the Government. The section says unless he refuses or has refused to apply for insurance. Now, if anybody has refused to apply for insurance, refused by positive act on his part, this is not going to extend automatic insurance to such persons, but the persons as in the cases I cited, who went over to France in the early part of the war and died without insurance because of no fault of theirs, should be given the benefits of automatic insurance.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MACCRATE. I ask that the time of the gentleman be extended one minute to answer a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time has been fixed by the committee. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman——

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, so much discussion has been had since the amendment was first read, can we have it read again for information?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the Chair was in doubt.

On a division (demanded by Mr. ZIHLMAN) there were—ayes 48, noes 50.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee again divided; and the tellers [Mr. RAMSEYER and Mr. SWEET] reported that there were—ayes 49, noes 64.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, at the end of line 11, add the following: Provided further, That each officer and enlisted man attached to the United States ship Cyclops on the 12th day of March, 1918, and every officer and enlisted man who on said date was a passenger on said vessel shall be deemed to have been granted insurance in the full amount permitted under the war-risk insurance act, unless from the records of the Navy Department or the War Risk Insurance Bureau it appears that he has applied for insurance in a less sum.

Mr. ESCH. I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that this is subject to a point of order, but I would like to explain to the committee the necessity for this amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the defeat of the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, it seems to me, renders it all the more necessary that this provision should be adopted. Under the automatic-insurance feature, as it is written in this bill, all men have 120 days after entering the service in which to take out insurance. The greatest mystery of this war perhaps is the loss of the Cyclops. That vessel left Norfolk, Va., on January 8, 1918, and was last heard from at a port in the West Indies on March 4, 1918, and was officially declared lost by the Navy Department on June 14, 1918. I have had the cases of two men who were assigned to that vessel, and we have not been able to find any record from that ship regarding those men. I am informed that the last records from that ship are of date of September 30, 1917, prior to the passage of the war-risk insurance act.

There were on board that vessel on March 4, the last date of which we have any record, 301 men—221 of the crew, enlisted men, and 64 passengers, officers and men, who were on their way to the United States; 14 officers of the ship, and 2 marines. The departments have the records of 77 of these men who made applications for insurance. These were men who had been assigned to this ship at some time prior to the 4th day of March and who had prior to that time been attached to other vessels. There is no record of the rest of these men anywhere. The ship was lost; the records are gone, and therefore no one has authority now to honor applications for payment of insurance.

As I interpret the bill reported by the committee, men who enlisted and were on that ship—unless there is some record somewhere that within 120 days of their enlistment they applied for insurance—are not protected either in automatic insurance or any other insurance. It seems to me that under these peculiar circumstances it is the duty of the Government to assume that these men did apply for the full amount of insurance unless there is some record in the Navy Department or the Bureau of War Risk Insurance to the contrary. And that is the purpose of this amendment.

I hope that the committee will not consider this a foolish amendment. It is offered to meet actual cases that have come to my attention, and, as I say, there are only 77 of these men concerning whom records can be found. And what are you going to do about the rest of them?

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Is compensation allotted to the families of these men under the law?

Mr. IGOE. Under the law the compensation would be allowed. But this is the insurance feature.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. IGOE. I will.

Mr. SNELL. Do I understand they have found applications from a certain number of these men?

Mr. IGOE. From 77 of the men.

Mr. SNELL. Who has these applications?

Mr. IGOE. The Bureau of War Risk Insurance has these applications. Those were men who were assigned to the Cyclops from other ships. As to the records of the Cyclops itself and of the men attached to the vessel all the time, I am informed by the Comptroller of the Treasury, who has asked the War Risk Bureau and Navy Departments, that there are no records available after September 30, 1917. I will read the Comptroller's statement:

I am advised by the Auditor for the Navy Department that no accounts of the disbursing officer of the Cyclops have been received for any period subsequent to September 30, 1917, which date is prior to the enactment of the War Risk Insurance law.

The accounts in the auditor's office would therefore give no information upon the subject of insurance.

Mr. SNELL. What is the date on which the ship went down?

Mr. IGOE. The last record we have of the ship is on March 4, 1918, when it sailed from some port in the West Indies. It left Norfolk on that trip to South America on January 8, 1918.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. IGOE. May I have just one minute more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks for one minute more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. EAGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. I will.

Mr. EAGAN. Is there no record to show any checkage of pay?

Mr. IGOE. No. The applications of war-risk insurance might be shown by checkage for pay or by applications themselves, but there is no record of the pay accounts of that ship from a period prior to the passage of the war-risk insurance act, and there are no records in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance or the Navy Department of applications of any but 77 men, and those men were not members of the original crew of this ship, but were transferred from other ships.

Mr. EAGAN. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. IGOE. Yes.

Mr. EAGAN. There is no record of the receipt of so-called nonapplications?

Mr. IGOE. No. And the amendment provides that if there is a record of these men having applied in a less sum, of course, this does not apply.

I feel, gentlemen, that something must be done. Of course, it could be done by a special bill, but here we are making provisions for the payment of insurance in deserving cases, and I think that where there are nearly 300 cases of the same kind it might well be done in such a bill as this.

Mr. PURNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. Yes.

Mr. PURNELL. Does the time covered by the date when she last sailed and the date on which she was officially declared lost fall within the 120 days?

Mr. IGOE. Well, as I understand the proposition now, a man is covered by the automatic insurance under this bill as reported for 120 days after his enlistment. But these men were all enlisted certainly prior to January 8, 1918, when they left Norfolk, and so June 14 is more than 120 days. The ship was declared lost as of June 14, 1918.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, when I reserved the point of order I was under the impression that the Cyclops was a merchant ship. In reading the testimony I find she was a naval collier, and hence I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws the reservation of the point of order.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment again.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by inserting "$5,000" in place of "$10,000" where it appears in the amendment, and instead of saying "full amount," I move that "$5,000" be inserted. It seems to me we are taking a good deal on an assumption here, and I think $5,000 would be adequate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAYBURN: Strike out the words "full amount" and insert in lieu thereof the sum of "$5,000."

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. IGOE. Has it not been the experience of the department that the average policy of insurance applied for was in excess of $8,000?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. IGOE. Does not the gentleman think that in a case of this sort, where all the records are lost, we might reasonably assume that at least the average obtained, and that it is not taking a great deal on presumption to say that they may have applied for the full amount?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; but there was quite a percentage of men in the Army and in the Navy who did not apply at all, and I think the average would probably be below the figure named.

Mr. IGOE. It seems to me it would be better to take care of them.

Mr. RAYBURN. I think if the committee is willing to accept the gentleman's amendment, he ought to be willing to concede a little.

Mr. IGOE. I have no knowledge that the committee has accepted it.

Mr. RAYBURN. They are not fighting it.

Mr. BRAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BRAND. Who will be the beneficiaries of this?

Mr. RAYBURN. I presume it would be the next of kin, mother or father.

Mr. BRAND. Should not some provision be made?

Mr. RAYBURN. I think not.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. The dependents of these men, if they have dependents, will get compensation?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. If they leave widows, the widows will get $25 and so much additional for each child, and if they have dependent parents the dependent parents will get compensation. This insurance is in addition to that, going substantially to the same parties that will get the compensation.

Mr. RAYBURN. Entirely.

Mr. CANNON. And all the balance of the relatives and friends of the 4,000,000 people who were in this war and those who are not born will have to pay this amount, and, as taxation goes upon the consumer, that means everybody.

Mr. RAYBURN. I have sought ever since the time this came up in the beginning to try to stop somewhere. It seems as if some of our brethren do not agree to that policy.

Mr. PURNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. PURNELL. If this amendment is adopted the House ought to straighten it out. The fact is that we lost another vessel under circumstances somewhat similar to those of the Cyclops. We transported 2,000,000 troops to France and lost only a little over 200 men. That was on a returning transport. Perhaps if the facts were inquired into we would find that that ship went down under like circumstances, and the men on board that vessel ought to be given like treatment.

Mr. RAYBURN. It was a transport carrying soldiers. I think that very few of our men went over within 120 days of the time they were taken into the service.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. McCULLOCH and Mr. DOMINICK rose.

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McCULLOCH] is recognized.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, I send an amendment to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McCULLOCH and Mr. DOWELL: Page 12, line 11, after the word "regulation," add the following as a new section:

"SEC. 12½. The term insurance in force on the life of every commissioned officer and enlisted man or member of the Army or Navy Nurse Corps (female) on the date he leaves the active military or naval service shall continue in force for two years after the end of the calendar month in which he is separated from the active service, without the payment of premium by the insured: Provided, however, That in the case of the persons who are or have been so separated from the service and who have paid their premiums after being so separated the period of two years herein provided shall begin to run on the first day of the calendar month succeeding the passage of this act or on the first day of the calendar month succeeding the month for which the premium was last paid, whichever date was the earlier: Provided further, That every person who converts or has converted his term insurance before the expiration of the two-year period herein provided shall, during such period or the remainder thereof, be entitled to a commutation credit on his term or converted insurance equivalent to what the monthly premium on his term insurance would have been during the said two-year period if he had not converted it and if this amendatory act had not been passed."

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DOMINICK. I should like to ask if this amendment is offered as a new section what is the parliamentary status of amendments that are sought to be offered to the original section?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that the original section can be amended as long as any gentleman desires to offer an amendment to it.

Mr. SNELL. I make a point of order on this amendment.

Mr. RAYBURN. Is it not the rule that amendments to the section under consideration have precedence over amendments offered as new sections?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DOMINICK] wants to offer an amendment to the section under consideration. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McCULLOCH] wants to offer a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina will not be precluded from offering his amendment by the offering of an amendment as a new section. The amendment offered as a new section occupies the same position as an amendment to the section.

Mr. GARRETT. It can not occupy the status of an amendment to the section. That would not be orderly procedure at all. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McCULLOCH] will have his right to offer an amendment as a new section when the time comes, but certainly we must perfect one section before passing to another.

The CHAIRMAN. We can not pass over this section until every Member has had an opportunity to amend it.

Mr. GARRETT. I make the point of order that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DOMINICK] is entitled to recognition to offer an amendment to the section before the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McCULLOCH] is in order to offer his amendment as a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. That was not the parliamentary inquiry of the gentleman.

Mr. RAYBURN. That was the parliamentary inquiry I put to the Chair, if an amendment to perfect the text of the section we were considering did not take precedence over an amendment offered as a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the inquiry to be as to whether the gentleman would lose his right to offer an amendment.

Mr. DOMINICK. I wanted to know what my status was, whether I could be recognized at this time to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will not lose his rights.

Mr. DOMINICK. Am I not entitled to recognition at this time to offer an amendment to this section?

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment to perfect the text of the section would take precedence over an amendment offered as a new section.

Mr. DOMINICK. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. DOMINICK: Page 11, lines 13 and 14, strike out the words "unless he refuses or has refused to apply for insurance."

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. Chairman, under the act approved October 6, 1917, all men who entered the service were insured for 120 days, which period of automatic insurance expired on the 12th day of February, 1918. Under the act approved February 12, 1918, the time for filing applications for insurance was extended for 60 days, but it was specifically provided that the automatic insurance should not be extended beyond the 12th of February, 1918.

The next step in the war-risk insurance legislation was the act of June 25, 1918, in which the section we now have under consideration was amended by inserting the word "father," so that a father could be a beneficiary under this automatic insurance. Otherwise this section was not changed, but it was set out in the act of June 25, 1918, as amended, and to a great many people it seemed to be a reenactment of the automatic insurance, so much so, Mr. Chairman, that the impression was general that the automatic insurance had been extended so as to insure automatically every soldier who went into the service for 120 days after he went in. That belief was general among the Members of this House with whom I have talked. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] a few moments ago stated that belief was general among the Army officers and those who were taking applications for insurance.

Now, I introduced House joint resolution 95, along the same line, and I am glad to know that the committee has practically placed my resolution in the act. But they have gone a little too far by placing in the act a provision that a man should not be entitled to automatic insurance if he refuses and has refused to take out insurance. I understand from the hearings when the bill was first approved by the Treasury Department these words were not in it, but were put in it afterwards. Why were they put there? They say that they put them there on account of the fact that every man in the Army was asked to state in the application whether or not he wanted insurance, and they had what they called a "none" application, which contained the inquiry whether or not the man wanted insurance.

They got that information from special regulations 72 of the War Department, section 82; and what is that regulation? What is that provision of the War Department? I will read from special regulations 72, paragraph 82, subsection (b):

(b) If insurance is not desired, a single copy only of the form will be executed and will contain the following notation in the space on form provided for the name of the beneficiary, address, etc.

Here is what is given in the application, here is what they call a refusal to take insurance:

The provisions of the act of Congress approved October 6, 1917, so far as it relates to insurance, have been explained to me, and I understand my rights and privileges under this act, but I do not desire to apply for any war-risk insurance.

That is what you sign, that is what will be construed as a refusal to take insurance by the War Risk Bureau.

Is that a refusal? A boy goes into the Army or into the Navy. The first few days he is there he is told by the officers:

You can take out insurance if you want to, but you are not obliged to take it out now. Under the law you have 120 days in which you may apply for insurance, and during that 120 days you are automatically insured by the Government in the sum of $5,000. It might be well for you to wait a while until you see where you are and decide whether you want $1,000, $3,000, $5,000, or $10,000 insurance; wait until you see how much money you need in the Army, wait until you see how much money you have left after your allotment is paid to your wife and family, wait until you see how much you can spare, whether $5 or $10 a month for insurance.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I know and I have heard of cases where these very things were told young men who went into the Army and in all probability they signed one of these "none" applications, which might be, and will be, construed as a refusal to take any insurance.

So far as I know I have no concrete case in my district, and I know of no concrete case that my amendment would cover. I know of two young boys in my district that went into the Navy. A month after they enlisted at Charleston they were drowned off the coast of Florida when the United States ship Montauk foundered off that coast. They had no insurance; had taken out none. I know that the bill, even as it stands now, covers these two boys, and their people will be entitled to their insurance. But I do not believe that these words "refused or had refused to take insurance" have any place in this bill. I am satisfied there are cases that will be construed as refusals on the part of men to take out insurance, when in all probability he signed that kind of a blank, waiting to find out what his circumstances might be and how much insurance he really could take and carry. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, this automatic insurance was made for the purpose of covering a period of time the duration of which we had determined, in order that the soldier or sailor or marine might know his rights. It was not for the purpose of giving him automatic insurance for a certain period of time. The distinct purpose of it was simply that he might know of his rights and not be deprived of his rights because of lack of knowledge; hence this provision that if he actually refused he should not come within this class. It is a very wise provision, because it simply carries out the desire to provide this insurance for those soldiers who voluntarily desired insurance, because when the soldier would read the application he would make up his mind then whether the situation was such, whether his dependents were in such circumstances, as to make it necessary for him to take out the insurance. If he acted thereon and stated that he did not desire to take out insurance, it seems to me the whole purpose of the provision has been accomplished.

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the gentleman this question: Supposing the person who was authorized to take the application had given certain instructions and information to the soldier or the sailor which he believed to be true but which under the law were not true, does the gentleman think the soldier or the sailor or his beneficiaries should be punished on account of the misinformation that was given to that soldier or sailor by the person authorized to take the application?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The difficulty with the gentleman's proposition is that his amendment does not go to those particular cases; it goes to all cases. In such a case as the gentleman cites perchance some special legislation ought to be enacted, but you can not frame general legislation along logical lines and then bring in amendments because some officer has misrepresented the facts to some soldier.

Mr. DOMINICK. I am basing my statement upon the construction that can be placed upon the order the War Department has set out in special regulations No. 72.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Does the gentleman himself know of many instances where the facts have been misrepresented?

Mr. DOMINICK. I have heard of instances where the people believed the extension of automatic insurance has been general. Practically all of them believed that automatic insurance was still in force.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Is the source of the gentleman's information of such nature as to lead him to believe that is true?

Mr. DOMINICK. Yes; it is.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Could the gentleman give us an idea of the extent of it?

Mr. DOMINICK. I have heard soldiers and sailors speak of it, and I have heard parents speak of it, and I presume the gentleman heard the statement of the gentleman from Texas during the course of the debate, that a great many of the Army officers believed that fact.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think it would be difficult to undertake to amend these laws so as to cover possible cases where some soldier had had the facts misrepresented to him.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The questions asked by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DOMINICK] cover pretty well the matter that I had in mind, but the question that I have in mind now is whether or not it is the intention to deprive anybody of the automatic insurance that it was generally understood should apply to every soldier, sailor, and marine who enlisted—that that insurance should be automatic for a period of 120 days?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Not unless he specifically refused.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It was a busy time when these boys were enlisting, and I venture that not one in ten thousand read those conditions in the enlistment papers or the papers that they signed, but they understood, and their parents understood, that there was automatic insurance for a period of 120 days. Is not that the understanding of the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. There is automatic insurance which covered the period, but there was an exception to that, and that is where the person found it out and made a statement as he did in these cases that he had had that explained to him and notwithstanding all of that he did not want to take out the insurance.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I have heard of a number of cases where the parents have generally believed that they were beneficiaries of automatic insurance, and they had been unable to find any such insurance policies anywhere for their benefit. The soldier signed away a chance of doing anything for them and they have not any insurance.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. If that was within the 120 days——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Within the 120 days.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Unless they can show that he refused to take this, why they are entitled to the provisions of automatic insurance.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. How could it be shown that the soldier refused to take insurance on a blank statement that it is presumed that he never read?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I do not know any stronger proof than the signed statement of the soldier himself that his officer, either of the Army or the Navy or the marines, performed the duty which he is required to do under the regulations and explained the law to him. I do not know any stronger proof than that.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am now speaking of the practicability of the soldier having notice at the time of the contents of the paper.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. REAVIS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. My contention is under the circumstances of enlistment the boy was naturally excited, as the country was, and he did not read the conditions in fine print. He did not know at the time he signed those papers whether or not he was accepting insurance or rejecting insurance. That is the natural sequence that would follow the excitement of the moment when that boy was enrolled as a soldier. Is not that true?

Mr. DOWELL. And is it not true also the officers in many cases did not know sufficiently about the insurance?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Of course it is true, and it is true that no officer could have read and explained the conditions in the thousands of papers of boys who signed every day in his presence. It was practically impossible for the soldier to have had explained to him the provisions of the paper that he was signing.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Just a moment. I can not follow the gentleman's logic that the fact that a soldier did sign the blank, saying that he had had it explained to him and did not want it—I can not follow the gentleman's logic that he deduces from that that the soldier did want the insurance.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I do.

Mr. REAVIS. As I understand it, under this 120 days' automatic insurance a soldier received the benefit of that insurance without application?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. Unless under regulations of the War Department he declines it?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. Now, the gentleman from South Carolina read the language of the War Department, which they construed according to his statement as declining this insurance, and it reads as follows:

> So far as it relates to insurance it has been explained to me, and I understand my rights and privileges under this act, but I do not desire to apply for any war-risk insurance.

But he was entitled to 120 days, without application, was he not?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Except when he refused to take it.

Mr. REAVIS. But they construe it according to this statement when he says, "I do not desire to apply for insurance," as a refusal to take insurance for which he did not need to apply.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. He is required to apply.

Mr. REAVIS. Is not the 120 days' automatic insurance without application?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. There was not at that time. The automatic insurance related back.

Mr. REAVIS. Related back. Now, let me understand the gentleman. The impression being—I know it was my impression and it has been my impression up to this moment—that there was 120 days of automatic insurance without application, without any affirmative action upon the part of the soldier himself, does not the gentleman believe that if that impression was broadcast through the Army that that soldier ought to be given the privilege of the 120 days, even though he signed that statement, as a matter of fairness to the soldier?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I do not think so.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield for a question?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana if he thinks that a mere statement of assent to that inquiry ought to be considered as a refusal to accept insurance? Certainly it ought not to be considered as a refusal to accept insurance except at the time it was presented, and if the soldier had reason to believe that thereafter he might make an application which would be accepted it ought not to be considered against him that that was a final refusal.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Of course, that is a matter of construction. I did not mean to say that this law provided that the answer made to this statement would be a refusal. But my understanding is that it has been so construed in some cases.

Mr. TOWNER. I want to call the gentleman's attention further to this fact. It seems as if that question was formulated by some shrewd lawyer who was endeavoring to put this man on record, so that he could not possibly ever afterward apply for insurance, because it says:

> I have had read to me the statements regarding this insurance.

The same kind of conditions are put in every cutthroat application for a policy of insurance in the land. I think this Congress, with regard to this generous provision, that ought to be generous and ought to be interpreted as generous, ought never to allow any such provision to cut anybody off from insurance.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired. All time has expired on this amendment.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire the attention of the chairman or the subchairman. As I understand, at one time there were 120 days during which automatic insurance was granted to all enlisted men?

Mr. SWEET. Yes, sir; between October 15, 1917, and February 12, 1918. That is under the old law.

Mr. RUCKER. This bill undertakes to extend the time?

Mr. SWEET. This extends it for 120 days after the enlistment of the man.

Mr. RUCKER. After the enlistment of a soldier?

Mr. SWEET. The soldier.

Mr. RUCKER. Now, the language sought to be stricken out by the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DOMINICK] consists of the words "unless he refuses or has refused to apply for insurance." So that if this language remains in the bill, that paper to which reference has been made, and in which the soldier is made to state that the proper officer has read the order of the War Department and explained to him his rights and he does not desire insurance, will be construed by the department as a refusal to accept insurance?

Mr. SWEET. It may not be necessarily construed as a refusal, but it will be evidence of some action by the soldier.

Mr. RUCKER. Well, would it not be held to be conclusive evidence of the soldier's refusal to accept insurance? I think it would.

Mr. SWEET. Let me say in this connection that, as I understand it from the hearings we have had, this was an order of the War Department, sent out in connection with the insurance question, and it was submitted to each soldier for him to either make application for insurance or sign a "no" or "none," as it was called in the Army.

Mr. RUCKER. These papers were sent out and called to the attention of the soldiers during the 120-day period?

Mr. SWEET. Yes; evidently.

Mr. RUCKER. Sent out at a time when nobody in the War Department had any authority whatever to put a soldier on trial and require him to determine whether he would subsequently make formal application for insurance or not. They were sent out during the time the Congress, in its judgment, had extended a generous benefit to him by giving him automatic insurance. And as the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] each have suggested, the soldier had a perfect right to believe, and no doubt did believe, that during the whole period of 120 days, which had not yet expired, he was insured. If you increase the extension of 120 days by this bill by making the time run from the date of enlistment, we ought to protect the rights of soldiers who signed such paper during the period from October 15, 1917, to February 12, 1918, as well as the rights of those who did not sign that paper.

Mr. SWEET. This question of insurance was put up to all the men in the service, and this question——

Mr. RUCKER. And at the very time it was put up to them the Congress of the United States, by solemn enactment, had said, "You have insurance."

Mr. SWEET. As I view it, even though he signed this statement, he still had the opportunity to apply for insurance during the 120 days.

Mr. RUCKER. True, he had opportunity to apply for insurance any time during the 120 days, and many more of them, no doubt, would have done so but for an erroneous idea which prevailed among the enlisted men and among the officers as well. But the automatic insurance ceased at the end of the 120 days.

Mr. SWEET. Of course this period was extended.

Mr. RUCKER. I realize that.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. REAVIS. The soldier did not have any too much money after he got through with it.

Mr. RUCKER. I presume not.

Mr. REAVIS. And if he thought he had insurance before he made application, he would not apply for it until the 120-day period was up?

Mr. RUCKER. I have no doubt you are absolutely correct, and that hundreds of boys acted upon that theory.

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. RUCKER. Yes; I am glad to yield.

Mr. DOMINICK. I want to read a paragraph of the hearings as to how the War Risk Insurance Bureau construes a refusal. It accords with my idea. You will find it on page 17 of part 1. Mr. Macfarlane says:

> The class as drafted excludes all men who refused insurance. In other words, under War Department Regulations 72, paragraph 82, a man is excluded if the insurance officer approaches him and says, "Do you want insurance?" and the man says, "No; I do not want insurance; I do not believe in the War Risk Insurance Bureau." If he says that, he must sign a statement or apply for what we call "none" insurance. That is filed with the bureau, and that man will not get this automatic insurance.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Missouri be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOMINICK. What they construe as "none" insurance is explained by the statement referred to in War Department Special Regulations 72, paragraph 82, which I read.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. With pleasure.

Mr. BRIGGS. Is it not a fact that under this provision, unless he refuses or has refused to apply for insurance, you put the burden of proof upon the heirs or disabled soldier to prove that he has not done so, with all the tremendous difficulties that surround their being able to establish that fact?

Mr. SWEET. If they are unable to show anything of that kind, he gets insurance.

Mr. BRIGGS. But it says if he refuses or has refused to apply for insurance——

Mr. SWEET. If they can not find anything establishing a refusal, then he gets the insurance.

Mr. BRIGGS. But this shows that the burden is on the soldier to prove that.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I would like myself to use the remainder of my time.

Mr. BRIGGS. Is not the burden on the man to make out his insurance, and does not that tend to deprive the man of the full benefit of the automatic insurance?

Mr. RUCKER. The suggestion of the gentleman may be true. Frankly I have some doubt as to the correctness of the suggestion, but the language sought to be stricken out injects a difficulty and a doubt that we ought not to leave in the bill or write into law.

Let me say to the distinguished gentleman who has charge of the bill [Mr. SWEET] and to the members of the committee who are so ably supporting him that, in my judgment, this language ought to be stricken out, and every word that pertains in any manner, shape, or form to those gratuitously sent out invitations to soldiers to sign a paper putting themselves on record as to whether they want insurance or not should be eliminated. It is easy to understand how intelligent men, even under more favorable surroundings, might be misled by such proceeding. The men were advised by officers of the Army that automatic insurance was in force, and I believe they ought to have the benefit of the generous provisions which Congress has heretofore given them, and which this language, in my judgment, would take from them. I earnestly think the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. SWEET. In connection with the signing of this statement I believe the evidence shows that they even went to hospitals and presented the matter to the soldiers there, and sometimes the patients were too sick to sign, and yet they signified their willingness to take insurance and did obtain insurance.

Mr. RUCKER. Well, the gentleman knows, as we all know, that different men look at these questions from different angles. I know gentlemen, men who are in the military service, who did not apply within this time, but who intended to apply before their right lapsed.

Mr. SWEET. And the mere fact that we had in the neighborhood of $39,000,000,000 insurance at the close of the war would tend to show that practically all these men signed an application for insurance, and instead of endeavoring to prevent them, as has been suggested, these officers and men were endeavoring to get them to sign the application.

Mr. RUCKER. I believe that is true. I believe the officers tried to get the men to take insurance, but I believe the officers themselves were laboring under a mistake as to the law, and that they perhaps misled the soldiers, although unintentionally, of course. I do not put any odium upon them at all, and do not wish to be understood as criticizing any charged with duty in this behalf.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has again expired.

By unanimous consent, Mr. HICKS was given leave to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD.

By unanimous consent, Mr. RAMSEYER was given leave to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD.

By unanimous consent, Mr. SMITH of Michigan was given leave to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD.

By unanimous consent, Mr. BRIGGS was given leave to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD.

By unanimous consent, Mr. EAGAN was given leave to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD.

By unanimous consent, Mr. DOMINICK was given leave to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment which is pending be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that all debate on the pending amendment be now closed.

Mr. PARRISH. I should like five minutes.

Mr. ESCH. I modify my motion and move that all debate on the pending amendment close in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committe, I have been constantly in attendance in the House during the consideration of this bill and wish to take this opportunity of congratulating most heartily the members of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee on its splendid work in the preparation of this bill. Unquestionably, it has caught the vision of generous statesmanship and has given us an opportunity to vote on a bill which provides liberally and unselfishly for the families and dependents of the soldiers and sailors who laid down their lives in the service of our country, and also gives fair compensation to those who were injured and who must carry through life the wounds they received in their patriotic defense of the American people.

Indeed, during the past two years America has passed through a period of fire and blood; her people have gone into the depths of sorrow and personal sacrifice, during which time there have been turned more pages of tragic, yet glorious, history than have ever been turned in any like period since the dawn of time. In the business world opportunity has been cast aside for public good, and the loss has been great; the channels of trade have been literally choked, and we have been made to feel in a substantial way the personal loss. In the fields of commerce America as a Nation has likewise lost, and in fact has made no effort to protect herself, her sole object being to win the war. In every field of human endeavor, individually and as a Nation, we have cheerfully paid the price of victory and have accepted sorrowfully, yet without complaint, the burden and hardship of this, the cruelest war, perhaps in all history, but our loss is only temporary. We can go back into business; we can take our place in the world's commerce and regain all we have ever lost, and likewise into every other avocation, and win back in money and power all this conflict has ever cost, and I confidently predict that in the near future the American Nation will in the real sense become the strongest and greatest Nation of all the nations of the earth, and will stand as the one great and unselfish exponent of democracy, honesty, justice, and religious freedom.

But, Mr. Chairman, there are some things America can not do. She can not cross the sea and lift from the graves, marked now by the white crosses, the brave soldiers that gave their lives that we still might be free; she can not breathe back into their lifeless forms the breath of life; she can not return the fathers to their children, who weep for their fathers who will return no more; the strong arm of our great Government can not restore these brave boys to their noble parents; it can not replace, except artificially, the limbs that were lost; our Government can not give again vision to the eyes that see no more, neither can it restore reason to the minds that have tottered beneath this awful strain. No, Mr. Speaker, this America, in all her greatness, can not do; but she can do the next best thing. She can say to the fatherless children, to the sorrowing wives and parents, that America will deal gently, fairly, and honorably with them and that she will reach out with tender arms and place around them such gentle care, such complete protection, and such encouraging assistance that if the deceased soldiers could see or know what his country is doing for his loved ones he would be proud that he died for a country like ours. She can make the boys who must carry to their graves the scars received in the conflict feel—even better, know—that America will deal generously with them and that she will make ample provision for their comfort and protection during the remainder of their lives, and should America do less than this we would in our hearts feel ourselves ingrates and unworthy of the blessing of freedom purchased by their noble sacrifice.

I am proud to say that this bill is a real example of liberality, fairness, and justice, and it is an announcement to the world that America will countenance no niggardly policy toward her wounded soldiers and the survivors of those who died for honor and freedom.

The amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DOMINICK], in effect, further liberalizes this bill by giving to all alike automatic insurance for 120 days, and if the soldier or sailor was killed or wounded within 120 days from the time he enlisted he will receive the benefit of the $5,000 policy to the same effect as if he had duly applied and paid for same. The bill sought to be amended provides that the soldiers and sailors shall have this protection, unless they shall have refused to take out insurance. Mr. DOMINICK, by his amendment, simply strikes out the provision which deprives the soldier or sailor of this right under any conditions and gives to them, as a matter of law, the absolute right to the insurance, and I believe this ought to be done.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARRISH. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Does the gentleman think the failure to apply is equivalent to a refusal to apply?

Mr. PARRISH. In response to my worthy colleague, I will say that applications presented to the young men as they entered the service, and at the place where the blank is left for them to say whether they will take insurance, and which have "none" written in the blank, if this amendment is not adopted, will be construed, and has already been construed by the Bureau of War Risk, to mean absolutely a refusal on the part of the soldier or sailor to take insurance, and thereby operates to cut them out of the automatic insurance which will be given to the men to whom no application was presented. I do not believe the law should be so framed. It is too much like saying to the boy that because he did not decide to take the insurance at the time the application was presented to him that he shall be held to strict account and his failure to make immediate application will deny him protection.

When these boys entered the service they entered under most trying circumstances; the clouds hung low upon the horizon, the world was excited, and it is reasonable to suppose they felt the tensity of the hour and probably deferred taking insurance until they might have sufficient time for mature thought, and consequently, temporarily at least, passed up the application, and whether they made application at the time or not, I, for one, do not believe it should operate to destroy their rights.

In fact, Mr. Chairman, let me say here and now, that it is my earnest desire and hope as a Member of Congress that the doctors generally when they examine the boys with a view to determining the extent of their disabilities will be fair and liberal in their judgments and see to it that the doubt is not resolved against the soldier or sailor, and that they are not denied insurance where there has been any appreciable injury by being classed below 10 per cent disabled. The doctors can and should be liberal in such cases, and I want to take this opportunity also to say that I believe it will meet the approval of the American people if the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, in the interpretation and enforcement of this law, will be liberal, and see to it that every doubt is not resolved against the wounded soldier or sailor, but that the bureau, in the interpretation of the law, will be liberal and fair, giving to the wounded boy the benefit of the doubt.

The House to-day by the adoption of this amendment can set an example of liberality, of broadness, and sympathetic vision by striking out what can only be classed strictly as a technicality and by not applying the ironclad rule in dealing with these young men.

For this reason I urge the adoption of this amendment, and the bill as amended should pass, and that, too, as speedily as possible. It is a debt that America ought to pay, and the sooner and more freely it is paid the better it will be for our noble soldier boys and for the glory and honor of our splendid Commonwealth.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DOMINICK].

The question was taken; and, on a division (demanded by Mr. RAYBURN), there were 48 ayes and 31 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, this body does not, in the main, encourage personal compliments from one Member to another. Without trespassing, I trust, upon that standard of propriety, I feel that I am expressing the sentiment and judgment of the entire membership of the House in commending by highest praise the invaluable services rendered in the preparation and passage of this fine legislation by our colleague, Hon. SAMUEL RAYBURN, of Texas. [Applause.] No one will believe that this expression is prompted by any spirit of invidious compliment. Upon the contrary, I feel sure that every member of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee will cordially join in the sentiments of appreciation I am trying to express.

The gentleman from Texas to whom I have referred, from the inception of this great system of insurance and compensation for our soldiers and their dependents, has been recognized as an expert upon its purposes and its administration. In making the contribution of his time and splendid mental talents to the now largely perfected system, he has not only honored his district and his party but, what is infinitely more important, he has rendered to the disabled soldiers and to that vast multitude of the dependents of our honored soldier dead a distinct, outstanding, invaluable public service. [Applause.]

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise an extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Mr. Chairman, we have been proceeding for several days in the consideration of what I regard as the best considered and most important legislation of this present session of Congress. In the past we have had pension legislation dealing with the soldiers of the former wars and there has always been a great amount of difficulty in framing that legislation. This particular bill, however, is much larger in scope and provides in every way not only for the soldier, sailor, and marine, but also for the loved ones at home. I think this House should give credit to the subcommittee which had this legislation in charge. I am not a member of that subcommittee but I think this House and the country, and particularly those benefited by the act, ought to recognize and be grateful for the splendid services rendered by the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Iowa, Hon. BURTON E. SWEET. [Applause.]

Being a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, although not a member of the subcommittee, I know full well of the many days, of the many weeks, of the many months, that he has worked tirelessly on this legislation in order that he, with his colleagues, might present this carefully-drawn bill to the House; and the progress we have made on the bill to this present hour, the small number of changes that have been made, are certainly evidence of the painstaking work that the gentleman has done. [Applause.] The gentleman from Iowa is recognized not only by his colleagues on the committee, but by the entire membership of the House as an able legislator and he has brought to the accomplishment of this huge task his characteristic energy, his unquestioned ability, and his unbounded patriotism. The fighting forces of this country were deserving of the best talent available, and I am happy to know that the able gentleman was chosen. The soldier, sailor, and marine of America will never forget the invaluable services of BURTON E. SWEET of Iowa.

Mr. SWEET. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the committee rose and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8778) to amend and codify the war-risk insurance act, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its proper committee as indicated below.

S. J. Res. 95. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the city of Atlanta, Ga., tents, cots, horses, and saddle equipments for the use of United Confederate Veterans in their convention from October 7 to 10, 1919; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HAYDEN and Mr. SUMMERS of Washington were given unanimous consent to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. MACGREGOR, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence indefinitely on account of committee work.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 21 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, September 13, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.
